When a student, he published a tract, entitled "A Living Christ." Christ to him then, and all through his life, was a living reality. A fellow-student—who years afterwards, like himself, entered the Indian mission field, and now remains to mourn his departure—loves to remember their long holiday rambles into the country, when they compared their Christian experiences, and discoursed on the speedy personal coming, and pre-millennial reign of the Lord Jesus Christ, a hope that grew with their years, and cheered them in their work among the heathen.

In 1861, the young man graduated with honours, and shortly afterwards became a tutor in mathematics in his Alma Mater. After finishing the prescribed course of studies in the Theological Seminary, he was ordained to the office of an evangelist. It was even then felt, by all who knew him, that the very highest positions in the home church were open to him; but he had resolved to serve the Lord on the foreign mission field. With his young wife, he sailed from Boston for India in December, 1864. Unfortunately, the captain of the ship fell overboard when only a few days "out;" subsequently the young missionary took the necessary observations, made the calculations, and practically steered the vessel, landing in Calcutta at the very worst season of the year.

After a short stay in Allahabad, greatly enjoying the rest and fellowship with missionary brethren, they proceeded to Fatehgarh, rendered sacred by the devotion and Christian heroism of the noble band of missionary martyrs, so cruelly butchered by the infamous Nana Sahib, in the dark days of the Indian Mutiny. Here he remained for six years—busy years they were to him—absorbed in a large measure in learning the languages of the people, becoming acquainted with their manners and religious observances, both through the medium of their books and in personal intercourse with themselves.

His quick ear, and systematic study of the languages, enabled him in an almost incredibly short time to speak to the village people in their own patois, and with accuracy and idiomatic purity to discuss in the Sanscrit with learned Brahmins the subtleties of the various schools of Hindoo philosophy, and to point them to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.

In 1871, he was removed to Allahabad, the seat of government for the North-West Provinces, situate at the junction of the two sacred rivers, the Ganges and Jumna; and, in consequence, one of the most sacred cities in the whole of India. At certain seasons of the year, as many as from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 of people arrive to bathe in the waters of the united rivers.

Here he published the first edition of his Hindi Grammar, which at once attracted the notice of the most famous Oriental scholars in Europe and America. In this larger sphere, too, he had ample opportunities for utilizing in his work those stores of well-digested knowledge, not only of Biblical criticism and theology, but also of the Hindoo and Mohammedan religions, which he had begun to collect in America, and had largely extended and enriched during his residence in India.

In the year 1876, owing to the sudden death of his first wife, he was compelled to return to America with his four motherless children. Only those who have passed through the same experience can understand the feelings of the young missionary, as he left behind him the grave of her whom he loved, and his life work, thus so suddenly, to all appearance, brought to a close. He was greatly depressed in mind when he reached London, where in a singular manner he found light and comfort when visiting a friend. Waiting in the drawing-room for the lady of the house, he took up a volume of poems, and turning over its pages, some lines caught his eye to the effect that, however dark the cloud that surrounds you, it is well to remember that God is in the cloud. He knows all about you. The lines came as a voice from heaven to him; the dark cloud that had hung over him since the death of his wife, seemed to melt away, and never again in all the experiences of life did it return.

Finding it impossible to arrange for his children at home, so as to enable him to return to India, he was reluctantly compelled at the end of the year to resign his commission as a foreign missionary. A few weeks afterwards, early in 1877, he was called to the pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa. The following summer he was called upon to succeed the late Dr. Archibald A. Hodge, as Professor of Systematic Theology in the Western Theological Seminary, Alleghany, and his Alma Mater conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

In 1886 Dr. Kellogg received and accepted a call as pastor from St. James' Square Presbyterian Church, Toronto, Canada. During his ministry, the members of the congregation increased in number from 468 to about 700. In his ministerial and pastoral activities, he found time to engage in a good deal of literary work. Among the books he wrote were—"The Jews: Prediction and Fulfilment"; "The Light of the World": a comparison between Buddhism and Christianity, and a crushing answer to "The Light of Asia"; "From Death to Resurrection"; and an Exposition of the Book of Leviticus, in the Expositor's Bible Series. At this period he also found time to re-edit his Hindi Grammar, and to enlarge and enrich it with the results of his maturer study, dealing with no less than thirteen dialects of the Hindi language, classifying and arranging their various modifications as they became part of the patois of Upper India. This monument to his industry and erudition brought him a host of honours.

In the midst of many Christian activities, he received a call to return to India, to assist in the revision of the Hindi Old Testament. It was a call that required earnest consideration. There was, on the one hand, his great and important work in Toronto—a large and flourishing congregation made up of people who were devoted to him; also his literary labours, by which he was influencing public thought. Carefully and prayerfully the questions involved were considered, and when the path of duty became clear to him, there was no hesitation as to the course of action. The home at Toronto was broken up, and he and his family turned their backs on their native land, and once more started for the Far East. In addition to his Bible translation work, he delivered lectures on Biblical subjects to theological students, wrote tracts for native Christians, and delivered lectures to Hindoos and Mohammedans on various phases of the Christian faith; and also conducted Bible readings and preached to European congregations.

His fame as an Oriental scholar made him respected by civilians and military men in high official positions. Taking advantage of this, he on every occasion tried to interest them in the work of missions, and besought their assistance in their official capacity in connection with his great work; so far as their doing so would not compromise the religious neutrality laid down by the Government of India; also to bring the officials themselves within the fold of the Good Shepherd.

In Dehra Dun, where he resided during the cold season, he conducted special meetings, in which the Inspiration of the Scriptures, the attacks of the School of the Higher Criticism and Natural Science, the Resurrection of our Lord, and other subjects were considered. These meetings were attended by the highest civil and military officers of the district.

Dr. Kellogg's last days were among his busiest. As will be remembered, he met with his death by falling over a precipice while on his bicycle. He was buried in the Landour Cemetery, and the funeral was said to be the largest ever witnessed in the hills. Rev. Dr. Lucas, of the same mission, conducted the service at the grave in English; while Rev. Dr. Hooper, of the C.M.S., his colleague in the work of Bible Revision, delivered an address in Hindustani to the native Christians and others. The whole of the newspapers of India, in noticing his death, spoke of him in the most appreciative and generous terms. Both among European and native Christians, the grief at Dr. Kellogg's departure was sincere and profound. We may add that Mrs. Kellogg has displayed, in her affliction, a degree of resignation and Christian fortitude that is seldom seen.

A friend remarked on his funeral day, to the Director-General of the Trigonometrical Survey of India, "Kellogg knew his Bible well;" who replied, "Dr. Kellogg knew everything well!" And yet he was one of the most humble of men—not a particle of self-consciousness could be detected in his character. "Altogether," says Dr. Colin Valentine, "he was one of the most learned, humble, Christian men I have ever known. He was my intimate and greatly beloved friend for more than thirty-three years; and, now that he has gone, I can never expect to see his like again."

Irish Mission to the Jews.—At a recent meeting of the Belfast Branch of the Irish Mission to the Jews, Mr. R. C. Glendinning presiding, Mr. Grande, missionary, described the progress of the work. He had recently visited Dublin, Waterford, and Cork, spending twelve weeks at the last-named place, where there are about five hundred Jews. The action of the French Protestants on behalf of Capt. Dreyfus had been the means of making the more intelligent element of the Jewish people ponder as to its cause, and many had traced it to the purity of Protestantism as compared with Romanism. Mr. Grande considered the outlook was hopeful.

Anti-Vivisection.—The Pioneer Van of the London Anti-Vivisection Society is doing excellent work in arousing enthusiasm for the cause, and making known some of the revolting experiments practised by vivisectors upon dumb animals. The summer tour of the van commenced in June last at Gloucester, and many towns have been visited, with satisfactory results. Mr. E. Stacy, who gives his services to the Society, defraying also his personal expenses, labours industriously in connection with the work. On one side of the van are the words of the Queen's message to the Society, "Heartily sympathizing with your efforts;" and on the other appears the remark of Lord Shaftesbury, "Vivisection is an abominable sin." Open-air demonstrations in connection with the work have just been held at Eastbourne with satisfactory results.

Dundee Conference.

THE sufficiency of the Word of God, as the instrument used by the Holy Spirit in converting the sinner and consecrating the saint; the suitability of the present high priestly service of Christ to meet the recurring need of believers, in their daily life and labour; and the standing witness of God's people, in observing God's ordinances, and being about his service, may sum up the subjects of the Conference, which was held in the Kinnaird Hall, Dundee, last week—September 19, 20, and 21.

Lord KINNAIRD presided at the opening meeting on Tuesday. In speaking of the necessity of leaning upon the Word of God alone for support, he said a great many Christians use man-made crutches. Rev. P. WILSON, Leith, gave the opening address on the Word of God in its sufficiency, in the hands of the Holy Spirit, as the means of conversion; and Rev. R. STEVENSON followed, taking for his subject the Word of God as the means of consecration. Mr. YOUNG defined conversion as turning to Christ, and gave a number of incidents in connection with the conversion of well-known servants of Christ, such as Spurgeon, Wesley, Luther, Augustine, the Philippian jailer, Paul, the Ethiopian eunuch, Cornelius; in each case, showing that conversion was a turning to Jesus. Mr. Young further opened up his subject by emphasizing the fact, that it is the purpose of Scripture to discover Christ.

In the afternoon, the open Conference, on How to Study the Bible, was opened by an address by Pastor F. E. MARSH, who called attention to three points. 1. Study the Bible from a geographical standpoint; that is, taking in of a Gospel, such as the Fatherhood of God in Christ, as revealed in the Gospel according to John. 2. Topical study, such as illustrated in the different ways in which the blood of Christ is mentioned. 3. Geological study; that is digging beneath the surface, which was illustrated by the meaning of the word "atonement." A profitable discussion followed.

On Tuesday evening two evangelistic addresses were given. The first by Rev. P. WILSON, and the second by Pastor MARSH. The first address was rather a discursive one on the Righteousness of God, and the second was on the Love of God. Mr. Marsh introduced his subject by calling attention to four aspects of love in the New Testament. (1) The Perfect loving the Perfect—"the Father loveth the Son." (2) The Perfect loving the Imperfect—"God so loved the world." (3) The Imperfect loving the Imperfect—"the Pharisees loving the chief seats." (4) The Imperfect loving the Perfect—"we love Him, because He first loved us."

Dr. WATSON presided on Wednesday morning; and Pastor MARSH spoke upon the High Priesthood of Christ.

Rev. P. J. ROLLO, of Glasgow, gave the next address on the Priesthood of Believers. He explained that all believers were priests in the New Testament. The Romanist priestly caste was an injustice to Christianity; and, like the throttling ivy, smothering the life of the tree it embraced, it had demoralized, both morally and physically, the countries over which it dominated. Christian priesthood to-day was simply the spiritual counterpart of the Old Testament orders. Their purifications were chiefly outward, while the Christian's is inward. They were anointed with the holy oil; Christians had the anointing of the Spirit. They were clothed in white raiment, while Christians have the righteousness of Christ. New Testament priests offer up, not animal sacrifices, as of old, but are privileged to present themselves and their gifts to the Lord.

The subject treated on Thursday morning was the Lord's Supper—what it signifies, and who should partake of it. The latter part was taken up by Rev. D. FAIRWEATHER, Edinburgh, who emphasized the fact that only the Lord's people have the right to partake of the Lord's ordinances. Rev. Dr. WELLS, Glasgow, dealt with the first part of the subject, and directed our thoughts to of Christ as the Saviour, as revealed in the Lord's Supper. (1) Human Saviour, for He was manifest in human form. (2) Suffering Saviour, for He died. (3) Willing Saviour, for his obedience was unto death. (4) Sin-bearing Saviour, for He was crucified for our offences. (5) Satisfying Saviour, for the death of Christ in its spiritual application is a soul-sustaining truth. (6) Uniting Saviour, for all saints lose their sectarianism around one common Lord. (7) Triumphant Saviour, for the triumphs of the Gospel are the outcome of his death. If He had not died, there would have been no Gospel to preach.

The afternoon of Thursday was devoted to missionary subjects, when Rev. Dr. ROBSON, of Perth, gave a general missionary address, and Rev. W. SCOTT, Daska, India, and Rev. I. LENDRUM, Nagpore, India, gave an account of their personal work; and, in the evening, Dr. ROBSON and Rev. D. FAIRWEATHER gave evangelistic addresses.

Whether by accident or design, the one thing which impressed itself upon the writer of these brief notes was the positiveness of the testimony given. The friends in Dundee had apprehended the fact, that the best way to overcome error is to preach the truth, for the subjects chosen go right at the errors of Romanizing ritualism. The Word of God, in its all-sufficiency, will kill the error that the seat of authority is to be found in a so-called Church. The priesthood of Christ will overturn the error, that any man has any right to exercise a priestly function as a medium between God and his fellows; for, if Christ has no right to the office of priest on earth, no other man has (Heb. vii. 14); and the Lord's Supper, observed as a simple memorial of Christ's death, exposes the fallacy of transubstantiation.

Another correspondent writes:—The attendance throughout, as well as the interest manifested, showed a marked increase upon former years. Promoted by the local branch of the Evangelical Alliance, the subjects chosen bore an important relation to recent events and controversies in the religious world.

Rev. P. WILSON (Leith) spoke of conversion as the greatest of all themes. Conversion is the business of all our Churches and Conferences, and the Bible is sufficient for this end. What is conversion? It is getting back to God. This is a common, scriptural definition. A well-known writer has said that the two great realities in the world are God and the soul. But there is a third, and that is the soul at peace with God. Conversion is also reconciliation with God. It might be further described as finding Christ.

Rev. ROBERT STEVENSON appropriately followed, describing sanctification as the necessary outcome of conversion. We grow

IN GRACE, BUT NOT INTO GRACE.

Conversion introduces us into a new life, conferring new faculties on the spiritual nature, opening the eyes to new sights, the ears to new sounds, and the life to new nourishment. Sanctification is the exercise of these senses. The Bible sanctifies by revealing Jesus.

Conference of Evangelists.

THE meetings of evangelists, convened through these columns and otherwise, took place on Monday, and was an occasion of both pleasure and profit, many phases of evangelistic work being brought under notice.

There were large attendances of evangelists, ministers, and friends interested in aggressive work, and among the encouraging communications received from some unable to attend was a message from Lord Radstock, at Woolston:—

Regret cannot join your company evangelists. Believe great blessing coming; more Nazarite life wanted, not numbers. David, alone, got victory when Saul's army fled. Praise God! Quiet day here; some clergy, ministers, Salvationists, brethren, waiting on Head of the Church; realized his presence, love, power, and expect his victory.

Mr. R. C. Morgan, who presided in the morning, after words of welcome, said that the subject of the day, the Work of an Evangelist, seemed fully described, so far as regarded the Evangel, in Acts viii.—where seven definitions of it were given: v. 4. They that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the Word [of the kingdom, see Matt. xiii. 19]; v. 5. Philip preached Christ unto them; v. 12. Preaching concerning the kingdom of God; v. 14. Samaria had received the Word of God; v. 25. When they had testified and preached the Word of the Lord, and preached the Gospel to many villages; v. 35. Then Philip . . . preached unto him Jesus; v. 40. Philip preached in all the cities. After seven definitions of the matter preached, it is said at last that he preached in all the cities.

Mr. Charles Inglis said there were five characters in the chapter. Saul, a persecutor; Stephen, a martyr; Simon, a hypocrite; a chancellor of the exchequer, who was a seeker; and Philip, a servant of Jesus Christ. Philip was a man of influence—in money matters, for he was one of the seven chosen to distribute the money laid at the Apostles' feet. At home, for he had four daughters, evangelists. In obedience, for when sent from a fruitful revival on a seemingly fruitless errand, he arose and went. In preaching the Word, as we have seen above. There was great joy in Samaria, and the eunuch went on his way rejoicing.

The noon meeting which followed was practically a continuance of the Conference. After introductory words from Mr. M. H. Hodder, who presided, and an interesting testimony from Dr. Baedeker as to progress in Austria and Germany, Rev. F. B. Meyer expressed some suggestive and characteristic thoughts for the encouragement and help of evangelists. In dwelling on the privilege they had of ministering to the Lord, Mr. Meyer spoke of the blessing that came from such service. Let them praise Jesus more, tell Him more how they loved Him, and live in the spirit of adoration. So they would find their souls filled with the glow, and force, and realization which were necessary to the successful prosecution of soul-saving work. It was easier, Mr. Meyer pointed out, to denounce sin in others than to cast it out of one's self, and he felt strongly the importance of forming one's character on a high plane, in order to be in a position to deal with souls. Remarking on the words of the Holy Ghost, "Separate unto Me Barnabas and Saul," Mr. Meyer called for a more complete reliance on God, since it was impossible for Him to thrust people out into the work and then retreat from them. Let them trust

THE HONOUR OF GOD.

After some apposite remarks on some of the temptations incidental to the career of an evangelist, Mr. Meyer concluded with a reminiscence of a visit to a saw-pit. He could see only the man at the pit top holding one end of the saw, but he could tell from the rhythmical swing of the man's arms, and the evident depth of the pit, that the worker had an out-of-sight but strong comrade aiding him in the arduous task. So the evangelists present in that gathering had each and all their pieces of knotted timber to saw; but let them remember that they had the great Arm of God working in rhythm with theirs.

The afternoon meeting took the form of a general council for the discussion of methods of work.

Venerable Sir George Williams expressed his strong sympathy with evangelistic work, and added fatherly words of encouragement. Mr. J. E. Taylor, of Aylesbury, drew instructive lessons from the last two verses of the 139th Psalm on "Sins of the lips," depicting, in terms of faithful warning, some particular instances in which the tongue may betray even earnest workers into sin. Turning to the question of prevailing prayer, Mr. Taylor contended for a forsaking of that spirit which perpetually says, "What can I get from God?" in favour of that which says, "What can I give to God?" Then they would be able to say, "My meditations shall be sweet to Him."

A well-balanced word with maritime allusions and illustrations came from Mr. T. B. Miller, who quoted the saying, "If I have got my tongue under control, I have my hand on the tiller;" and then Mr. G. W. Stoughton pointed out some details of work in which he considered improvements could be effected. A number of evangelists followed, and the frank and open comments which were made must undoubtedly tend to make the Conference memorable—and usefully so—in the minds of many. Thought readily crystallized into terse expression. Occasional weaknesses were faced and owned; but, beneath the words of emphasis on questions of method, it was cheering to note the sterling and vigorous determination of the order of evangelists to spend, and be spent, in the service of God. The meeting was helped by the inspiring solo-singing of Madame Annie Ryall and Miss Hallie Q. Brown.

Mr. Rowland Edwards, of the Evangelization Society, spoke of the necessity of expecting to see the Spirit convict souls, and bring them down in penitence to seek the Saviour. Instancing C. G. Finney as a man bathed and steeped in the spirit of

FERVENT AND PLEADING PRAYER,

Mr. Edwards voiced the sentiment that evangelists, as a whole, are earnest workers, the divinely genuine character of their labours being proved by the soundness of the fruit thereof. Rev. Z. B. Woffendale told of the day when he started with a congregation of one; and, after alluding to the subsequent growth of his work at Somers Town, pointed out that in the subject of the Conference they had a divine exemplar in the person of the great Evangelist. The speaker went on to remind his hearers of the lessons on the subject drawn by Jesus from the harvest-field. What said He? "Pray ye," &c. They should and must rest entirely on Him in prayer, and then the revival blessing would surely come. Mr. Charles Cook gave valuable testimony to the results accruing from personal effort to secure immediate surrender to God; and Mr. A. Garstin followed on similar lines, mentioning some interesting cases in which he, the speaker, had kept some lists containing the names of persons professing conversion in revival meetings. After an interval of some years he had made inquiry as to the whereabouts and spiritual condition of the persons specified in the "roll," and the results were highly satisfactory.

Mr. Leonard Weaver added a timely word of thankfulness for the spirit of attention he found among the masses, and favoured simplicity and directness in endeavouring to reach them. Mr. W. R. Lane concluded, emphasizing the refreshing effects of prayerful study of good literature, and going on to describe some desiderata of the inquiry-room, such as a means of imparting elementary instruction to the seekers.

At the evening session, Mr. F. W. Lawrence presided and Mr. C. Russell Hurditch, speaking on "What hath God wrought?" gave a lucid and comprehensive review of the chief religious and philanthropic undertakings which have arisen from the Revival of 1859. A number of representative speakers followed with profitable words of testimony and exhortation. Mr. W. R. Lane added parting words of encouragement, and Mr. R. C. Morgan expressed the thankfulness of the conveners for the blessing which had attended the gatherings.

The British Association.

THE meeting of the British Association at Dover came to an end last Thursday. While not so large a gathering as those at Bristol and Liverpool, in point of interest the proceedings have been fully up to the standard of former years. About 1,500 tickets were sold, and the local committee certainly did everything in their power to prepare a pleasant week for their guests and make the meeting successful. Putting aside the excursion and other fixtures, let us look for a minute at its serious work, the scientific proceedings, and ask what is the outcome of these, regarded from a Christian standpoint.

In his opening address, Sir Michael Foster who is one of our most distinguished physiologists, gave a historical survey of the progress of science during the last 100 years, dwelling on various salient points of that progress. He illustrated, by references to the history of electricity, of chemistry, geology, and biology, the great gulf that lies between 1799 and 1899 in the world of science. Then all was far behind its present position; and not only has there been an enormous increase in natural knowledge, but the knowledge of the few has now become the knowledge of the many. He proceeded to answer

THE ALL-IMPORTANT QUESTION:

Will this increasing knowledge of Nature only change the ways of man by adding to his material comfort, or will it have an effect on man himself?

Sir Michael believes strongly in the mental discipline of scientific inquiry. "The seeker after truth must himself be truthful; his nature must vibrate in unison with that of which he is in search; he must be alert of mind; and he must have the moral quality of courage—courage of steadfast endurance." Accordingly, he strongly advocated scientific training in the schooling of the young generally. While we may agree with such a sentiment to a certain degree, there may yet arise the thought in our minds, that though scientific training may be of use to people in dealing with the common problems of life and in solving them, and that therefore the practice of scientific inquiry should be widely taught, there is another training far more needful to the young, and which would accomplish the same ends. The Christian remembers such words as, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God;" "When He the Spirit of truth is come, He will guide you into all truth;" and knows by experience that where a soul is trained in the school of Jesus Christ, and accepts Him as Master, such a soul, apart from any human learning, acquires "truth, alertness of mind, and steadfast endurance."

The address closed with illustrations from politics of the good wrought by science in making the whole world kin, and in the brotherhood of man, which science is helping to establish. We may well rejoice with the president; the meeting at Dover, with its between the English Association and the kindred French Association meeting at Boulogne, and their friendly relations, is something to distinguish the Dover gathering if there were nothing else. On the Saturday 400 French scientists crossed to attend the English meetings, and the following Thursday the members of the British Association were received at Boulogne by their French confrères.

Of the two evening lectures that are always delivered, one was given in French by Professor Charles Richet, on "Nervous Vibration;" the other being by Professor Fleming on "The Centenary of the Electric Current." The last-named discourse was extremely popular, and the lecturer, by his admirable clearness (reminding one of Faraday), and by his beautiful experiments, delighted his large audience. His explanations of the apparatus used in wireless telegraphy must have heightened in all minds the deep interest surrounding Marconi's marvellous experiments now going on between Dover and Wimereux, near Boulogne. From what I learned from one of its most distinguished exponents, this most wonderful system has been known for some years, but only with reference to very short distances. Marconi has established its possibility for long distances, and believes that it may be possible to even establish wireless communication between England and America. During the lecture, a message was sent from the Dover Town Hall to the French, and the answer received back from them; and, as the words of the reply fell on the ears of the audience, Job's irresistibly rose to one's mind: "Who doeth great things past finding out, and wonders without number." We may use the discovery, and find out much concerning it; but how exactly the electric current passes, and what the electric current really is—that is as much a mystery as ever.

Sir Archibald Geikie's presidential address on "Geological Time" must have created somewhat a similar feeling. While he himself placed the age of the earth at 100,000,000 years, he was obliged to add: "We must leave the dispute — the barren controversy — to the decision of the future."

Passing for a moment to the Economic Section, the President, in his address on the economic condition of the people, spoke wise words that the Christian teacher, as well as the economist, ought to heed. He deplored the waste and thriftlessness that are so common in all classes; showing, at the same time, how much the poor might learn from their French neighbours in the ways of housekeeping. "Housekeeping is no better understood than it was two centuries ago—perhaps not even so well." Waste and extravagance in food, in dress, in funerals, in water, in cookery, were widespread, and needed checking. Mr. Higgs attributed the fact that so many girls married with a minimum of domestic experience, and became agents of inefficiency and waste, to the factory system. Surely these serious words must come home to us as Christians, and make us realize more than ever our responsibility in training the young in these matters.

No report of the meeting, however brief, must close without reference to the special sermons on Sunday, which Archdeacon Wilson preached to the members. It was a striking sight to see so many distinguished men, whose names are famous in the world of science, gathered together to listen to two masterly discourses on the mutual influences of theology and science from one who, while able to speak as a scientist, spoke also and primarily as a follower of Jesus Christ. In the morning the preacher showed how, more and more, are steadily approximating to each other in method, in their hypotheses, and in the certainty of their conclusion.

In one of many striking passages, the preacher remarked that the fierce antagonism which science once displayed towards religion had died away, and philosophy had broadened. Once the "eye of the soul" was ignored in any reasoning; now, modern philosophers leave room for this Divine spirit above and beyond them. In politics and economics, also, there is progress towards the recognition of a Divine law.

One thing on Sunday was lacking. No devotional meeting for the members was held this year, as has been usual. The reason given to me on inquiry was that the need for it had died away, since now there was no hostility to combat from a certain clique of scientists. I certainly think that a grave mistake has been made to abolish this meeting. It is impossible to conceive of the need of prayer disappearing, and it is much to be hoped that a few of the leading members of the Association will see their way to maintain the devotional meeting as a regular part of the annual gathering.

I. M. M. Young.

Savoy, France.—Twelve years ago two English ladies commenced a quiet work amongst Roman Catholics in Evian-les-Bains. There is now an opening for two ladies in a village within half an hour of that town, where a very useful work can be done. Particulars from the Misses Wellington, Evian-les-Bains, or from the Missionary Pence and Information Bureau, Exeter Hall, Strand.

The Salisbury Conference.

A FRIEND attending this annual gathering of believers, at the Maundrel Hall, remarked at the praise meeting on Friday morning that, from the sermon which opened on Monday night until that hour, he had felt the week to be spiritually bracing. The Conference sermon by Rev. J. Howell, Vicar of All Saints, Derby, had been a solemn yet cheerful summons to them to "go up higher" (Luke xiv. 10); and throughout the three days which had followed there had been an earnest attempt to realize this privilege.

This well-known Conference has now celebrated its silver jubilee, Rev. Edgar N. Thwaites having founded it nearly twenty-six years ago. Compared with other conventions, it has never been a large one, but throughout the years it has partaken of the character of a family gathering. This week, at one of the afternoon teas in the rectory grounds, there were no fewer than ten missionaries from the foreign field who gave short addresses. The Conference has been a strong supporter of home mission effort by sending workers into neglected districts.

Tuesday was market day, and visitors had to make their way to the Hall through droves of bullocks and market people hurrying with baskets of stores to their stalls. Some of the buyers and sellers evidently found time to spend a little time in the meetings. At the first meeting Psalm li. was read, those on the platform leading off with the first verse, and the visitors responding with the second, and so forth. The convener presided morning and evening.

The speakers on the first morning were Rev. R. Graves Walker, who appeared in excellent health, and insisted upon the fact that God's children did not make enough of the facts which ensure consecration; Rev. J. Howell, who dealt a sound blow at the talk about "reunion," adding that it was to be found already in such conferences as that; and Dr. White, who delivered a powerful address upon the pre-eminence of Jesus Christ.

Dinner was served in the Luther Hall, followed by brief addresses from friends representing various societies. Mr. D. J. Evans and the convener spoke cordially of the work of the Scripture Readers' Society in Ireland, Miss Robinson of Sunday Observance, Miss Valpy of education in Calcutta, Dr. White of the good work of his daughters amongst Moslem girls. There was a large attendance at the evening meeting.

Omitting other reference to the proceedings of Wednesday, than to say the addresses were as valuable as those of the day preceding, a word may be said of the Lord's Supper Service on the following day. It was numerously attended, and the address of Rev. A. Hughes, upon the various connections in which the Lord is called "Master," was a gem of simplicity and beauty.

On the Conference assembling in the Maundrel Hall instructive addresses were given. Lord Radstock came first with words on "Henceforth know we no man after the flesh;" and Rev. W. Standen followed. The closing addresses were by Rev. R. Middleton on "The Coming of the Holy Ghost," and Mr. Standen on "The Redemption from the Curse of the Law." On the following morning came the praise meeting, when two hours were spent so profitably and pleasantly that the time seemed to fly. In quick succession, sometimes two or three rising together, expression was given to the texts of Holy Scripture which, in the course of the Conference, had fixed themselves on the hearts of listeners.

Then, without mentioning the names of any speakers—for this was strictly forbidden—portions of addresses which had come to the hearts of listeners were referred to, all in the briefest possible manner; and then, as usual, the question was put, How many would be ready to devote themselves to missionary service, should the Lord open up the way? There was a little hesitation at first; but in the course of five minutes thirteen held up their hands, and four expressed their readiness to assist in sending out missionaries.

Haman's Plot Against the Jews.—Esther iii. 1-11.

Golden Text.—Rom. viii. 31.

Lesson Connection.

YOU will remember how the Jews were conquered and carried away captives, a great many to Babylon; some were taken further on to a very grand city called Shushan, where the king of Persia had his palace. Daniel was one who had to go to Shushan (Dan. viii. 2), and so was Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1). Also a Jew named Mordecai, who was employed as a servant in the palace. This man had brought up a young orphan cousin as his own child, and trained her carefully in the Jews' religion, and she was very beautiful. The time when she lived was somewhere in the fifty-eight years' interval between the sixth and seventh chapers of Ezra, which you heard about some weeks ago; it was after the dedication of the second temple, but before Ezra came to Judea.

The Story.

Ahasuerus is the Hebrew name for Xerxes, the great king of Persia (Esth. i. 1). In the third year of his reign he made a great feast for his nobles; and the queen, Vashti, made one for the ladies. After the feasting and drinking had been going on for a week, he sent for the queen to come and show her beauty to his guests. The queen refused to go, which made the king so angry that he said she should no longer be queen. After awhile, Ahasuerus wished to have a new queen, and the king's ministers were ordered to find the most beautiful young women for him to choose from. Mordecai sent his young cousin, told her not to say she was a Jewess; and she was chosen by the king, and he made her his new queen. There were grand rejoicings all over the land. Mordecai sat in the gate of the palace, ever wanting to hear news of his beloved child. One day he heard of a plot against the king, so he sent for Esther and told her, and the king's life was saved through him. This was entered in the state records. This story shows God's wonderful care over his exiled people the Jews. Though they were being punished for their great sin, yet their God was watching over them, and using this heathen king's actions for the preservation of his people. If Esther had not been queen, the Jews would all have been killed.

Explanatory. Read Esther iii. 1-11.

Verses 1, 2. Haman was the king's prime minister, and his great favourite. He was raised to the highest position, and the king commanded everyone to bow down to him. Haman was of the race of Amalek, the great enemies of the Jews (1 Sam. xv. 2, 3).

Verses 3, 4. This was why Mordecai would not bow down to Haman, also because Eastern kings were worshipped as gods (Deut. xxv. 19).

Verses 5, 6. Haman's wrath and pride were so great, it was beneath him to touch one poor Jew; his vengeance contrived how to destroy all.

Verse 7. The Easterns are very superstitious, and when anything important is to be done, seek omens and signs for the best day to do it. So Haman cast lots for every day, and the lot fell on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month; therefore he had to wait eleven months before he could speak to the king. This gave the Jews plenty of time (Prov. xvi. 33).

Verses 8 to 11. Haman seemed to have succeeded. Letters were despatched all over the empire ordering the entire destruction of the Jews on the 13th day of March, B.C. 474, four or five years after Esther's marriage.

Lesson Points.

God is the great King who can overrule earthly kings (Deut. x. 17; Rev. xix. 16).

God's great care and love for his children (Rom. viii. 28).

Obey God at all costs, and trust the consequences with Him (Acts v. 29).

This God is our God and our Saviour (John xv. 27, xiv. 1, iii. 16).

Those who have a mind for type and allegory may find the following of interest:—

1. Ahasuerus. The Great King.
2. Mordecai. The Faithful Suffering Servant.
3. Vashti, the wife put away. Israel put away.
4. Esther, chosen in her stead. The Church.
5. "The king remembered Vashti, and what was decreed against her" (ii. 1). "God is able to graft them in again" (Rom. xi. 23).
6. Haman, the adversary. The adversary—Satan.
7. The Gallows (marg. the Tree) which Haman set up for Mordecai, and by which he himself perished. The Cross—the Tree; "That through death He might destroy him that had the power of death" (Heb. ii. 14).

 We have now come to the week of our fifteenth PRIZE COMPETITION, and I hope that if any of my young friends still "hate UNCLE TOM and his questions," they will nevertheless buckle to and do the best they can to win a prize. Full particulars are given below, as well as the names of all who are eligible.

The Fire Brigade and the Milk Cart.

THE other morning I was awakened by the blowing of whistles and hubbub of voices, indicating that something unusual was happening. On looking out of my window I saw that a house in the street was on fire. Presently, with a great clatter of horses' hoofs and jingling of bells, a fire-engine dashed up, followed in the course of a few moments by several others. It was a very impressive scene, as the sun was shining upon the brazen helmets and buttons of the firemen, making them gleam with dazzling brightness. Around them stood a crowd of people, attracted by excitement and curiosity, and partly by admiration for the noble men who risk life and limb for the safety of their fellow-creatures. It turned out, however, that the fire was a very small affair, with which one engine was more than sufficient to cope. Before any of them returned to their stations, the crowd divided to admit the passage of another vehicle of a very different order. What do you think it was? A milk-cart, and a very dilapidated one, too, drawn by a very forlorn-looking horse. The crowd burst out laughing, and hooted the driver as he passed through. The whole turn-out was such a very sorry contrast to the spick and span appearance of the fire-engines and their men.

But I cannot help thinking that, after all, the humble service of the milk-cart, taking it all the year round, was as valuable to the community as the dash and "go" of the fire brigade. It was many years since a fire-engine had been needed in that street, and then only to serve one house, but the milk-cart was required by every resident, twice or three times a day, week in and week out.

This little incident reminds us that it is not always that which makes the most outward show that is necessarily the most useful. The boy or girl may be very brilliant on certain occasions, and yet be less really useful than those who are less "showy," but more steady and persevering.

I am sure your mothers will be able to explain more fully what I mean, so I will leave the suggestion and illustration with you and with them.

UNCLE TOM.

A Fire at a Hop-Farm.

PASSING along a quiet country road, we neared a lone house. Clouds of smoke were sweeping over the hedge, and we could hear a suspicious crackling. As we came near a couple of pigs crashed through the gateway, eager to get away from what proved to be a rick on fire.

If boys and girls and all of us were as eager to get away from sin it would be well.

We were working for Jesus among the hop-pickers of Hereford and Worcester, and another day came across another fire. Three men and a boy were sleeping in a barn. It was Sunday night when they turned in, and about midnight one of them woke up coughing, and found the place full of smoke. Waking up the other man and his little son, he made for the door, and opening it ran out into the cool night air.

Jesus says, "I am the Door." Have we by Him escaped from sin and death?"

The father had brought out his six-year-old boy: both escaped through the door. Our earthly fathers cannot save us, much as they wish to; but our heavenly Father can, through Christ.

Perhaps both father and son had thought very little of that door up to that hour; they may even have despised it, and gone so far as to kick it. But when the fire was after them, how beautiful that old barn-door appeared. Perhaps we have thought very little of Jesus; but when we see our danger, and that He is the only way of escape, we will begin to think differently.

As the two men and the boy opened the door, the smouldering fire burst into a flame, and in a moment the place was in a blaze.

"Where is the old man?" they asked.

He had not come through the door, and there was no other way of escape, so they feared the worst.

Yet he had been aroused, for one of the men had awakened him. Alas! young ones, as well as old ones, may be aroused, and yet not be saved. They may see their danger and the way of escape, and yet perish.

One of the men tried hard to enter the burning barn, but was unable. Putting his head in a bucket of water, he made a second attempt, but the heat was too great. The poor fellow had somehow lost his opportunity, and no one could give him another.

Yet he had been nearer the door than the others, but he had gone from it instead of going through it; and so those who were farthest off escaped, while the one who was nearest perished. I am always afraid that those who seem nearest Jesus, the Door, should be lost after all. I mean children in pious families, in Sunday schools, those who read THE CHRISTIAN pages for the young, and who belong to the C.S.U., yet have not believed in Jesus.

When we came upon the scene, the old barn was a heap of smouldering ruins, while around the ricks were burning, and all was desolation. Only the charred remains of the old man could be found, burnt past recognition, and from the spot where they were found it was evident, instead of coming to the door when roused, he had gone further back into the building.

Let us not act thus with Jesus. There is no time to lose. The fire of sin is increasing; it will soon be too late to escape. Now the Door is open. Come to Jesus at once, and you are saved and safe.

OUR FIFTEENTH

Quarterly Prize Competition.

JULY TO SEPTEMBER.

Will parents and teachers kindly see that each of the following rules is STRICTLY OBSERVED, especially Nos. 7 and 10? The only help permitted is to explain the meaning of the rules or questions, if necessary.

1. Only those may enter whose names appear in the list below as having been right nine times out of twelve.
2. Competitors will be divided into FOUR DIVISIONS:—
   I. Those under TEN years of age.
   II. Those over TEN and under THIRTEEN.
   III. Those over THIRTEEN and under FIFTEEN.
   IV. Those over FIFTEEN.
3. Write outside your envelope in large letters the words "PRIZE COMPETITION," and the NUMBER of the DIVISION to which you belong; and address it to "Uncle Tom," as usual.
4. At the top of your answer paper write very clearly your DIVISION, your FULL NAME and ADDRESS, and your AGE last birthday.
5. NUMBER YOUR ANSWERS exactly to correspond with the questions.
6. Every paper must be SIGNED by a parent or teacher to testify that Rule 7 has been observed.
7. No CONCORDANCE and no help allowed; only the use of a Reference Bible. Competitors must not help each other.
8. The last day for answers to reach the office is Tuesday, October 10. The results will be announced on October 19.
9. Marks will be given for accuracy, neatness, writing, spelling, &c., the rewards being: First Prize, Second Prize, First Certificate, and Second Certificate.
10. CHAPTER and VERSE must be given wherever possible.

Every answer will be examined separately by three persons; and NO PAPERS can be re-examined after the lists appear.

Those who cannot do ALL the questions set for their division must do AS MANY AS THEY CAN, and will receive marks accordingly.

Prize Questions.

Personal.

Evelyn Gulston, Dorothy and Winnie Mace, Evie Miller, Andrew Mitchell, Dorothy Mott, Gilbert Powell, Ethel Butteriss.—I am glad to welcome so many new "Searchers," and hope the study will prove interesting and useful to all.

A. Fewster.—Many happy returns of your birthday.

Mildred Peters.—I think the "star" was meant for Hattie only. Your own was a little more careful last week, but you had two spelling errors in your letter.

Willie Hooper.—To "complete" a text, means to give the words which come before, if there are any, as well as those which come after. To give chapter and verse only is not sufficient. When is your birthday?

Eddie Palmer.—How very untidy your paper was last week!

Leonard Wall.—There is no need to write the question each time. Your answer to question 5 (192) was incomplete.

Mary Hill.—Your answer to question 7 (192) was incomplete.

Lindsay Browne.—Your answer to question 5 (192) was incomplete.

Ada Macnutt.—The answer to question 12 (191) was found in 1 Peter. not 2 as you had.

Ella Berryman.—Thank you for your lovely flowers. They were much appreciated by some little sick children.

Freda Hunton.—I think you were the sender of the beautiful shells which arrived here. Many thanks for same. They were sent to bear messages from the sea to some poor friends.

Edith Shepherd.—Many thanks for your interesting letter. I am glad to hear you are enjoying yourself so much.

Mr. Moody's Grandchild.

At the funeral of his little grandchild, Irene, on August 22, Mr. Moody said:—

"I would like to say a few words, if I can trust myself. I have been thinking this morning about the old baldheaded prophet, so many hundred years ago waiting in the valley of the Jordan for the chariot of God to take him home, and again the chariot of God came down in the Connecticut Valley yesterday morning about 6.30 o'clock, and took Irene home. For five months she was sick, and, for days out in California last winter, I kept my satchel packed ready to go at a moment's call, but I prayed the Father that he might bring her back to Northfield, that she might go from this valley, and God heard the prayer.

"Irene has finished her course; her work was well wrought on earth. She has accomplished more than many in their threescore years and ten. We would not have her back, although her voice was the sweetest voice I ever heard on earth. She never met me once since she was three months old until the last few days of pain without a smile. But Christ had some service for her above.

"My life has been made much better by her ministry here on earth. She has made us all better. She has been a blessing to all the conferences here this year. She has brought a feeling of sympathy into the meetings such as we never had before. During the Young Men's Conference I tried to keep it secret, but while I was on the platform my heart was ever here at the house. On the day after the conference closed, she left for the Adriondacks, and we feared we might never see her again. During the Woman's Conference my heart was yonder in the mountains at Saranac. The last night of that conference, while I was trying to speak to the young women words of cheer and encouragement, I was constantly thinking of the little girl, and within twelve hours I was by her side.

"The last few days have been blessed days for me. I have learned many new and precious lessons. She was very fond of riding with me, and, on Monday morning, she asked me to take her riding, and at 6.30 o'clock we were riding together. She never looked more beautiful. She was just ripening for heaven. She was too fair for this earth. I thank God this morning for the hope of immortality. I know I shall see her 'in the morning.'"

Baptists in Assembly.

THE autumnal Assembly of the Baptist Union had a good opening at Leeds on Monday. Nearly 1,000 delegates are in attendance. Dr. Clifford was greeted with loud cheers when he rose to open the Assembly. Prayer was offered for the preservation of national peace, the petition being endorsed by fervid cries of "Amen."

The Secretary, Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, introduced a deputation from the Leeds Free Church Council and the Temperance Council, who offered the Union a warm welcome to the city. The address of the Free Churches, read by Rev. J. Martin (Presbyterian), rejoiced at the great unity pervading Evangelical Nonconformists, and thanked God for the great leaders among the Baptists, who had so signally devoted their abilities to the noble services of bringing the Free Churches together. They differed in the methods of publicly professing their faith, but it was the same Lord in whom they trusted, and the same Gospel they preached.

Professor J. S. Banks (Wesleyan College) congratulated the Baptists, as a denomination, on their firm adherence to their principles, and their want of faith in ceremonialism.

Mr. Councillor Midgeley, speaking of municipalities and their work for public morality and religion, said if the Church helped the City, the City would help the Church.

Rev. William Cuff, Vice-President of the Union, having replied with great heartiness, Mr. W. Pearson read the temperance address, which welcomed a body so long and honourably associated with the temperance reform, and recorded the fact that the services of Baptists dated from the earliest days of the movement, even before the organization of temperance societies. To-day 415 of the Baptist ministers, and all the students, are said to be abstainers. He trusted the Baptists of to-day would be Divinely assisted to sustain the high temperance tradition of their Church, and continue to do valiant service.

Mr. W. Harvey, President of the Leeds Temperance Council, said they were met in the same chapel in which Rev. Jabez Tunnicliffe, a Baptist minister, who founded the Band of Hope movement, addressed the first united meeting of that movement fifty-two years ago.

The reply was made by Alderman G. White, of Norwich, who was loudly applauded in view of his recent adoption as candidate for North-West Norfolk. Temperance progress, he said, had been very great in the denomination during the last fifteen years. An effort is to be made to get together a conference of the Nonconformist temperance societies, and to organize a twentieth century movement to obtain a million pledges. He urged that the Sunday Closing movement should also be pushed forward.

Then followed the Lord Mayor's reception in the Art Gallery. It was pleasant to receive so cordial a welcome from one who is himself a decided "Churchman," but the occasion was quite in keeping with the utterances that had gone before. Next week we hope to give some account of the subsequent meetings.

Personalia.

On Sunday of last week, Rev. James Ellis preached his farewell sermons at Barnsbury Church, where he has been pastor for twenty-two years. At the farewell tea meeting he was presented with a testimonial. He has accepted a call to Point-in-View, Devon.

Rev. Sydney J. Jones is resigning the pastorate of the East London Tabernacle Church, and hopes to terminate his ministry there towards the close of the year. In a public statement on Sunday evening last, Mr. Jones remarked that each month during his work there has been a steady accession to the membership, and the roll now bears 2,045 names.

Rev. C. I. Scofield, D.D., who is preaching at New Court Congregational Church, has delighted the congregation with the beginning of his ministry. On Sunday the church was crowded, and on Wednesday evening a large company gathered to hear him. In his manner he makes you feel at home directly, while his message is intensely sympathetic, and essentially practical and helpful.

Home Missions.

Haven for Homeless Little Ones.

THE object of this work is to care for, in Christ's name, the babes of betrayed young mothers, and to bring the mothers under kind, wise, Christian influence.

The work is of a special character. Its aims and methods should be clearly understood, and then any fears which some may naturally entertain as to the eventual influence of help in such cases may be removed.

While the poor, helpless babes are befriended, the erring mothers are not unduly relieved of any responsibilities incurred by their fall. Help is only given on condition that they steadily strive to do their part; and every endeavour is used to bring them to true repentance, as well as to prevent them from sinking further in sin.

The benefit conferred through the Haven is double, both in object and in effect. The work is a blessing to babe and mother—it is preventive as well as remedial.

In the case of the babe, the evil of the past is, as far as possible, remedied; and the evil that in nineteen cases out of twenty would result from the unfortunate child being committed to the care of unscrupulous persons, who would receive it merely for the sake of gain, is prevented.

At the crisis (and God only knows the impenetrable hopelessness, the maddening perplexity of the distracted young mother's heart in that hour) when she is asking: "Shall I make away with the child? or with myself? or"—stifling the last vestige of good intention—"abandon myself to a life of sin, and support myself and babe by the wages of shame?" a loving hand draws back the erring one from the brink of destruction; a loving voice tells her of a Saviour's precious blood; a loving heart plans for her future welfare and the safety of the babe she clings to with true, yearning mother-love.

Then the rescued girl-mother is helped into domestic service again, or into some suitable employment, where, out of her earnings, she is able to contribute £8 to £12 a year towards her babe's support—which she does most gladly and honourably. Once a month, the mother can spend a day's holiday with her baby, and she then receives friendly, practical counsel, as well as spiritual encouragement.

Thus, as regards the mother, also, the evil of the past is, as far as possible, remedied; and the evil that would almost inevitably happen if she was left without a helping hand at such a terrible, distracting crisis is prevented.

There are at present ninety-five children cared for entirely: sixty-five of these are sheltered in Castle House; thirty are boarded out with carefully-selected foster-mothers.

Castle House, and the eight acres of land adjoining it, have been taken on a lease of seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, with the option of purchase during the next two years at £5,000.

It is intended to build seven Cottage Homes around Castle House, so as to have all the children brought up under the close personal supervision of Mrs. Wallis, whose own home is distant only about a mile and a half. Each Cottage Home will cost about £400. Two such homes have already been promised by generous friends who have watched the work with sympathetic interest for several years.

After the money has been subscribed for the purchase of Castle House and grounds, and for building and furnishing the Cottage Homes, Mrs. Wallis hopes the work will be largely self-supporting, as the poor young mothers struggle most bravely to keep up their payments regularly. But as those cases in which the mothers are most friendless and helpless are always considered first, it is evident that such contributions will always need to be supplemented to a considerable extent by the loving gifts of Christian friends. Address: Mrs. Ransome Wallis, Copthill, Burgh Heath, Epsom.

Reading Rooms for Postal Employes.

THE quiet work of some years' standing amongst the numerous clerks, sorters, and postmen connected with the General Post Office in London—a work begun in response to an invitation from a small band of Christian men in the G.P.O., and largely and untiringly helped by many of their number—has now reached a crisis, when it is felt that the needs should not remain any longer known to, and supported by, the few, but should be told to the Lord's people in London and elsewhere, the chief object of the work being to lead souls to Jesus Christ.

Shortly after the work began, it was found needful to start a small reading-room for the evangelistic and other meetings, and also for a rest for the postmen between duties. Twice since, in simple faith in God, and dependence on Him, this effort has been extended to meet the growing needs—till, for the past five years, a small institute, near the City Boundary, has been maintained by a few interested in the work.

Now, however, through the removal of a large contingent of the staff to the important Parcel Centre at Mount Pleasant, and also through the absolute necessity that the premises where meetings in connection with the General Post Office are held should be removed nearer the Office, it is found advisable to again seek extension—opening one or more rooms near the General Post Office; and, if possible, doing something similar near the Parcel Office, Mount Pleasant.

The work is never allowed to go into debt. It, therefore, depends on increased pecuniary support for it to be carried on, on its present lines (the rents of premises nearer the General Post Office being so much higher). The increased accommodation comprises rest rooms for the postmen of the chief office—a boon that is much appreciated and used by many—and a large room for meetings.

When it is remembered that it is on behalf of these postmen, who work year in year out in the service of all the large City business-centres, and that this is the only effort of the kind on their behalf on evangelical and undenominational lines, one must surely feel that the work calls for the needed increased support, and that not only of the few, but of the many. It was begun during the life, and with the help, of Sir Arthur Blackwood. It is known to and recommended by Mr. A. A. Head, Corrie Lodge, Wimbledon, and Sir G. Williams, St. Paul's Churchyard, and is worked in connection with the Postal and Telegraph Christian Association (senior branch).

The hon. treasurer is Colonel Elliot, and letters may be addressed to him at the P.T.C.A. (Senior) Institute, 4, Goswell Road, E.C.

Portsmouth Soldiers' Institute.

DEAR SIR,—I should like our friends among your readers to know that on October 5 we hope to celebrate this Institute's twenty-fifth anniversary.

Let me remind them that the trooping work at Southampton is a serious drain upon our funds and upon the time and strength of our workers; we need continued and increased help by prayer—and gifts.

God is so good; there is much to encourage and cheer, for which we do thank Him. Let us exalt his Name together.—Cordially yours,

SARAH ROBINSON.

Soldiers' Institute, Portsmouth.

Romanist Devotions.—Lectures like the one delivered recently by Rev. Dr. Hicks in Sheffield to a crowded meeting of young men, should yield abundant fruit. It dealt with the every-day religious practices of devout Roman Catholics abroad. Rosary-beads, scapular, veneration of relics, and indulgences were explained. This was done in order that the lecturer might use the opportunity to dwell upon the priceless boon which we possess in England in the pure Gospel faith. He spoke with emphasis of personal access to God by a living Saviour in opposition to the Confessional, and testified to the spiritual reality of a Divine Helper always at man's right hand to redeem and save. The youth of our land much need instruction of this kind in order to avoid the errors of an apostate church.

Among the Hoppers in Kent.

THE work of the Hoppickers' Mission extends over a district embracing many parishes within an area of nearly, or quite, forty miles in compass. This mission—founded by Rev. J. J. Kendon in the early sixties—is still in vigorous operation, some sixteen missionaries, besides several helpers, being actively engaged from day to day, Sundays included. Mr. Kendon has been spared to see a green old age, but still possesses the vigour of youth. He is the hon. secretary, director, and treasurer of the Mission, and is sympathetically in touch with every branch of the work.

Goudhurst, in the Weald of Kent, is the chief centre of the work, which is entirely undenominational. Very many instances of the great blessing the Lord has bestowed in the rescue and salvation of poor, lost, perishing souls are on record.

The free tea is the great event of the season. This year 550 sat down. This took place in the playground of Bethany House School, and was preceded by a prayer meeting in the chapel, and a short service for the hoppers was held while seated for tea. This year everything was well-arranged and well carried out. Two short, telling addresses by well-known City missionaries, with prayer and singing, occupied three-quarters of an hour. All were abundantly satisfied with their tea, and it is hoped that some at least enjoyed the richer provisions of Gospel Grace which was set before them.

While the spiritual good of the soul is the highest aim, the temporal necessities of the people are carefully thought of. Clothes, boots, medicine for the sick, and a doctor in serious cases, are all provided for. Mr. Kendon's address is Goudhurst, Kent.

R. SHINDLER.

Seamen's Christian Friend Society.

FOR many years this Society has done an excellent work among seamen and fishermen on the Cornish coast; and, in connection with the thirteenth anniversary, largely attended and successful meetings were held last week at the Town Hall, Fowey, and at the Y.M.C.A. at St. Austell, at both of which Mr. R. C. Morgan presided. At the Town Hall, Fowey, the chairman was supported by Sir Colman and Lady Rashleigh, Mrs. Stopford Sackville, Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Townend, and many local ministers and friends.

In the course of his opening address, Mr. MORGAN said he was interested in Cornwall because his mother was a Cornishwoman, and he received his early education in Cornwall. He felt special interest in this mission, because it was a work with which his friend, the late Mrs. G. J. Hill, had been so long associated. He felt that no class had greater claims on our sympathy than sailors. They were deprived of the pleasures of home life, and exposed to special perils and temptations whilst serving us. Not only our luxuries, but our necessary food supplies, came chiefly from across the seas, so that what we should do without our sailors he did not know. No class faced greater dangers, endured more hardships, or were less equally remunerated for their services. It seemed to him that this Society, by establishing sailors' homes and rests, and in other ways helping seamen, was in some measure seeking to discharge the debt we owed to them. The great purpose of the Society was to lead these men to God. He was much pleased with the spiritual character of the work, and especially pleased with the visit he had paid to the Fowey Sailors' Home—it was as clean, taut, and trim as a man-of-war. He was glad to learn that the sailors appreciated what was being done for them, and he trusted that the local interest in this branch would be deepened, so that it might become self-supporting and no longer a burden to the parent Society.

Rev. G. J. HILL reported that at Fowey, Par, Charlestown, and the other ports missioned on the Cornish coast, 264 services had been held on shore during the past year, 79 Bethel meetings had been conducted on board ships, 983 conversational and prayer meetings had been held ashore and afloat, 2,000 mission visits had been made to ships' crews and seamen's homes, nearly 10,000 tracts, Gospels, and books had been circulated, 4,100 visits had been made by seamen to the reading and recreation rooms, about 800 beds had been let to seamen, and 100 had boarded at the Home, letters had been sent to many sailors abroad, and a number of ships had been supplied with bags of books. These efforts had been attended by very cheering results, and very many seamen had been brought to the Lord.

Parmiter Street Sunday School Mission.—The annual report of this Mission shows a continuance of good work; but, unfortunately, the balance-sheet announces a deficiency. Mr. G. W. L. Barraclough has resigned the secretaryship; and Miss Beck, the lady superintendent, has been elected to fill his place pro tem.

The Compassion of Christ.

(Notes of an Address by T. J. BARNARDO, F.R.C.S. Ed.)

I THINK one cannot read those words spoken of our Lord as the Great High Priest, in Hebrews v., without thinking sadly of the homeless, friendless, miserable wastrels who, in all the streets of our great towns, know not their right hand from their left, who are so "ignorant," who are so much "out of the way." Who so much need the "compassion" of the Great High Priest, and of all who are "priests unto God," as the unhappy, forlorn, Waif Children of our slums? Think of them, too, as of those who need our compassion; for, alas! they are woefully "ignorant," as well as "out of the way!"

A dear lad who had been in our Home for some years was leaving us, and I had an opportunity of a quiet talk with him. Among other things he said, "Sir, I never saw a Bible, I never prayed, I never heard of God or of Jesus, except to swear, until I came into the Home!" Such a lad is but a type of many who are our home heathen. They are "out of the way," and need the compassion of the loving heart of Jesus Christ; and it has been kindled also, I hope and believe, in the hearts of many of his servants for these little ones, who are, not as sheep, but as lambs "gone astray." A girl admitted into one of our Homes, on the day of her admission, after getting washed and cleansed, assembled with her companions for evening prayer. When they all knelt down, she remained standing, and gazed vacantly around her in astonishment. She looked in wonder at the mother of the cottage, who was praying, and then said aloud, "Who are you talking to, eh?" Getting no reply, she exclaimed, "What is she a-talking about?" and she shook one of the children who was kneeling beside her in the hope of receiving an answer. "Get up, get up," she called again, "What is she a-talking about?" It is no exaggeration, but a sad fact, that there, in our little family, was a waif child of eleven, one of our little brothers and sisters, who had never knelt in prayer, and had never known the sweetness that fills our hearts with undying love—the sweetness of Jesus' name. To gather them into homes, and save them from the

to which they are exposed, is but a small part of our work. That is, indeed, a means to the end. Our great aim is to gather them to the very feet of Jesus Christ, and to ask Him, as of old, to place his hand upon them and bless them. When I think of them thus, I remember with joy those words, "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

Another girl was recently admitted to the Homes. When night came, she was taken up to her bedroom and shown her bed. She gazed at it intently, and then inquired, hesitatingly, "What is it for?"

"Why, my dear, that is where you are going to sleep. You must take off your clothes and get to bed. You know what it is well enough, don't you?" "No, ma'am." "Oh, come; surely you do!" "No, ma'am; I don't."

"Why, what do you do when night comes? Don't you ever go to bed?"

"Oh, ma'am; we just sleeps anywheres—anyhow. We lies down, you know, just where we is."

The poor child had been a tramp. She was thirteen years of age, and had never known what the comforts of a bed were. She had tramped all over the country with the woman who had her in charge, and she came to us in this woeful condition, as dark in mind and as forlorn in spiritual things as in things temporal.

And what may not be made out of these poor waifs and strays if but we have faith to see that God is able, out of the stones, to raise up children to faithful Abraham? The children are of a plastic age, and we can mould them and shape them, by God's help and by God's grace, so that the neglected and bespattered wastrels of our crowded streets, who have heard and known only of evil yesterday, become not, as might be predicted of them, agents of destruction, but monuments of God's mercy, and, in their turn, real servants of his.

their young lips may utter foul obscenities, or learn to lisp the perfected praise of the babes and sucklings of the kingdom of heaven.

A little girl, only five and a half years of age, was sent to Canada. Young as she was, in the cottage at Ilford she had already learnt to pray and to love the Saviour. She remained in our Home in Canada for about six months, and then a farmer and his wife, who had no young children of their own, entered into correspondence with our ladies over there, and it was arranged that they were to adopt this girl. Inquiries were made which satisfied us that the house was a good one. On a certain day the farmer called at the Home with his buggy to take the little girl away with him. After he had gone, my good helpers told me that their hearts had sunk within them. He was a very tall, elderly-looking man, but with a dried-up, unsympathetic face. The ladies felt inexpressibly sorry for the child, when they saw the little mite sitting so forlorn-looking by the side of this tall old fellow. However, away she went to her new home. Two or three months later, one of them visited the place, and heard this story—told, mark you, against himself by the man, and confirmed by one of the hired "helps."

When our wee maiden reached her new home, the wife came out to receive her. She also was very tall and hard-featured and dry-looking. She took the child out of the buggy, but never kissed her; she was brought into the house, and it was nearly time for the midday meal. The five grown-up sons came in (there were no daughters), each as tall as his father—great sons of Anak! They looked round with a kind of grunt, pulled their chairs to the table, and nodded to the little girl as they sat down. Picture that little mite of a child sitting down amongst all these unsociable giants, looking most forlorn! I can imagine her thinking, "Is there nobody here who has any love for a tiny little girl?" By and by the food came in, and the farmer, without further preface, commenced to cut and serve; when suddenly attention was arrested by the action of the child, who had got down off her chair, or rather on to it, for she was so small, and was kneeling down with closed eyes and with her little face in her hands, saying her childish grace before meat. The effect of it I cannot describe to you. The clatter ceased instantly, and there was a dead silence, amid which the

came like the voice of God and the touch of God to these hardened men. They were all melted, and the tears ran down their faces. The farmer said to the child, with broken voice, "My dear, couldn't you say them words agin?" She said it again, and this time with her little hands up, and when she had finished, as there was a further pause, she added:—

> Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
> Look upon a little child,
> Pity my simplicity;
> Help me, Lord, to come to thee!

There was the farmer, his wife, and all these big fellows down on their knees on the floor, saying the childish words of prayer after the little girl. Surely, "A little child shall lead them." Ah, that is often God's way! If you had seen the gladness that filled that house as they found God's messenger in the person of the little child who had come to dwell among them, you would have been pleased! As the story was told me, my informant added that the meal was neglected for the moment, for they all got up and gave the little maid a kiss and a hug. I suppose that kiss was the first sign of grace in them. Let me repeat what I have often said before, that to numbers of houses my dear children have gone to carry habits of prayer and the knowledge of Christ, and the tender words of the Saviour's love which they have learned in the Homes. In not a few cases I have had testimony to this effect, "Your dear child's visit has been a blessing to us all."

I claim for this work that it is a missionary work of the very first order. We are preventing evil. We are influencing these children for good at the most impressionable period of their lives, and God is blessing the work that is being done in them and for them. Hence it is that I constantly ask for the prayers of God's people on their behalf. Think of the social value of all this Christian work for, and on behalf of, the children of the slums!

Since we began, thirty-four years ago, 36,803 children have been, by God's help, delivered from conditions of peril, and of suffering, and of sin. They have been gathered into the Homes, and the majority of them have been placed out into life afterwards, and have never again needed charity or assistance from Christian people. Last year my family numbered 6,342, the largest family, I suppose, in the world. Through God's providence these have all been efficiently sustained. Some of the Gospel stories have been repeated in our Homes every day, and some of the Gospel miracles. Only on two occasions did our Lord feed the multitude, but every day He is or more little children in our Homes—places which have been opened by his goodness and are being maintained continually by his supplies. Some of our Homes are never closed! Some of my helpers are literally at work all night. During the last four years we have admitted 9,784 fresh cases for the permanent benefits of the Homes; last year we admitted 2,406. Now, how was I able to do it? Because Christian people the wide world over, made my arms long enough! And yet I may fearlessly say they are not nearly long enough for all the work they have to do.

Let me set forth here afresh some of the principles which underlie this blessed work of having "compassion upon the ignorant, and them that are out of the way," and which are intimately associated with its very fibre. One is, that we never refuse a destitute child under any circumstances. That is literally true. We never have refused a destitute child. I think I may challenge any one to say, "I sent you a really destitute child, whom you have not admitted." Many a child comes to me who is necessitous, but not actually destitute. A child of the former class may, indeed, have to be refused; but if it is truly destitute, we admit it. Second, that all admission is absolutely free for the child. That, of course, means that, unless we have our pockets filled by God's servants, it becomes very difficult to do the work. Third, we admit all ages. If there is a youth nineteen years of age, who finds himself stranded in one of our great cities—not merely London, but Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Manchester, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Portsmouth, Cardiff, Belfast, or Liverpool—if he is destitute, he is admitted at once.

WE ALSO ADMIT BABIES

from a day old. Fourth, we receive those who are maimed, who are incurably crippled, who are deaf and dumb, who are blind, who are diseased from consumption, who are troubled with fatal affections of the organism—heart disease, or something of that sort—if only they are destitute. One of the things I am seeking now to do is to establish almost immediately a Home for Consumptive Children on the Nordrach principle, where they may be cured by fresh air and good food. I am hoping that somebody will send me £1,500 for this special purpose, and then I may be permitted to establish that Home.

But it must never be forgotten that our great aim is to lead all our children to Christ. The inculcation of total abstinence principles among all our children is also a feature of our work, and it is interesting to know that 28,730 children have, on leaving, signed the pledge, having first been instructed in total abstinence principles while in the Homes. This is a matter of great importance, and it is suggested by common sense as well as Christian feeling, because in numbers of cases ruin was begun by drink, and it would be useless to try and rescue children from the results of drink if they were suffered, without warning, to relapse again into habits which will reproduce the very evils from which we try to save them.

Evangelistic.

Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

THIS notable religious movement is on the very eve of being publicly launched, after many months of anxious preparation. The first joint meeting for prayer of all the committees and all the workers is to be held on Tuesday, September 26. Special meetings for intercession at the throne of grace will be held on the three succeeding days, in conjunction with the noon prayer meeting, from 12 o'clock till 2 p.m. The first two weeks in October will be devoted to meetings for the quickening of spiritual motive and the deepening of spiritual life, and particularly for the fresh enduement of all preachers and workers with power from on high, in order that many souls may be won to the Saviour.

By special request of the Executive, and in name of the Committee which I represent, we once more fervently appeal to all who believe in prayer to make the Evangelistic Campaign the subject of express and daily intercession, not only now at the opening of the same, but throughout the whole of the six months during which, by the help of God, this effort is to be maintained to gather in souls that are still living without Christ and without hope. We are all at one in the deep conviction that the spiritual results will ultimately depend on the spirit of prayer with which the work is begun, and the daily prayers by which it is sustained. To God be all glory!

JAMES PATON, Conr. of Prayer Committee.

September 18.

London Tent Work.

THE remarkable blessing that has attended the tent movement in London has aroused interest in many quarters, and those friends who are intimately connected with each of the local undertakings, as well as those responsible for the general management, are rejoicing at the intensity of the revival spirit, as manifested in the enthusiasm and simplicity of the converts.

At a recent noon prayer meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., Mr. A. GARSTIN called for a few testimonies on the subject, and there were many ready responses. Mr. LEONARD WEAVER spoke of the anxiety of the people to hear, and their readiness to be influenced. Had the Clapham Road tent been capable of seating 10,000 persons, he believed that even then it would have been filled on a recent Sunday evening. A minister, remarking on the character of the work, had said that he had never heard such clear-cut testimonies as those of the converts. Mr. BEN ALBERTO mentioned a case in which a mission had received an accession of devoted workers who had been blessed at one of the tents. This feature of the work was emphasized by a reference to a church, where in accounting to an evangelist for the marked improvement he noticed in comparison with the state of affairs a month previously, it was stated, "we have had the tent down here."

The special meetings held for children are an important section of the work, and Mr. WILLIAM GROVE referred to the labours of Mr. Van de Venter in this connection, and spoke in high terms of the Bible studies and blackboard classes. At Peckham a little girl went home and told her parents that she had "found Jesus," and as a result of a cross-examination on the subject other members of the family attended the meetings, with the result that six of them, including both parents, professed faith in Christ. Mr. Grove remarked, also, on the strong sense of conviction which rested upon meetings for adults. A young gentleman and his wife, who professed to be Christians, but whom it was extremely difficult to approach on the subject of personal religion without arousing indignant opposition, became deeply impressed. Realizing their lost condition, they sought salvation and gave a vivid testimony, subsequently bringing their friends to the meetings.

It is hoped that sufficient support will be forthcoming to enable the committee to increase the number of tents. Communications may be addressed to the hon. treasurer, Mr. A. Garstin, Queen's Square, Aldersgate Street, E.C.

BY MR. HENRY VARLEY.

Having visited the three principal tents in Clapham and Peckham Rye, it occurs to me that a few lines concerning the work of God in them would be acceptable. There can be no doubt that a real and widespread interest exists. That interest has taken hold of thousands, and is spreading in every direction. All classes come to the meetings. They are well-sustained, and a deep impression holds. This, I believe, is from the Spirit of God. The men who speak are direct in testimony. Their confidence evidently is in the power of truth. Truth, to these soul-winners, means the Word of God. The more carefully and directly the Scriptures are presented, explained, and held forth, as facts infallibly believed and faithfully held, the deeper the interest shown by the audiences which have gathered for weeks in these great canvas houses.

The singing is good and hearty. Many of the songs of praise embody the great truths of the Gospel. There is an unmistakable volume of sound showing how the crowded audiences enter into the spirit and object of the meetings. So far as I have seen, there is scarcely any moving about. The people come—they come to stay—and show no hurry either to break up, or go away. In common with many workers, I am greatly mistaken if we are not in the early stages of such an awakening in this great city as we have not known for years.

Let confidence in the personality, power, and presence of the Holy Ghost be exercised by the Lord's people, and my judgment is that we shall see his effectual working in order to a real revival of God's people, and a real spiritual awakening amongst tens of thousands in this great city. Let us keep free from unhealthy excitements, hold steadily on to real work, use the sword of the Spirit, decline to put undue confidence either in men or crowds, honour the living God by earnest, fervent prayer, "nothing done through strife or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind let all the workers esteem others better than themselves"—and the three closing months of the nineteenth century may mark a powerful and wide-spread spiritual experience, which shall not only recall, but greatly surpass, the grateful tidal waves of blessing that came from the throne of God in the memorable months of 1859. After "these forty years," surely our God is about to answer the expectant inquiry, "Wilt Thou not revive us again, that thy people may rejoice in Thee?"

In conclusion, I may remark that in the three tents visited, and as the results of loving and earnest appeals at eight successive meetings, more than three hundred quietly rose in the after-services to confess their personal reception of the Word of Life. This refers simply and only to what I saw in fields wherein I had bestowed but little labour. For the encouragement of the workers I write. It is but true to state; from what I have heard from many sources, that hundreds have passed from death unto life. To our God be praise.

P.S.A. Evangelistic Mission.

The Lancashire P.S.A. movement, from the very beginning, has been conducted on Gospel lines, and remains to-day an essentially evangelical movement. The Sunday meetings are strictly religious, and held, as a rule, in places of worship; while the very numerous auxiliary agencies, which have grown up around the P.S.A., are prompted by the consciousness that He, who alone is the Saviour of men, also "went about doing good."

Bearing this in mind, we can somewhat understand its marvellous success, and the hold it has upon the hearts of the Lancashire people. There are now, in the County Palatine, nearly 100 of these Brotherhoods, which meet regularly every Sunday afternoon—to say nothing of pleasant Monday evening meetings for women—all of which are doing good work.

Most of these societies are associated together in a "Federation of Evangelical and Unsectarian P.S.A. Societies and Kindred Societies," called in brief the "Lancashire Federation." This body is now arranging for a great six months' Gospel mission throughout the county. The P.S.A. Brotherhoods will work together and with the churches in their various districts.

The missioner engaged is Mr. Geo. Robert Cairns, of Chicago, U.S.A., who is probably well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN. He is one of the leading Evangelists of the United States, a man of good repute and great experience in mission work.

The necessary funds for this six months' mission are being raised in a dual manner. A friend of the P.S.A. movement—who does not wish his name made public—has generously undertaken to pay half the expenses incurred; the other half will be raised by collections in our various P.S.A. Societies.

The Mission fixtures are as follows:—October 1-12, Ashton-under-Lyne; 15-21, Rochdale; 22-27, Denton; 29 to November 3, Zion P.S.A., Manchester; November 5-16, Moss Side, Manchester; 19-24, St. Paul's, Wigan; 26-29, Uppermill; December 1-7, Broughton P.S.A., Manchester; 9-15, Rawtenstall; 17-20, Collyhurst Street, Manchester.

The aim of the Mission is to bring the mass of our P.S.A. men nearer to God, and to win many from the world to Christ.

JAMES BRIGHTING, Hon. Sec.

Mr. WILLIAM SAMPSON has just concluded a successful mission at Brading, Isle of Wight. The services were remarkable for spiritual power. He will also conduct a mission at Sandown, I.W., early in December.

Mr. H. STAFFORD SMITH, of the Evangelization Society, who last year conducted tent missions in various towns and villages of Wilts and Dorset, with blessing, has again visited those counties, preaching the Gospel with acceptance to crowded gatherings. Many cheering signs of blessing have followed the Word.

R. M.

Mr. WILLIAM DAY writes: "We have entered upon the ninth week of tent services in Leeds. The tent is pitched on land belonging to the Friends. In the adult school hall, on Sunday last, Mr. NORTHCOTE WILLY and myself were privileged to speak to a full congregation, after which an open-air meeting was held. I am about to move the tent on to Sheffield.

For many years past it has been the custom of Mr. J. H. FEARNSIDES, of the Gospel Mission Hall, Batley, Yorks., to conduct special open-air services on the annual "Fair Sunday" for the especial benefit of the show people. This year, Mr. BENSON, a city missionary from Manchester; and Mr. H. LENG, of the City of London Police Institute, have taken part. Large companies came together, and Gospel literature was circulated. At an after meeting, in the Town Mission Hall, several persons yielded to Christ. In connection with the mission work conducted by Mr. Fearnsides (whose address is Commercial Street, Batley), land has been purchased, on which it is proposed, when funds allow, to erect a hall to seat 800 people.

A note in Wings speaks of an Inebriate Home for Women, started by Mrs. Reynolds, a member of the Women's Total Abstinence Union. The workers are consecrated women, whose desire is to lead their patients to Christ, and who are rejoicing now in the hope of the conversion of several. The patients are mostly poor women, who do the work of the house, and pay 5s. or 7s. 6d. weekly, and besides these there are about half-a-dozen who pay from 10s. to 30s. weekly. A patient would not be refused, even if she could pay nothing. Wings trusts that this effort will have the sympathy and support of Christians. The address is Norfolk House, Devonshire Road, Balham.

HOLIDAY HOME FOR POOR AND SICK CHILDREN.

This Home, situated in a most charming part of Epping Forest, which has for several years past been of incalculable benefit to many hundreds of poor little waifs and strays, many of them half famished and pent up in the narrow and stifling courts and alleys the whole year. To continue this much needed work during this season, an earnest appeal is hereby made for help to the Christian public. Last year over 500 were taken for one or two weeks and over; 3,000 for a day. Donations in any form will be gratefully received, and can be sent to the treasurer, at the Bank, 54, Lombard Street, E.C., to the Office of The Christian, or to the Secretary, 25, Brighton Road, Stoke Newington, N.

Y.M.C.A. Notes.

A STRONG Y.M.C.A. has been established at the University of Copenhagen, with Count Moltke as president.

While the Channel Fleet was anchored in Tor Bay, the rooms of the Torquay Y.M.C.A. were opened free, and a number of the petty officers were entertained. The Torquay Association has taken this course for several years on the visit of the fleet, and finds that it is greatly appreciated by the men.

A paper read by Mr. George S. Orr, of Glasgow, at the Y.M.C.A. Conference, held in Dublin in June last, is now issued in pamphlet form. Stimulating words are given on the work of the Y.M.C.A. in dealing with the great social problems of the present day. The author's address is 58, Renfield Street, Glasgow.

The annual Conference of the Eastern Counties District Union has been held at Norwich, under the chairmanship of Canon Garratt, of Ipswich. At the business session a scheme was advanced for the appointment of a travelling secretary for the district, and amounts were provisionally promised towards this object. The total membership, it was stated, was now 2,974 for eighteen centres.

The annual meeting of the P.S.A. class for men, held at the Town Hall, Burton-on-Trent, in connection with the local Y.M.C.A., has been held. The report told of much good work. The workers have been cheered by professions of conversion. From the benevolent fund £16 was sent to Dr. Barnardo to keep one boy for a year. Regret was expressed at the increase both in Sunday work and Sunday play.

The autumnal Conference of the Western District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s was held at Taunton on the 21st inst. There was a large attendance of delegates, and the various sessions were attended by many of the clergy and ministers of the town. Excellent accounts of work were received from all parts of the district, the various associations reporting steady progress, notwithstanding the constant removals of their principal workers to other towns.

The Indian National Convention of Y.M.C.A.'s is to be held in Bombay from December 28 to 31 next. Mr. Robert P. Wilder is returning from America to join the Indian force of Association secretaries; and two further workers are proceeding from the States to Calcutta, Mr. F. S. Gardner, Dayton, Ohio, to become Assistant General Secretary in that city; and Mr. B. R. Barber, Illinois, to become College Secretary. Mr. R. D. Pringle, General Secretary at Bombay, returns to England early next year on furlough. In addition to the Bombay Students' building project, now being furthered in this country by Mr. Frank Anderson, M.A., the Calcutta Y.M.C.A. is engaged upon a new building scheme for the Y.M.C.A., as distinct from the college work, which is already accommodated in handsome premises. The new central building at Madras, it is reported, is now thronged by young men. The membership on August 1 had reached 549, counting none whose subscription was in arrear more than a month.

The 29th Annual Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations and Fellowship Unions of Scotland was held at Montrose, September 19 to 21. There were present one hundred and seventy-two delegates and twenty-four visitors. The subjects dealt with during the sessions included:—"Aggressive Work in Country Towns and Districts," introduced by Mr. Daniel Macfie (Edinburgh); "The Responsibility of District Committees in the Development of the Y.M.C.A.'s in their Districts," introduced by Mr. William Wright, travelling secretary; "The place of Lads in our Organization," introduced by Mr. David Bulloch, Kirkintilloch; "The Relation of the Y.M.C.A. to Current Questions of Social Reform, especially the Temperance Question," introduced by Mr. George Macpherson (Glasgow); "The Work of the Y.M.C.A. in the Foreign Field, especially India," introduced by Mr. Frank Anderson, M.A., English Y.M.C.A., College Secretary at Bombay. The report of the Scottish National Executive, presented at the business session, showed 281 Associations in the Union, being an increase of twenty-two on last year. The membership is 24,052, representing about the same number as last year. The two travelling secretaries have done good work, an interesting feature of this being the formation of two promising Associations in Shetland.

Christian Endeavour World's Convention.

—According to information just received, this Convention next year, at which some 40,000 delegates are expected to be present, will take the form of a huge camp meeting, instead of being held in a number of halls in various parts of London. A picturesque park has been selected as the site, on which upwards of 1,000 tents will be erected, besides two enormous meeting tents, capable of seating 10,000 persons each. The latter will be specially brought over from America. These, with several other large tents, will form a "White City" that will probably be unique in the history of religious meetings.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Rev. Robert Thomas Nichol, recently an Anglican divine in New York city, who a short time ago, went over to the Roman Catholic Church, has sent in an application petitioning for reinstatement in the Anglican communion.

Rev. E. Lionel Gedge, Vicar of St. Nicholas's, Rochester, who is totally blind, is leaving that city to become the Rector of St. George's, Gravesend. His successor, at Rochester, will be Rev. Augustine Briggs, Vicar of St. James's, Gravesend.

Rev. N. Green-Armytage, the incumbent of St. Aidan's, Boston, has forwarded a direct refusal to the Bishop of Lincoln's request that his clergy should comply with the Lambeth decision. Mr. Green-Armytage protests against the Archbishops' Court as the setting up of a "one-man rule" and "an Anglican Papacy."

Speaking at Bulwell, Mr. John Kensit said that he had taken a house in Alexandra Road, Kilburn, and, now that he was in the parish of St. Augustine's, Kilburn, he was going to prosecute "Father" Kirkpatrick, and make him remove the crucifixes from the church.

The parish church of Oldbury-on-Severn, which was destroyed by fire in October, 1897, has now been rebuilt, and has been consecrated by Bishop Marsden, in the presence of a crowded congregation. The building, which is as nearly as possible a reproduction of the old one, has cost £2,680, the whole of which sum has been raised, and the church opened free from debt.

The Irish Church Conference, to be held in Dublin during the first week in October, promises to be a very successful function, and it is anticipated with great interest. It is a serious attempt to establish in Ireland a counterpart of the English Church Congress. The representatives of English Church life and thought who will attend are mostly drawn from the Evangelical school.

The Bishop of Peterborough is at present engaged in making a round of the whole of the 580 parishes in his diocese. Speaking at Lockington, he commented on the fact that he was the first bishop who had visited it for over forty years. He had now visited all the 192 parishes in the archdeaconry of Northampton, and hoped soon to complete the round of 250 in the much larger archdeaconry of Leicester.

Rev. Dr. F. G. Lee will, it is announced, shortly resign the incumbency of All Saints', Lambeth. The church, which is exceedingly dilapidated, is to be pulled down, as the London and South Western Railway requires the site for an extension of Waterloo Station, and the parish is to be absorbed in that of St. John's, Waterloo Road. Dr. Lee has been known for many years as a Ritualist of the most pronounced type.

Harvest festivals are as generally observed in some parts of the mission-field as in England. In Tinnevelly, South India, this year, the Christians connected with the Society's stations celebrated their harvest festivals at eight centres. These poor people, among whom the father of a family would think himself well off if he earned a pound a month, gave offertories amounting to 2,729 rupees, equivalent to £182.

The great October Dismissals of the C.M.S. will be held in Exeter Hall on Tuesday, the 3rd, and Wednesday, the 4th. On the former the fields represented will be Persia, Turkish Arabia, the Punjab, Western India, Ceylon, China, and Japan. On the latter Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Bengal, N.W. Provinces, S. India, Travancore, and Mauritius. At these gatherings the Society will take leave of 162 missionaries.

Six more natives of Uganda have been ordained by Bishop Tucker, bringing up the number of native clergy in the Church of Uganda to twenty-one. The newly-ordained clergy have all had considerable experience in missionary work. One of them—Tomasi Semfuma—has had a particularly interesting history. He is one of the oldest of the native Christians, and his name figures largely in the story of the various outbreaks in Uganda. He was at one time condemned by M'Wanga to the flames on account of his Christianity, but Alexander Mackay purchased his life for two tusks of ivory.

The Church Missionary Society have arranged to hold a conference for women in Manchester in October. Invitations are being issued to those interested in the Society's work in the dioceses of Liverpool and Chester, as well as in this diocese. The Conference will begin on the evening of Tuesday, October 24, and conclude on the morning of Friday, October 27. The programme will include devotional meetings, conferences on various aspects of missionary work, public meetings for women, a "medical missions meeting," a "missionary fact meeting," with diagrams, &c.

Congregational.

A very attractive little pew-slip has been prepared, the two outside pages bearing information relating to the Twentieth Century Fund, leaving the two inside pages for local announcements of meetings.

The Welsh Congregational Union, will, at its annual meetings next year at Portmadoc, take a new departure. Following the presidential address, instead of a formal paper and discussion on a theological subject, which has hitherto always been the practice, there will be a general celebration of the Lord's supper.

The preliminary programme of the sixtieth autumnal assembly of the Congregational Union, to be held in Bristol, October 16-20, has been issued. In addition to the items already made public, there is to be a children's meeting in Broadmead Chapel, at which the speakers will be Revs. Robert Berry (Whitworth) and George Martin (Upper Clapton), and a people's meeting (which will be the closing one), when Revs. J. Morgan Gibbon and T. Eynon Davies will deliver addresses.

Baptist.

Rev. W. F. Harris has concluded his ministry at the Greenhill Baptist Church, Derby, the pastorate of which he has held for about sixteen years.

The third anniversary of Rev. J. W. Britton's pastorate of Mint Street Chapel, Lincoln, has been celebrated. The report described the present prosperous condition of the church.

The gymnasium at Epsom, which in former days was a Congregational chapel, has just been rented for use as a temporary place of worship by the Baptists of the town. Opening services will be held on Thursday, October 5.

Rev. S. W. Bowser, who for over eighteen years has been pastor of Grange Road Church, Birkenhead, has been the recipient, at an enthusiastic meeting, of numerous congratulations, on the occasion of his leaving to become Principal of the Midland College, Nottingham.

An interesting valedictory service was recently held at Peckham Park Road Church, in connection with the farewell of Rev. and Mrs. Walter Wooding, who have now left England for the Congo. The pastor, Rev. Frank James, delivered an address on "Missionary Work and Claims."

Rev. G. Hay Morgan, of Woodberry Down, has recently been called to the bar. He now proposes to practise as a barrister, and felt that to still remain the minister of a Baptist Church, would be thought strange, if not incompatible, by many people. He therefore tendered his resignation of the pastorate. At a special meeting, the Church, recognizing the blessing which had resulted upon his ministry, passed a unanimous resolution, asking Mr. Morgan to continue his pastoral work.

At the Baptist Church, Rochester, the church anniversary has been celebrated. On the Sunday, special sermons were preached by Rev. T. R. Archer, Maidstone. On the Monday afternoon, Rev. Archibald G. Brown, of West Norwood, preached to a crowded congregation. A tea and public meeting followed. Mr. W. Wyles presided, and Revs. J. Doubleday, J. E. Martin, J. Mountain, and Isaac Ward, took part. The collections were for the church funds, and were very good. The proceedings were of an inspiring character throughout.

Methodist.

In connection with a Wesleyan Forward Movement, a new pile of buildings has been opened at Stoke, a thickly populated part of Ipswich. Rev. J. E. Wakerley took part in the proceedings, which were enthusiastic throughout.

Rev. Theophilus Parr, M.A., Primitive Methodist, brother of Rev. J. Tolefree Parr, is returning to England, on the completion of ten years' ministry in Newcastle, New South Wales. He has accepted an invitation to Newton Heath, Manchester Seventh Circuit.

The Bradford and Halifax District Ministers' Association of the Primitive Methodist Connection have held (at Burnley) their twenty-fifth annual autumn gathering. Rev. J. Bowness, of Otley, read a paper on "The theological teachings of the late Dr. Dale," and an open-air service was subsequently held, the preacher being Rev. C. S. Ball, of Mirfield.

A Wesleyan minister, preaching for the first time in his new (London) Circuit, said he had heard he was expected to fill the chapel. Now he found it as much as one Methodist minister could do to fill the pulpit. He would give them his best, and they should make it a rule to bring another with them, or if compelled to be absent, make themselves responsible for two. Then the chapel would be filled.

At the Wesleyan Conference of church officers and members, recently held in Leeds, Rev. J. S. Banks said, if anyone asked, why that special movement, he replied, in any age like this there could not be too many to proclaim a belief in great, fundamental, and eternal facts. Young people and old were taking an interest in this movement. It meant a revival of religion. All churches believed in revivals when they could get them. The Church had grown up with them. When they did without revivals, the world would do without them.

Presbyterian.

Acting upon the recommendations of a committee, the London Presbytery North now dispenses with the sermon at the induction of ministers. The matter is left in the hands of the minister who presides, and, if so disposed, he can deliver a brief address on Presbyterian principles.

Dr. Laws, of Nyassaland, noted at a baptismal service that the people had about them, of clothing and other articles, "at least four times the amount of calico and other goods of British manufacture that there was in the whole of Ngoniland when I came first to the country. The Gospel brings good things of this life with the peace which follows in its train. Some folks at home have profited thereby as well."

Rev. Jacob Primmer has held a Conventicle at Rothesay, which was attended by nearly 3,000 persons. His address lasted for over two hours. He said that, at the end of last century, most of their ministers were rationalists. They were called moderates, they had no trust in God, no trust in his Word, and it was going to be the same at the end of this century. There would, however, he considered, be a great revival.

Dr. Cuyler, writing to the New York Evangelist, from Quebec, concludes an interesting estimate of Canada with the following remarks on religious affairs in Ontario: The Scotch blood predominates among the Protestant population, and Presbyterianism is a most powerful element for public order, high culture, and sound evangelical religion. It is the controlling element in the province of Ontario. Let us be thankful that we have such excellent neighbours.

The thirty-sixth half-yearly special Communion Service (with unfermented wine), under the auspices of the Hope Trust, was held on Sunday evening. A large and representative audience assembled in Queen Street Hall, which, despite the unfavourable nature of the weather, was well filled. The officiating ministers were Rev. Thomas D. Watt Powis, Church of Scotland, Aberdeen; Rev. James Smith, U.P. Church, Coalsnaughton; and Rev. William McGhie, Free Church, Buckhaven.

The Conference of the Presbyterian Church of Wales has been held at Abergavenny. In his valedictory address, the ex-president, Rev. Vice-Principal Edwin Williams, Trevecca College, sounded a note of warning as to the tendency of the age towards undue indulgence in muscular exercises, and made a telling appeal to Christian leaders to help and train with due heartfelt sympathy the young people in their efforts to improve and to attain to a more worthy and elevated ideal of life.

Rev. Dr. Watson says:—"I have the satisfaction of announcing the result of the first week in our public effort to open Westminster College without debt on October 17. We began with £10,000 to raise and £4,000 promised in response to Mr. McLean's offer of £1,000—that is, with £5,000—and we required £1,000 a week for five weeks. The first week has closed, and the sum promised to-day is now £6,173. We still require nearly £4,000, with four weeks in which to work."

Fallen Asleep.

One of the oldest of the of the City of London clergy has passed away, in the person of Rev. WILLIAM WINDLE, who for thirty-eight years had held the living of St. Stephen, Walbrook. —Mr. R. SHARP, solicitor, who had been associated with the Congregational Church, Lymington, for over fifty years. The vicar of Lymington assisted at the service at the graveside, bearing his testimony to Mr. Sharp's high Christian character and public service as magistrate and Mayor of Lymington.—Mr. ROBERT DRYSDALE, miller and farmer at Old Mills on Forthside, near Stirling. He had been a U.P. member and elder for many years. He was a man of earnest piety, and the right-hand man of all the ministers of Erskine Church.—Rev. DAVID CALDERWOOD, of the United Presbyterian Church, Milngavie, in his fifty-eighth year.—Mr. WILLIAM WILLMER POCOCK, F.R.I.B.A., in his eighty-sixth year. He was best known as the architect of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, destroyed by fire.—Rev. B. PIDCOCK, rector of Easton, Winchester, after a long illness, in his eighty-second year.—Rev. E. A. SALMON, Archdeacon of Wells, and rector of Brentknoll, Weston-super-Mare.

Notes & Comments

DAY by day the outlook darkens in South Africa, and those on the spot evidently consider the outbreak of war a certainty. No reply has been sent by Mr. Kruger to the Colonial Secretary's "interim despatch"—the so-called "golden bridge," which was thrown by the British Government across the widening chasm of diplomacy as a final chance for reconciliation—and the telegrams from the Transvaal are all of Boer movements to the front. It is altogether a dismal prospect. We can but continue to hope that some way out of the crisis may be found at the eleventh hour. A day of humiliation and prayer would be a fitting sequel to the sad story of futile negotiations, which seems drawing to its inevitable close.

On Monday last the Executive Council of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches met privately in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, to discuss the present position of the Free Churches and their ministers in the imminent prospect of war. Dr. Clifford presided, and some of the principal leaders of the Congregational, Baptist, Presbyterian, Wesleyan, and other religious communities were present. After prolonged discussion, the following resolution was adopted, with one dissentient only:—

While recognising the fact of the serious grievances of our countrymen in the Transvaal, appreciating the patience which has been shown by the Government, and believing that the Cabinet is actuated by an earnest desire to follow the things which make for peace, we do not believe that the negotiations have reached such a point as to justify proceeding to the last extremity.

We would therefore urge upon her Majesty's Government, in order to avoid the terrible calamity which such a war would be, still to exercise patience and make a further use of the resources of diplomacy, with a view to discovering some method by which such an agreement on the main issues, as we believe still to be possible, may be reached, and the rest left to be finally settled by arbitration, through representatives of the two Governments.

We would also urge on all whom we represent to continue in supplication to Almighty God, that the tempests of angry passion may be stilled, and all emotions subdued, which are at variance with the Christian law of love.

Further resolutions were adopted (1) calling upon all Free Churches to hold special prayer meetings against war next Lord's Day; (2) requesting all Free Church Councils throughout the country to hold meetings as early as possible; and (3) to summon a special prayer meeting for Monday next in the Memorial Hall, at 3 o'clock, which, we are sure, many of our readers will be glad to attend in person or remember in their private devotions.

A pleasing feature of the past week was the prominence given by the Daily News and the Leeds Mercury to the meetings of the Baptist Union and Missionary Society at Leeds. Day after day the editors did not spare their columns, and we are glad to believe their attention has been widely appreciated. After years of pressure, the railways have come to consider religious gatherings as worthy of, at any rate, some of the concessions given so freely to meetings of race and sport. Now we hope the daily press is also awaking to the fact that the Christian public is a friend worth catering for, even as some newspaper proprietors recently found it to be a foe to be feared. We especially commend the daily issues of the Mercury (September 26 to 30) to our readers, who could not fail to be profited by reading the forcible utterances of men like Dr. Maclaren, Revs. J. G. Greenhough, R. J. Campbell, Hugh Price Hughes, Dr. Parker, Dr. Clifford, and others, who took part in these inspiring gatherings.

The federation of Protestant societies is one of the great needs of the hour, and in doing this the Imperial Protestant Federation is fulfilling a good work. At present, while there are a large number of such societies, some belonging to the Church of England, and some to Nonconformity, there is among them little cohesion, and no common plan of campaign.

On the other hand, there is a solid phalanx of members of Parliament, consisting of seventy-two Roman Catholics and fifty Ritualists, who invariably work together on questions relating to Protestantism; while the vast majority of the really Protestant members resemble a crowd rather than a party, and act, for the most part, quite independently. It is highly desirable to close the ranks, and to bind together every society having the defence of our evangelic faith, so that there shall be no waste of force, no divided counsels, but an earnest spirit of co-operation among all.

The lectures about to be delivered at St. Paul's Church, Onslow Square, by Rev. W. H. Griffith-Thomas, warmly commend themselves to our judgment. What is needed in this crisis of the sacerdotal movement is not bitter controversy, but the positive affirmation of essential Gospel truth. In a spirit of Christian love Prebendary Webb-Peploe has arranged for the delivery of these lectures and set an excellent example. The subjects to be dealt with are such as these:—"The Supreme Authority of Scripture," "The Doctrine of Justification," "The Christian Ministry," "Confession and Absolution," "The Meaning and Place of Sacraments," &c. To re-affirm essential Protestant truths throughout the land would produce an impression in favour of evangelical religion that it would be difficult to resist.

A lively correspondence is being carried on in The Times on the part played by the Roman Catholic party in the Dreyfus affair. Mr. F. C. Conybeare definitely challenges Cardinal Vaughan's statement that all, or nearly all, the generals and persons concerned in the prosecution had not been pupils of the Jesuit colleges, and says that every well-informed person in France knows that the "haute armée" has, of late years, been in the hands of the Jesuits and clericals. He points out a list of papers, written and patronized by French bishops and clergy, "which have done their best to hound to death the innocent man," and points out the unquestionable fact that, without exception, "not a single clerical or Latin Catholic paper in France, Italy, or Belgium but has swelled the chorus of infamy and insult." These facts cannot possibly be denied; and even English Romanists join their voices in denouncing the action of their Church in France.

The correspondence has evoked a striking communication from Mr. Richard Bagot, of Leven's Hall, Milnthorpe, who boldly appends his name, and calls upon his co-religionists to dare the anger of their priests, and to sign their letters. Mr. Bagot says that the Cardinal and others have frequently asserted that Romanism is gaining ground in England, and he insists that, on the contrary, it is beyond doubt, "stationary if not losing ground," a fact which he attributes to "the recent unfortunate position in which the Roman Church has placed itself," and which undoubtedly will "lessen its popularity with the Anglo-Saxon races." Mr. Bagot adds that:

Among the Latin races it is steadily and rapidly losing ground and influence, the result of Jesuitry and Vaticanism. In every country there are large numbers of Roman Catholics who are disgusted at the narrow and retrograde spirit which has influenced, notwithstanding plausible phrases and ambiguous declarations, the latter half of the Pontificate of Leo XIII.

It is singular to find a Romanist giving his opinion that—

The greatest misfortune England could suffer would be to become a Roman Catholic nation, because Roman Catholicism is becoming engulfed in Vaticanism.

We trust this remarkable letter marks a turning-point in its writer's spiritual history; as, undoubtedly, the entire correspondence illustrates a period of unrest in the Roman body in great Britain.

On Sunday last, in the R.C. chapels, England was "re-dedicated" to the Virgin Mary, and, as a preliminary, their shop windows were filled with supplies of strings and beads. The substitution of the Virgin for the "one Mediator between God and man" is proceeding apace in the Roman body, and a singular illustration of the development of this worship is afforded by a leaflet sold at Catholic Repositories, and headed—

To be attached to the Inner Door of Houses, in order that the inmates may be preserved from Cholera and all other misfortunes.

The sheet contains a prayer to the Virgin as the lady and mistress of this house, (to) preserve it from pestilence, cholera, fire, water, thunder, tempests, earthquakes, thieves, schisms, heresies, and sudden death.

Cardinal Moran, of Australia, has lately been indulging in a good deal of slander of the work of the L.M.S. in the South Seas; yet, apart from the sorrow one feels when a man is led away by prejudice, there is nothing to cause pain in this treatment. The work will bear examining, to see "of what sort it is." Our enemies do us our greatest service in many senses. Neither a good man nor a good work is the worse for being sifted and tried; and the work of missionaries, as it stands so conspicuously in the front, and touches men at so many points, has always had a full share of opposition and criticism. And it has been approved and commended. Not only so, the attacks raise up friends. In Australia the subscriptions to Protestant missions are increasing, and those to Romish missions declining. Very likely the shrewd colonials know that the civilizing done by Protestant missionaries has not been bad for trade. We do not imply that selfishness is at the root of their giving, but they know what they are giving to.

In view of the pessimistic forecasts of the future of France which have been pouring forth from the daily and periodical press, a very cheerful review of the prospects of religion comes from the pen of M. Emile Houter, in a recent number of Le Christianisme au XIXme Siècle. A very handsome room will be given for the exhibition of Protestant activities at the forthcoming Exposition; and a hall, seating 2,500 people, which will be devoted to continuous meetings, is being arranged for. Since the last Exposition, M. Houter points out, there has been a great revival of spiritual earnestness, even among the Roman Catholic clergy, many of whom are leaving their old communion for conscience' sake; and a new temper is being shown by the younger writers, university teachers, and the peasantry generally. This soul-hunger opens up a great opportunity, especially in view of the discredit which is slowly but surely being brought upon the Jesuit party by its conduct in the Dreyfus affair.

In the second series of "Auld Lang Syne," Professor Max Müller quotes the following words of Chunder Sen:

It is Christ who rules British India, and not the British Government. England has sent out a tremendous moral force in the life and character of that mighty Prophet to conquer and hold this vast empire. None but Jesus ever deserved this bright, this precious diadem, India, and Jesus shall have it.

There is a radical omission in this otherwise striking and beautiful statement. Jesus Christ does not rule India, and has never ruled any land, merely by the moral force in his life and character; it is concentrated in his Cross and passion. He is more than a prophet; he is the redeemer and Saviour of the world, it is his love that constrains men. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." The beauty of the perfect life and radiant character has its power, but that is exercised chiefly over those who have been reconciled unto God by the death of his Son.

A series of telegrams from Calcutta have startled us with the intelligence of a terrible earthquake in India, involving immense damage to property. The shocks were accompanied by a remarkable rainfall, and followed by disastrous landslips. Especially between Darjeeling and Sonada, the mischief done is enormous. A thousand acres of tea plantations have also been destroyed, and hundreds of lives lost. The alarm amongst the inhabitants is beyond expression. Already her Majesty has telegraphed her sympathy. Interested as so many Christian people at home are in the progress of missions in our great Indian Empire, the calamity will be regarded as a distinct call to prayer on behalf of the sufferers. We sorrow sincerely with those who have lost their friends and relatives, as well as with others who are suffering heavy pecuniary misfortune.

Rev. Arnold Thomas, chairman of the Congregational Union, who is not given to the use of strong language, spoke at the International Congregational Congress at Boston in very plain terms of the conduct of those strong churches which neglect the weak. "They want to be cured of their abominable church selfishness." He called attention to very serious truth when he said that a church may have a magnificent choir, any number of wealthy and well-educated people in the pews, a famous orator in the pulpit, all its appliances and decorations as perfect as such things can be made; yet, in spite of all, present a hateful spectacle if it is caring only for itself. Yet none will affirm that it is easy to awaken and maintain in churches a vivid and loving interest in those which are placed in trying places, and have discouraging work to perform. Too commonly, the pastor of a feeble church is looked upon as responsible for the weakness, and the church as an object of pity. Yet the Lord does give to some churches, as to some men, only one talent.

I have not heard a dozen allusions to the sacrifice made on the Cross, and not one sermon given to an exhibition of the atoning grace of God in Christ. I have listened to so-called preparative lectures, and sat at Communion tables where not the remotest hint was uttered that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin. I have heard beautiful and eloquent discourses, ranging through almost every field of Christian literature save one, and that the one which exhibits the religion of Jesus as a Gospel to sinful men.

This is the sad testimony, evidently of a religious man, who is quoted in the Christian Intelligencer (New York). Certain circumstances had made it necessary for him to travel in various parts of the Middle States and New England for three years. This meant hearing a variety of preachers. The impression left upon his mind was that the preaching of the old Gospel of Christ was dying out. If the experience quoted above is the experience of others whom necessity compels to travel, we may well ask: What is the matter? Is not Christ being wounded afresh in the house of his friends?

Here is a case of overcrowding in a village which comes from a lady member of a board of Guardians which speaks for itself:—

The cottage is nominally one of four rooms. Two are of a fair size. The other two are formed by a lean-to. The larger upstairs room could only be entered through the other; consequently there could be no privacy. Living in this "house," and sleeping in these rooms, were a man and his wife—the latter, when I first came to know the family, having recently been confined, and being in a dying state. There was, in addition, besides the infant, a daughter of twenty-one and another infant a few weeks old, two little girls of school age, two boys of school age, and an elder son of nineteen. In addition there were a lot of little ones running about, and a nurse from the workhouse of over eighty. For a considerable period there was another girl, who was usually in service, but was then out of a place, and for one week still another grown-up daughter. How they all managed to pig together in those two bedrooms I cannot imagine.

That such deplorable conditions of life result in impurity, a loss of self-respect, and even incest is unquestionable. Publicity is absolutely necessary to reform.

That the question of overcrowding and bad housing is not confined to the towns and cities, is very forcibly shown by a "special commissioner" of the Daily News, who writes a scathing condemnation of the condition of things in the villages of East Anglia. His journey through that fertile region impressed him with the contrast between nature's bounty and the niggardliness of man. His indictment against the neglected and insanitary condition of the cottages is terribly detailed and scathing; and, owing to the unwillingness of the landlords to repair or multiply dwelling-houses for their dependents and workmen, almost unnameable evils ensue, both to health and morals. A farmer who had risen from a labourer's status said that the depletion of the villages was the direct result of the impossibility of getting decent accommodation for the young. "I have known of sixteen people living in one room. There were three beds in the same room occupied by a man and his wife, a grown-up daughter, and two sons." But even this was not the worst.

The address of the Marquis of Lorne at the Health Congress laid stress on the influence of imagination on health and disease. Whether or not men have taken cholera and hydrophobia purely through the action of fear, it is clear that undue nervousness often lowers the physical vitality to the point at which the germs are able to effect a lodgment when otherwise it would be impossible. And unquestionably a cheerful, bright spirit is a great mainstay to bodily well-being. Contentment conserves the physical forces, and keeps the constitution up to the point of successful resistance against disease. In these times of widespread worry and hurry, it is a religious duty to maintain a serene faith and a calm and equable temper in the face of the contingencies and infections of life. Many Christian people are greatly to blame for the neglect of this duty. If we prayed more, and trusted God more, we should unquestionably suffer less.

A contemporary rightly calls attention to the tendency at the annual gatherings of our Unions to give the platform up almost entirely to the "front-rank men," and to allow little or no chance to the rank and file to join in the deliberations. This is a growing feature of the assemblies, and is to be deplored. The impatience of the House of Commons in listening to the "private member" is notorious, but our religious gatherings should avoid all taint of hero worship. Those ministers who are doing the average work of the pastorate, and those delegates who have to grapple with the every-day difficulties of Church life, are acquainted with aspects of religious work, and often pass through valuable experiences which are hidden from men in prominent positions.

It would be greatly to the advantage of the churches if the "average voice" were oftener heard on the practical difficulties and problems of the ministry. There might be less oratory, but there would often be more enlightenment, and a freer flow of Christian sympathy and mutual regard.

It is a source of satisfaction to note the continued evidences of a revival of interest in Bible study. The latest movement has been made by the Central Young Men's Christian Association. Rev. Hubert Brooke, M.A., vicar of St. Margaret, Brighton, is announced to deliver a course of lectures at Exeter Hall, commencing October 11, and continuing through ten weeks. On Wednesday afternoons at 4.30 the lectures will be open to ladies and gentlemen—all being cordially invited. In the evening, at 7.30, the lectures will be repeated to young men. The aim is to teach "the practical use of the Bible, and the methods of its employment for spiritual growth and work." The syllabus is comprehensive and interesting, and we trust the arrangement will meet with much blessing and success.

The Church Missionary Society is well sustaining the progress which has characterized its movement in so marked a way of recent years. At the great farewell services held at Exeter Hall on Tuesday last, leave was taken of no fewer than 162 missionaries, a large proportion of whom are going out for the first time. Our readers will need no urging to pray that with the arrival of this band of workers in the mission field may come an accession not only of numbers, but of power from on high.

Resurrection and Priesthood:

The Priest and the Bible.

By Mr. HENRY VARLEY.

THE truth of Christ's resurrection utterly denies and disproves the assertion of the Roman Catholic and High Church priests who affirm the actual presence of the body and blood of the Lord at his table, whether in the sense of transubstantiation, or any other change consequent upon priestly consecration prayer, or assumed priestly action, power or function. There is not an atom of proof that the Lord's table is an altar for sacrifice, or that He gave his actual flesh and blood to his disciples to eat on the night of the institution of the Lord's Supper. He certainly did give them bread and wine in order to institute and fittingly commemorate what has been, and is, a precious memorial feast.

Bread and wine were chosen and used by the Lord Jesus when He was alive, and before his passion and death, as the emblem and symbol of his broken body and shed blood. The broken body and the poured out life had not been offered when the Lord's Supper was instituted. It was after the Lord's Supper had been observed that "He bare our sins in his own body on the tree." It was after the Supper that his precious blood was poured out to make atonement, and "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." It was impossible, therefore, for the Apostles to have eaten the actual flesh and blood of the Lord Jesus.

Let it be remembered that He has ascended, and passed into heaven, taking there his own body and blood. These facts give absolute proof that, except in a spiritual sense, and to the apprehension of faith, He is not, and could not, be present, much less eaten and consumed from the fingers of the priest. "He is not here, but is risen," is the word which for ever protects the table of the Lord from being, or becoming, other than

A PRECIOUS MEMORIAL FEAST.

It is written: "Christ our Passover has been sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast." It is not repetition of the sacrifice that is here commanded or in question, but repeated keeping of a memorial feast. Again, our Lord said: "This do in remembrance of me." Such is the Lord's word of instruction and safeguard. Remembrance implies absence. Why speak of absence if there is the actual eating and consumption of the flesh and blood of the Person of Christ going on? The gross character of this form of materialism is, to the spiritual mind, absolutely repulsive, and entirely opposed to the truth and fact of Christ's resurrection.

Are we regarded as severe? Let the reader hear the High Church teaching, which we now quote: "Jesus comes, at the bidding of his priest, upon the altar, and passes Himself into the little pieces of bread, and into the wine in the chalice, and so is verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper." Again: "And then to think that Jesus comes his own very Self to offer Himself in sacrifice to God and to listen to all our prayers." Let me quote another: "Every crumb on the paten, every drop in the chalice, has now become the whole body, blood, soul, spirit, and Divinity of Jesus. Now is the time for you to worship Him." Such are the utterly false and misleading statements printed and circulated by those who represent this priestly system.

Now, what is the teaching of the Lord Jesus? Hearken to his Word, which belongs to all believers and to every one "born of God:" "If a man love Me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him and We will come to him and make Our abode with him." What place is there, in the light of these words, for the priest and his assumed power to bring Christ Jesus to the believer at a certain hour on Sunday morning, and in connection with what he calls the Mass, or altar sacrifice? The assurance of the Lord is that the Father and the Son have both made their permanent abode in the temple of the body of the believer. Our Lord adds, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." He abides with his people for ever. What priestly pretence, what crass ignorance, to speak of the priest's power to bring the Lord to the believer by pieces of bread and wine, when the Lord has been with the believer and dwelt within him for every day in the whole year!

It is, indeed, high time that the authority of the Word of God should be acknowledged as the test in regard to the monstrous assumptions of these self-constituted priests. Here are three or four typical quotations which are taken from the published writings of Ritualists and High Churchmen: "They (the priests) are peacemakers under Him, who carry on this work for Him, applying the precious Blood to the souls of men by the sacraments for the remission of sin." Again: "Learn to perceive Almighty God concealed for you in his priests." Again: "The priest, as far as his priesthood is concerned, is Christ Himself, the Sovereign and Eternal Priest." "The priest perpetuates Jesus Christ in our midst to endless ages; that is why we should go to him as Jesus Christ, and to Christ by him." All these statements are utterly false. There is not a particle of authority for these blasphemous expressions.

The New Testament and the truth of Christ's resurrection stand in direct opposition to these assertions. For priestly impudence, take the following:—"The Catholic Church was always in time (as well as in degree) before the Bible." "To hear the Church was to hear the Bible in its truest and only true sense." Again: "We take our religion from the Church which is living; then we prove it, if we will, from the Holy Bible." Once more: "Nor is it any infringement of the reverence due to the Bible, as God's Word, to declare openly and distinctly that Bible Christianity is an invention of the devil, having for its object to obstruct and defeat God's Word under the hypocritical pretence of love and zeal for his Word." Again: "A faith appealing to the Bible only can find no firm resting-place." Hearken to this: "The Crucifix should be the first lesson-book for their disciples, and the Holy Scriptures must never be put into the hands of unbelievers."

It is difficult to write calmly concerning these statements. They are absolutely false. The reason for these writings, which might be added to indefinitely, is obvious. They are intended to make a place for the priest; hence the unscrupulous attempt to undermine the authority of the Word and work of the Lord. Let us, at this point, hear the faithful words of the risen Lord: "Verily, verily I say unto you, he that heareth my Word, and believeth on Him that sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into the judgment, but is passed from death unto life."—John v. 24.

The Presbyterians of New York are planning a great evangelistic campaign during the coming winter. In connection therewith Mr. Moody recently conferred with the ministers, and addressed a great audience in the Academy of Music in the interest of the movement. It is proposed to raise 40,000dols to carry on the work, and Mr. Moody succeeded in getting 12,500dols in this first gathering.

Northfield Extension Work.

SIGNAL blessing is attending the work of Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, in his visits to some of the large cities of America. The Rochester Democrat, in speaking of the meeting in that city, says:

It looks as if a great wave of religious fervour was sweeping over Rochester and Western New York, from the increased interest in the Northfield extension movement, inaugurated by Evangelist Moody, and carried out in this city by a series of meetings held in the great auditorium of Central Church, addressed by the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of London, England. The London divine is certainly a power, for each meeting is larger than the one preceding it; and no matter, whether it is afternoon or evening, every seat is full.

A remarkable feature is the large number of busy men of all ages in attendance during the day, the sexes being about evenly divided in matter of attendance. Ministers from all denominations are among the congregation, and they come in quietly, taking a seat in some obscure corner, where they can hear the Word as expounded by the gifted Englishman; and in the front pews are many grey-haired men and women well known in the spiritual life of the city. It is evident that they are experiencing new enthusiasm and Divine inspiration through the earnest words of the young preacher. They hang upon his words, giving him the closest attention; and occasionally, as he waxes unusually eloquent, they remove their glasses and wipe away the moisture that has gathered there through the effect of the emotions revived or inspired by the speaker.

Chicago Bible Institute.

I SHALL be glad if readers of The Christian will ask God to pour out his Spirit in our work in the Bible Institute; that the coming Conference may be one of great power and blessing; that the Union Bible Classes I shall (D.V.) begin again the second week of October may be graciously visited by the presence and power of God as never before, and that Chicago may be profoundly stirred this winter, and brought to realize eternal things.

An awful deadness has settled down upon the city. There is a horrible materialism and temporizing indifference everywhere. There is little deep spiritual movement among Christians (except the aroused interest in Bible study among the few), and hardly any real conviction of sin. Men believe no longer in hell—the hell revealed in God's Word; nor do their preachers warn them of it.

Wealth and pleasure are the absolute end of the masses. There is no gainsaying it. And if we do not have a revival, an old-time awakening, from God Himself, we are gone. True, we expect 5,000 Christians in the Bible Classes again this fall; but what are they among the 2,000,000 of Chicago?

Evangelical Lay Preachers' Association (Islington District.)—This organization aims to send accredited Gospel preachers to any church, mission-hall, open-air band, or children's service in the district, and to band together for service members of all Evangelical churches who are desirous of helping needy causes, but lack the opportunity. So numerous have been the applications for speakers this summer, that some have had to be declined. Additional members are needed. Communications may be addressed to the hon. secretary, 4, Stradbroke Road, Highbury, London, N.

Evangelical Alliance Conference at Clifton.—The subjects announced for October 31 are: "The outpouring of the Spirit, consequent on the glorifying of Christ," "The Holy Ghost given to all believers for service," "The Son of God—his atonement for sinners." On November 1 a number of topics bearing on religious work will be considered, such as evangelistic work, pastoral intercourse with the people, present-day problems, and foreign missions. For November 2, the subjects fixed are: "The Day of Rest, as defined in Holy Writ," "The Faith of the Gospel in relation to the false teaching of the present day," and "Our Protestant Faith and Worship." The following are among those who are to take part:—Revs. W. T. A. Barber, J. E. Watts Ditchfield, E. L. Hamilton, F. B. Meyer, C. Moinet, W. H. Griffith Thomas, R. Wardlaw Thompson, Lord Kinnaird, and Dr. H. Grattan Guinness.

Studies in Zechariah:

Christ—Priest and King.

ZECHARIAH VI. 9-15.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

AT this point an interesting episode breaks in on this wonderful series of visions. From far-off Babylon, where the majority of the Jewish nation was still residing, a deputation of three Jews came to Jerusalem, bringing a present of gold and silver. This donation was evidently intended to aid the little band of returned exiles in their heroic work. Alas, it is still the way in which too many Christians do the work of God! They shrink from personal service; but are quite ready, in lieu of it, to give a subscription in aid of those who are sacrificing ease and emolument that they may give priceless personal service.

Zechariah was directed to take the gold and silver, and make a crown (or crowns). These on some public occasion, and with, perhaps, some little ceremony, were placed on the fair mitre, which, we have already seen, had been set on the High Priest's head.

It was a much more significant act than this bare recital of it suggests. These two offices, the sacerdotal and the regal, had been always kept jealously apart in Israel; and when King Uzziah had attempted to burn incense upon the altar of incense, the altercation which ensued in the holy place between himself and the priests, countersigned as their horror and indignation were by the rising of the brand of leprosy on his forehead, proved how stringent that separation was. But here the divinely commissioned prophet, by an unmistakable symbolic act, combined the two offices in the same individual. And, using a well-understood name for the Messiah, went on to say: Thus speaketh the Lord of Hosts, saying: "Behold, the man whose name is the Branch. He shall grow up out of his place (i.e. shall emerge from the obscurity of his early beginnings), and He shall build the Temple of the Lord; and He shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and He shall be a priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both—i.e., between these two offices,

THE PRIESTLY AND THE REGAL.

I. Notice this significant designation of the Lord Jesus. "The Branch." The family of David was like a decayed tree, the stump of which alone remains; but from so lowly and unlikely an origin, a shoot or scion would emanate, which would again become a noble forest tree, and perpetuate the memory and influence of the royal line. This imagery is familiar to more than one of the prophets, and, in every case, can only be applied to "Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham." (See Is. iv. 2, xi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 5.)

David's race had reached a low ebb, when Joseph and Mary went up into Judea. They could only afford to purchase two young pigeons, the gift of the poor, for the mother's thank-offering in the Temple. From that stock, however, the scion has grown into a noble tree, whose branches reach out to the ends of the earth, and whose fruit gives life and blessing to all mankind.

Through a branch the fulness of the Root is carried to the Fruit, which swells in ruddy beauty on its extremity, and presently falls into the hand of the wayfarer; so Jesus is the blessed channel of communication between the Fulness of God, and the thirsty wastes of human need. We sit under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit is sweet to our taste.

II. The combination in Christ of the Priestly and Kingly Offices. "He shall be a priest upon his throne." Man's nature demands a priest. Conscious of sin and defilement, he rears an altar wherever he pitches his tent, and, selecting one of his fellows, he separates him from the ordinary duties of life, and bids him stand as mediator between God and himself. (Cf. Judg. xvii. 7-10.)

If an argument were needed to prove the unity of the human family, it surely would be suggested by the universal distribution of temples and altars over the world, as though men were everywhere alike in this—that they know themselves to be sinful, and desire to find some way of propitiating and approaching the Almighty.

In the Levitical system, and, above all, in Jesus Christ, God has met this universal craving of the human heart. Indeed, no religion is destined to universal supremacy that does not provide for the consciousness of guilt, and reveal a merciful and faithful priest, appointed in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins, and bear gently with the ignorant and erring.

Man also requires a king. God had designed to meet this need by Himself being Israel's King, that they should not be "like other nations," but a peculiar people unto Him. But they said to Samuel: "We will have a king over us, that we also may be like the other nations, and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles." Man demands a leader, one whom he may admire and obey, from whom he may receive indisputable commands, and in whom his faculty of veneration may find satisfaction. The days when there was no king in Israel, and every man did what was right in his own eyes, were far from being either contented or prosperous.

How remarkable it is that the Kingship of Christ should have been so accentuated in his trial. It was the centre around which the storm raged.

PILATE CHALLENGED HIS CLAIMS:

"Art Thou a king, then?" and Jesus asseverated them: "Thou sayest that I am—a king." The faded purple robe flung over his shoulders, the reed in his hand, the mocking bending of the knee, the crown of thorns on his brow, were but the grotesque and heartless mockery of his claims. And when his sacred body was affixed to the cross, the title on the headpiece, written in the languages of learning, imperial power, and religion, attested that He was King of the Jews.

And since He has passed into the glory, He is still the Priest-King. Not Aaron, but Melchizedek, is the true type of our Saviour now. As Aaron, He made atonement and propitiation for sin; but as Melchizedek, He has sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. "This Melchizedek was King of Salem, and Priest of the Most High God."

As Priest, Jesus pleads the merit of his blood; as King, He exerts power on our behalf. As Priest, He pacifies the guilty conscience; as King, He sends thrills of his own victorious life into our spirits. As Priest, He brings us nigh to God; as King, he treads our enemies under his feet. It is of great importance to us all to think of our Saviour in this dual aspect. On the one hand, we get all the benefit of his Cross and Passion; on the other, all the benefit of his resurrection and session at the right hand of God. May it not be that the weakness of thy Christian life is due to the fact that thou hast viewed Him only in the light of Calvary, and hast not, with Stephen, seen Him seated at the right hand of the Majesty on High—a Prince as well as a Saviour—a Saviour because a Prince? "God hath exalted Him to be a Prince and a Saviour."

What majesty there is in these words: "He shall sit and rule upon his throne, and He shall be a Priest upon his throne!" Let all other beings stand; He sits. He sits because of his intrinsic dignity, because of his finished mediatorial work, because full of a calm expectancy that his foes shall be subdued under Him. The priests of Aaron's line stood day by day ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, the which could never take away sins; but He, "when He had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down at the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made the footstool of his feet."

Infinite woe has come to mankind through the reign of priests. No rule has been so intolerant, so capricious, so cruel, as that exercised by some of the pontiffs, or by priests, of one sort and another, through monarchs, who have been

THE CREATURES OF THEIR WILL.

This world will never be at rest, until it submits to the beneficent rule of the Lord Jesus, and acknowledges that the counsel of its peace emanates from the combination of these two offices in his Sacred Person.

III. As the Priest-King, Christ builds the Temple of God. Twice over this is affirmed; but what untold comfort the assurance must have brought when first addressed to that little band of exiles! Their temple site was strewn with ruins: it seemed almost hopeless to contend with those heaps of rubbish, impossible to rear a fabric worthy of the past and adequate for the future; but these words must have greatly heartened them. As the hand of Inspiration drew aside the veil, they beheld another and greater than either Joshua or Zerubbabel, working with them and for them, and bearing the chief responsibility in all the toils and labours of their new erection—He, not they. They would work with new energy and courage, knowing, as they did, that they were fellow-workers with God. What difficulty could daunt, what enemies thwart or frustrate, the work of his right hand?

If these words should be read by any who are losing heart because of the difficulties presented by their parish, their church, or the souls of their charge, let them be reassured, as they behold the trowel in the hands of the Priest-King; and let them be sure that He will succeed. They know not what He is doing, or using them to do. They are probably doing more than they know, and He is responsible for employing them, whether in the deep foundation-digging, or in the high storeys away in the sunny air. But let them not be discouraged or desert Him, lest He be compelled to summon others to help Him to perfect what they commenced.

The crowns of gold were put aside till the temple was completed, and then deposited there, as a memorial to the men who had formed the deputation; and an assurance was given that those who were far off should come to add their strength to that of the returned remnant.

The Spiritual Temple is rising through the ages, and includes the workmanship of Jew and Gentile, of bond and free, of those who are the children of privilege, and those who seemed outside the pale of salvation. "Remember that aforetime ye, the Gentiles in the flesh . . . . were, at that time, separate from Christ, alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise . . but now—ye are fellow-citizens with the saints . . —being built upon the foundation of the Apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus Himself being the chief Corner-stone, in whom the whole building, fitly framed together, groweth into a holy temple in the Lord."

Dublin Convention.

THE twenty-sixth annual Christian Convention was held at Dublin last week. The attendance was not quite so good as in former years. At the conversazione, on Monday evening, there were the usual hearty greetings and renewals of friendship.

At this first meeting, Rev. W. J. Clarke, D.D., Incumbent of St. Thomas's, Dublin, speaking on "The Epistle of Christ," emphasized the fact that, as the mountains receive the rain, not to retain it, but to pass it on to the valleys below, so the disciple, who is the epistle of Christ, can only be truly such if he passes on the grace received.

Rev. J. Denham Osborne, speaking on the "Wings and Hands" of Ezekiel's vision, said that the freedom of the wings presented a contrast to the prophet's fettered condition in captivity. Hands are the characteristic of manhood, and differentiate us from the beasts. The hand is the symbol of man's helpful contact with other things; and there is a danger of cultivating "wings" at the cost of "hands"—devotion at the expense of service. If we have to make choice between magnificence of wing and efficiency of hand, which ought the choice to be? We may soar as high as we please in meetings like these, for instance, but unless there is resulting in saving contact with our fellow-men, all will be in vain.

Rev. J. W. R. Campbell was singularly impressive on the subject of "The Master's Presence," and made suggestive use of the experience of the late Dr. Dale, when, during that eventful Easter-tide, he was so powerfully impressed with the sense of Christ being alive, that life henceforth became enlarged to him, and his new experiences found expression in his great book, "The Living Christ and the Four Gospels." The speaker, with characteristic thoughtfulness for his brethren in the country, reminded them of the presence of the Master among the scattered communities throughout the land.

Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas, of London, gave a stirring address on "Our Lord as a Model for Soul-winners," from his dealing with the woman of Samaria. First, he observed, Christ attracted the woman's heart, breaking down prejudice by asking for drink, thus making a revelation of love. Secondly, He interests her mind, arousing her curiosity, and gives her something to think about by speaking of "living water." This was a revelation of truth. Thirdly, He arouses the conscience. "Go call thy husband." This was a revelation of sin and law. Fourth, he reveals and the enjoyment afterwards of a precious Saviour. This was a revelation of grace. So our work as Christian workers is, first, with the heart; second, with the mind; third, with the conscience; and fourth, with the soul; and, if that work is performed in the power of the Holy Ghost, we shall have the fulness of the enjoyment of the grace of God in our own souls.

The Bible readings and addresses on the Bible, by Rev. C. H. Waller, D.D., were remarkably stimulating and helpful. "Jesus Christ our Pattern in relation to his Father" was traced as a subject through the four Gospels, and each Evangelist shown to give prominence to the fact that He did nothing of Himself, but what He saw the Father do; and we Christians have a right to take Him as a pattern for our lives in this respect, as we have the Spirit of adoption; and not one of us but may not only arise and go to his Father, but also avail himself of those exceeding great and precious promises whereby we become partakers of the Divine nature.

Dr. Waller's address on the prophet Jeremiah was intensely interesting. The speaker considered that there was no more interesting book as illustrating what is the meaning of inspiration than Jeremiah. Upon the question of how the Scriptures came into being, this prophet throws immense light. The four greater prophets belong to a state of national transition: Isaiah foresaw the fall of the northern kingdom, and the destruction of Samaria; Jeremiah foresaw the destruction of the Jewish empire, and was, in fact, the prophet "to the Jew first and also to the Gentile." With the exception of one short prophecy, all his utterances were delivered in Israel. Ezekiel prophesied in the land of captivity; Daniel lived to see the return. So these four great prophets carry us over from the time of the Jews to the time of the Gentiles. The speaker remarked in passing that there was a considerable analogy in this respect between the group of four prophets and the four evangelists, the latter carrying us on to the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus. Jeremiah stands especially at the parting of the ways. His prophetic life occupied a period of nearly forty years. His was from his own countrymen, constantly delivering a most unpatriotic message, viz., that they should surrender to their enemies. His book seems tangled, yet it is a work most carefully edited. It was written by two prophets, for at the end of the fifty-first chapter we read, "Thus far are the words of Jeremiah." The words following are not the words of Jeremiah. In the twenty-fourth chapter the good figs represent the captives taken away; the "naughty figs," Zedekiah and those left.

The later prophet gives the history of the bad figs, and then comes back to the good ones; and, after thirty-seven years, Jeconiah is released. The speaker would divide the book of Jeremiah into four periods, as follows:—First, there are twenty chapters, ending with the passage in which Jeremiah curses the day that he was born, and is chiefly pure prophecy. Second, a mainly historical portion, extending from the twenty-first to the thirty-sixth chapter, ending with the story of the roll. This is the portion which gives to Jeremiah the idea of being "tangled." It is mainly historical, but not in chronological order. It is the only portion that is not in historical order. The third portion, to the forty-fourth chapter, is straight history; and the fourth, from the forty-fifth chapter, chiefly concerns the prophet's utterances against the Gentiles, Egypt and Babylon. The twenty-first to the thirty-sixth chapter is the portion which should be specially studied. Why should Israel surrender to the Babylonian? Because of the iniquity of its kings. "Pastors" in Jeremiah means the kings in their relation as shepherds of God's people.

Rev. Griffith Thomas gave a suggestive Bible reading on "The Power of Faith," based on portions of Hebrews xi. Rev. James Ervine, of Newcastle, followed with a tender address on "The Pitifulness of God." Pity grows, through the animal world, good men, and angels, until we reach the heart of the highest, the supremely Pitiful.

Dr. Waller, in an address on

said he had begun really to study the Bible thirty-nine years ago. It is certainly "interesting," but we must never forget it is the Word of the living God, able to make us wise unto salvation through Christ Jesus. The study of the Bible is an art, and will occupy a lifetime—yea, he believed, eternity!

Addresses were delivered by Revs. A. J. Palmer, T. T. Matthews (L.M.S.), and Henry Montgomery. The last-named conducted, in his own earnest way, consecration and evangelistic meetings, which were well attended, and at which the manifest presence of the Holy Ghost was a special feature. Great regret was expressed, and much sympathy, with Rev. Peter Thompson, of London, one of the appointed speakers, who was unable to attend owing to the sudden illness of Mrs. Thompson. Another regrettable incident of a different character was the injudiciousness of one of the speakers, in going rather out of his way to disparage a sister Church. Rev. T. T. Matthews, of Madagascar, had a packed house to hear his intensely interesting story of God's work in that island.

The Evangelists' Conference.

SOME AFTER IMPRESSIONS.

TO me the recent conference of evangelists was a day of enjoyment and help beyond expectation. As Mr. Morgan said, the conference might have dealt with subjects lying deeper. But the frank criticism with genial exchange of views was, nevertheless, most refreshing.

In general, there was a solemn tone of earnestness and conviction. The men meant what they said, even when in disagreement. And there was hardly one—not one I think—in whose criticism or defence did not lay a good deal of honest truth. The calmer light of afterthought will, perhaps, show this.

One speaker maintained that reports of missions were often exaggerated, and he was obliged to deduct 30 per cent. A defender stated that, if true, this was a terrible sin, but naturally he could not prove that no reports were exaggerated. The real fact is, that the necessity for writing reports, or the custom of speaking of one's work, lays a man open to the temptation of putting things in the brightest light possible. The wish is father to the thought, and often, quite unconsciously, reports are painted couleur de rose. And soberer natures have ground for criticism, and that criticism should

CALL ALL TO GREATER CAREFULNESS.

The same critic objected to speaking of missions as "a good time." To his ears, this implied "a good time" to the evangelist only, and he thought it did not give due honour to God. But surely this is making a man "an offender for a word." Most understand the expression to mean "a time of blessing." Some maintained that an evangelist should not be judged by the number of professed conversions under his preaching. Two brethren seemed, on the other hand, to declare that this was a just and fair test. Surely alone it is not a sufficient test. An equally necessary and often surer test is a man's heart, life, and character. You will know him often better on his knees than on the platform.

Another objected to appeals to emotions. The conscience should be awakened by the setting forth of the Truth. Very rightly, several evangelists argued in reply that every part of man's complex nature should be used as a channel to reach his heart. Every lawful means, too, should be used to bring men to Christ—appeal, influence, persuasion. And yet, surely, the objection was not out of place. For the emotions may be aroused, or the intellect convinced, without the heart being touched. The lesson is, plough deep, applying again and again the Word of God.

By another speaker it was held that a man's experience should always be in advance of his teaching. But others felt that a man who was setting forth faithfully God's standard of truth, and thought himself to be in advance of it, or even equal with it, would be in a dangerous state of self-confidence. Is not the lesson here that mere doctrine hardens? The preacher must preach nothing that he has not first applied to himself, and his life must be a constant pressing forward.

It was counselled, and, to my mind, very wisely, that evangelists should abstain from references to "their work," and the numbers of conversions they had had. However the story of one's own personal effort may be told, even where glory is given to the Lord, the telling of it may subtly minister to self, even THOUGH IT BE RELIGIOUS SELF.

As to speaking of the number of cases of conversion (whatever phrase is used), is it not wiser—if speaking of them at all—to say "professed conversions," or to use some similar term? Spirits cannot be tested in one night's meeting, and often a long time is required before what is really the Spirit's work is manifest. Judging by all evangelistic missions, experience tells us that of 100 people professing to accept Christ, there are generally a proportion of "mere professors," as well as of those really "born again." Hence they are not all converted.

Many of these, and other defects, stumbling-blocks, and hindrances have been, in my own experience, unexpressed; and it was a real help to hear them ventilated and dealt with by men of God in an honest and upright spirit. There was a great deal of sober, sound, sanctified sense in the words of the evangelists in conference. I can truly say that the morning and afternoon meetings were the most happy and helpful I have attended for a long time, and I express herewith my sincere thanks to the three generous conveners who have in this matter ministered to the refreshment of saints.

Congresses on Moral Reform.

ALL interested in the cause of moral reform have reason to rejoice with Mrs. Josephine E. Butler at the results of two great International Congresses recently held at Brussels and Geneva.

The Brussels Congress sat from September 4 to 8, and was attended by delegates from all parts of the world. The invitation was issued to doctors, jurisconsults, and all having special competence to speak upon the question of the State regulation of vice. The latter category was understood to include abolitionists, who attended in some numbers in their private capacity, it being impossible from the terms of the questions submitted that the abolitionist societies could be officially represented. These questions, six in number, were distinctly regulationist in form, as was also the letter of invitation. The leading regulationists of the world were present at the Congress, and the following countries were represented by governmentally-appointed delegates:—Germany, Austria, Bosnia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chili, Denmark, Spain, United States, France (eighteen delegates), England, Honduras, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Norway, Paraguay, Persia, Peru, Holland, Argentine Republic, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Sweden, Switzerland, and Belgium.

MOST OF THE WAR OFFICES of the world sent delegates, including our own. The head of the large delegation from Japan was Professor Dohi, the medical chief of the terrible Yoshiwara at Tokio, where 7,000 poor women, many of them very young, are devoted to a life of vice, supervised after the European fashion! Never in the history of the evil system of regulation of vice by the State, had so complete a gathering taken place of regulationist leaders, and yet (mark the wonders of the Divine working!) it was just here that, in a manner surprising alike to abolitionists and regulationists, was shown, as never before, the onward march of the principles that Mrs. Butler has consecrated her life to uphold.

Professor Fournier, the medical head of the system in Paris, the centre and headquarters of regulation since its commencement, was loudly cheered by the abolitionists on a number of occasions. He is a man much better than the system with which he is identified, and his admissions again and again did more for the abolitionist cause than any of his speeches. Mr. Jonathan Hutchinson, the celebrated English surgeon, was present, and spoke strongly as against Government interference. He instanced the Society of Friends as a proof that cleanness of life and longevity were compatible.

Miss Leppington, of Leamington, was listened to with much respect, as she gave a powerful indictment of regulation; powerful none the less for the gentle form in which it was put. Dr. Birkbeck Nevins, the most venerable figure in the Congress, gave an address packed with figures on the abolitionist side, and French, German, Swiss, Dutch, and Danish abolitionists were allowed the fullest freedom. The result was that, although a resolution in favour of regulation was proposed by one of the delegates of the Russian Government, it was not carried; and similar resolutions were laid aside in like manner. The resolutions that were carried were unanimously agreed to, and referred to the better moral education and protection of the young, and like matters.

THE ANNUAL CONGRESS

of the International Federation for the Abolition of State Regulation of Vice has just been held at Geneva, from September 18 to 22, and was a time of much rejoicing. Mrs. Butler, who seemed specially upheld for the time, was present throughout. Probably the largest meeting on the question ever held took place on the evening of the 21st, when the great Salle de la Reformation was packed with an enthusiastic audience of some 3,000 of all classes, men and women, rich and poor.

Doubtless one great secret of the success of these Congresses has been the earnest, praying bands, chiefly of women, who have for years pleaded at the throne of grace on behalf of their suffering sisters. Switzerland, especially, has been noted for these praying women. It has also been a matter of deep interest to the present writer to meet at various times in happy fellowship with numbers of Protestant pastors interested in this subject—Swiss, French, German, Dutch, and Belgian. It was to shake hands and converse at this convention with the silver-haired Madame Merle-d'Aubigné, widow of the well-known historian of the Reformation. Two of her sons are engaged in active Gospel work in France, and another initiated the wonderful hydraulic system of Geneva, the most remarkable of its kind, by which practically the whole of the Rhone river passes through eighteen huge turbines, and is made to supply water, and light, and power to the town at a marvellously cheap rate.

It was also a great privilege to meet at this Congress Pasteur Rochat, the President of the Swiss Temperance Association. This Association is on distinctly spiritual and Scriptural lines. Its leaders do not say that moderate drinking is in itself wrong, but seek primarily to save the drunkard; and to that end invite all Christians to become abstainers, in order that they may help those enslaved by alcohol. The Association has within its ranks 4,782 reclaimed drunkards, and Pasteur Rochat said that in the Canton de Vaud, one of the chief wine-growing cantons of Switzerland, 82 per cent. of the pasteurs were total abstainers, the proportion being the same as amongst Nonconformist ministers in England!

Is Life Worth Living?

1 John iii. 16.

(By an Invalid for Forty Years.)

Life has been very hard to me
From earliest years; but could I see
Nought better in what is to be—
Yet I would live.

Save that of self to know no will,
To eat, to drink, to take one's fill
Of pleasure's cup, ne'er having ill—
This is not life.

To live is to love, to love to die
To self, to all not pure and high.
To care for others tenderly—
This is to live.

To bring the prisoner forth to light,
To raise the fallen in the fight,
To die while battling for the right—
This, this is life.

Earth's fevered breath, by plenteous shower,
To fragrance turns in eve's still hour;
And love to the sick heart gives power—
And sweetens life.

If I might dry no sorrow's tear,
Nor seek the burdened heart to cheer,
Or no more care for others here—
Then death were sweet.

Yet could my love make strong to bear,
Or ease in aught life's fret and care,
Just making it for one more fair—
'Twere sweeter life.

But if love's words, thought light of here,
From the blue heavens should sound more clear,
And, clarion-voiced, wake death's cold ear—
Then I would die.

A "Tent Conference."

THE "Evangelistic Rally," or Conference, at the American tent, Clapham, on Tuesday and Wednesday last week, was blessed to large concourses of earnest hearers, among whom were many who had been converted or stimulated to aggressive effort in connection with the South London Tent campaign.

The gatherings came at a timely moment. Not only were they calculated to fan the

but they supplied a course of helpful instruction, guiding the young Christian life, in its vigour and enthusiasm, to form a right estimate of the value of some of the great verities of religion, which in these days of shallowness are too often neglected.

The Clapham tent, like its companions in canvas, is pitched in an excellent position, just off a crowded thoroughfare. The vivid scarlet announcement, which stretches across the road, directs public attention to the huge erection. As a place of religious resort, anything more unconventional could scarcely be imagined; a fact which, according to general testimony, accounts for a great deal of its popularity. The interior strikes the eye as a maze of dull drab woodwork, amongst which the fading vermilion of the folding seats affords a relieving splash of colour. The floor is simply the rough earth, strewn with sawdust and ashes, and nubbly with occasional macadam. The working classes make themselves thoroughly at home in this strange cathedral, manifesting a keen appetite for Gospel truth. The spirit of the "rally" was well illustrated by the calm satisfaction with which certainly 1,000 people stood and sang, during a pelting rain-storm which soaked through the roof, each of the many hymns in the selection on the subject of "Sunlight in the Soul."

On Tuesday morning, Mr. A. Garstin, who presided, opened with some suggestive thoughts on instancing as such the supreme love of Christ, as manifested in his death on the Cross, the lamentable condition of the masses under the power of Satan, and the overcoming might and resources of the Saviour, placed at the disposal of his people. The blessed hope of the Lord's return, and other incentives, were dwelt upon by subsequent speakers, and the meeting closed with praise.

In the afternoon, Mr. Ransome Wallis presided; and, after a pointed word from Pastor Douglas, who said that it was possible to overstate many things, but not the power and riches of Christ, nor the glories of heaven, Mr. Henry Varley spoke on "The Value of the Soul." God's estimate of it was shown by the value of the sacrifice offered for its redemption. He gave his Son. It was shown again at Pentecost by the gift of the Holy Ghost, who made the believer's heart his temple. With analytical remarks and earnest exhortation, and pleading with his hearers to eschew cramped and narrow conceptions of the glorious Gospel, not to "live in tiny surroundings," Mr. Varley urged believers to seek, nobly and wholeheartedly, to lead sinners to Christ. The meeting closed with a spirited appeal from Mr. Van de Venter, who supervises the children's services in connection with tents.

The evening service commenced with testimonies, given amid a scene of remarkable enthusiasm, by new converts and their friends. One brother spoke of six workshop comrades brought to Christ; others told of friends, of neighbours, of entire families being saved. Indeed, the stories related were kaleidoscopic in their

WEALTH OF REVIVAL INCIDENT.

Mr. Varley gave another impressive address on Galatians iv. 19, setting forth the power of the resurrection life in transforming the ideas of men, and creating a character instinct with divine ambitions to be like Christ. After pungent words of stimulus and warning addressed to Christian workers, the speaker enlarged on the possibilities of usefulness that lay before those who proved, experimentally how wonderfully the indwelling spirit made it easy to do the will of the Father. Mr. Charles Inglis summed up a vigorous address on hindrances to success, by observing in terse terms that to be filled with the Holy Ghost meant, in a word, victory over the world, the flesh, and the devil.

Wednesday morning's session was characterized by rousing addresses by Mr. Leonard Weaver and other speakers. In the afternoon Mr. T. B. Miller, who presided, gave wise counsel to converts, happily illustrating their new responsibilities by a comparison with the duties of a recruiting sergeant. The inestimable value of the Bible, and the importance of systematic study of its sacred pages, were dwelt on by Pastor Fuller Gooch, who considered that one reason why some churches and chapels were empty, and why such insignificant results followed the efforts put forth, was to be found in the relegation of the Word to a subordinate position. Moreover, people prefer something not quite so plain and clear in its exposure of sin and its call to a pure life. It brought wrong-doers into judgment, it revealed Christ, it was "the quick and living word discerning ('criticizing') the thoughts and intents of the heart." The speaker urged his hearers to prayerful study, avoiding the frivolous literature of the day.

Mr. R. C. Morgan, referring to the question raised at Monday's Conference of evangelists at Aldersgate Street, as to whether preachers should appeal to the emotions or the conscience, said that prior to the question of how, came that of what they should preach. The evangelist must deliver the truth of Him who was free from all mixture of error. Mr. Morgan pointed out the primary truth that the sin of the devil, whereby he fell from his place as a Shining One, was his unholy ambition to rule, to the exclusion of God. That spirit was the essence of sin. It was reproduced in Adam and Eve, who stepped to the serpent's side, and manifested their sin in exactly the same way as he. Tracing the rebellion of the race, and the mission of Christ to "destroy the works of the devil," the speaker concluded his review of first principles by a brief analysis of the Divine methods of conquest as shown forth in Scripture—not by a demonstration of force, but by gentleness, emptying Himself of his royal prerogative and power.

The meeting concluded with a pithy address by Rev. J. H. Tuckwell, who defended the Bible from infidel attack, and contended for its exact correctness of description in every particular.

At night the tent was filled, in spite of a severe thunderstorm. A notable address was delivered by Dr. McKilliam, who spoke vigorously on for Christian service. He instituted a comparison of the relations that exist between God and the worker, and those between master and servant, adducing Scriptural quotations and illustrations of the earthly servant's duties in varied departments of labour, as he toils in the strength, and according to the all-seeing wisdom and the beneficent directions, of the Heavenly Master. A good servant labours not by fits and starts, but with sustained perseverance, "always abounding in the work of the Lord." With some pathetic references to the ultimate reward, Dr. McKilliam alluded feelingly to the encouraging signs of God's presence in the tent work.

The meeting subsequently concluded at a late hour. To quote the words of an onlooker, "I left at half-past ten, but they were still 'going strong,' many of the people testifying to blessing received."

Falmouth.—His Majesty Oscar, King of Sweden and Norway, has sent two handsome flags to Mr. J. C. Badger for use at the Falmouth Branch of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society. A letter from the King's private secretary conveys his Majesty's best wishes. Mr. Badger is a popular friend of Jack's, and has entered upon his thirteenth year of mission work amongst seamen of various nationalities at Falmouth.

The Gospel by the Sea.—II.

By Mr. CHAS. COOK.

SOUTHSEA was crowded! Thousands were promenading the sea front! The weather was charming, and it was an ideal evening for the open-air preacher.

Presently the sounds of music broke upon my ear; and at one corner of Southsea Common I found a good choir, led by an orchestral band, who were playing one of the newest of the many charming melodies contained in "New Hymns and Solos."

Our friends hailed from the Bible Christian Chapel, and I learned that they had been holding services there for some years. An earnest, elderly brother was in charge, and, with his brethren, set forth the simple Gospel in the simplest manner. Many were attracted, and stayed throughout the meeting, which lasted from 6.30 till 9.20.

Towards the close the minister came up, and as twilight deepened into darkness I gave the closing word, and was followed by one who was seeking the Lord, and who eventually, through a letter sent and Gospel booklets enclosed, was found rejoicing in Christ.

One wondered why other churches did not follow the example set them by the Bible Christians. This was the only Gospel meeting I could see on or near the sea shore, though I was glad to find the tent on the Common

FILLED WITH LISTENERS.

Ramsgate has always been a favoured place for the Divine institution of open-air preaching; whilst in the adjoining town of Margate—save for the children's services on the sands—it has been difficult to obtain a large gathering in the open air.

Here is Ramsgate and her reception of the Gospel up to date. Rev. C. W. Williams, Vicar of St. George's, has a magnificent tent pitched within a few yards of the sea in the harbour yard; and twice on Sundays, and twice also during the week, does he gloriously set forth the Lord Jesus as the remedy for sin.

As I looked in the tent one Sunday evening—and it was well crowded—my very soul rejoiced as I listened to his plain and thrilling words. I thanked God for our beloved brother's testimony. The tent is simply seated by planks on fish-trunks; but the lack of luxury in furnishing, is no hindrance to hungry souls, who have discovered the richness of the spiritual menu provided. Besides this, the Salvation Army occasionally are seen upon the sands, whilst Mr. Nott also regularly holds his meetings there.

But the meeting which particularly struck me was that held by the friends of Cavendish Baptist Church on Sunday afternoon. In the days gone by, this church, under the lead of Rev. Robert Wood (now of Scarborough), was wont, during the week, and always on the Sunday afternoon, to carry the Gospel to the people on the sands, and it has ever been a flourishing church. I have no doubt myself that her in the open air is not the least important factor in her continued success, and the worthy successor of Mr. Wood—Rev. T. Hancocks—may be seen, assisted by an able band of helpers and preachers, on the sands on the week-day and the Sunday.

But at this particular meeting quite a large number of church members were present; the congregation was large, the singing good, the addresses bright, and the whole scene inspiriting on this sunny Sunday afternoon.

Nor was it only that Christ was preached as the Redeemer, but the sinner was pathetically warned of the danger of disobedience and the sin of unbelief. Sitting still all through the meeting (for I was away for a rest and holiday), I had time to look about me, and, whilst taking mental notes of the good things said, for future use and service, I noticed three striking things.

At the very feet of the speakers was a man at full length on the sands soundly asleep. He was there when the first hymn began; we left him there after the benediction had been uttered. Praise had ascended and prayers had been offered; warnings had been sounded and the Gospel had been spoken—but he was dead to all. Asleep!

Brethren, there are thousands such in our meetings, out of door and in; may it be ours, empowered by the Holy Spirit, to cry, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light!"

A little boy was playing near the sleeper, and though it was the Lord's Day, he had his spade, and was building his little castles, and ornamenting them with stones in his own small way. He caused no interruption, and was so quiet withal that one could not find it in one's heart either to scold or stop him. He could neither understand the music, nor comprehend the matter spoken.

Alas! are there not many such, who listen, but they understand not; who hear, but divine not the eternal message which we deliver? Contented with earthly toys, they appreciate not the joys that are everlasting.

Reclining in an invalid's carriage at the top of the breakwater was a young man, apparently in the last stage of consumption.

DEATH HAD MARKED HIM

for his own; one could hardly expect him to last a week. He was listening intently, aye! anxiously, as though, mayhap, it was for the last time, and one wondered if one so near the borderland was meet for the great change.

Oh, that we preachers could thus look into the faces of those who come to listen! Many are really anxious for a simple message that may help them into the Kingdom, and many, perhaps, are listening for the last time. Let us appreciate our glorious opportunities, and bestir our brethren in the ministry whose voices are never heard—as was their Master's—in the open air.

There are many other churches represented in Ramsgate; and, as it was whispered, there were some empty seats in them. I wondered if it was because they may have forgotten the command: "Go ye out, and compel them to come in."

I spent the evening with Mr. Hancocks, and had difficulty in finding a seat in his handsome and capacious church; and when he announced that, at the close of the service at eight o'clock, there would be an open-air meeting on the quay, I felt impelled to go and help them; and, till 9.30, a huge crowd of locals and visitors gathered round the singers and the preachers, and even at the close were loth to leave.

Jewish Mission in Paris.—Mr. L. C. Mamlock, of Paris, writes: "Whilst poor France is just now sorely tried, and is suffering from the effects of unbelief, and an anti-Jewish spirit is raging around us, the Lord has enabled us, without let or hindrance, to continue to testify and to preach the Gospel to the Jews. To encourage us in our work, the Lord has again blessed our labours, in the conversion of a Jewish commercial traveller, whose acquaintance I made some years ago, and to whom I preached Christ and Him crucified. He became fully convinced of the truth, desired Christian instruction, and a few days ago, on his return to Paris, he requested me to prepare him for baptism. I had no reason to refuse; and, accordingly, he was baptized at the British Embassy Church, Rue d'Aguesseau, on Wednesday, September 20. Please note my new address, 14. Rue Desrenaudes, Paris."

The Baptist "Autumnal."

ENTHUSIASTIC GATHERINGS AT LEEDS.

[BY OUR OWN REPRESENTATIVE.]

THERE has for some time past been a dread suspicion—and more than that—among Baptists that their denomination is numerically declining, especially having regard to the increase in the population of our large towns. This is said to be particularly the case in Yorkshire; but, if we might judge from the enthusiasm displayed at the Autumnal meetings held last week at Leeds, we should say there is sufficient interest and vigour among the Baptists of Yorkshire yet to make a decided and encouraging advance—that is, if the enthusiasm be carried home and imparted to the congregations from which the audiences were drawn.

Allowance must, no doubt, be made for the presence in the meetings of a strong Methodist element, attracted by the place upon the programme of the names of Revs. Hugh Price Hughes and C. H. Kelly. All the better, if the "fire" of the one denomination should energize into still more vigorous life the latent forces of the other.

Tuesday and Friday were occupied with the claims of the Missionary Society, while the home work of the Union filled the hours of the intervening days. Commencing at the right end, sermons were preached, at the abnormally early hour of 7 a.m., to young men and young women, by Revs. J. M. Logan (Bristol), and G. Hawker (London), in two of the city chapels, in which were pressed home the lessons and principles which our Lord set forth when He said: "I must work the works of Him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work."

At ten o'clock a valedictory service was held to bid farewell to a party of outgoing missionaries, and several of them feelingly spoke of their sense of privilege and responsibility in going forth as messengers of salvation to those who know it not. Next, a was delivered by Rev. J. G. Greenhough (Leicester), which for point and pathos could hardly be excelled. Alike with Rev. R. J. Campbell (Brighton), who preached in the afternoon, Mr. Greenhough laid stress upon the cultivation of personal spiritual life: "If you are to spread the light, it must burn brightly in your own hearts and lives; and the work will languish and fail as soon as ever the fire within you sinks low;" or, as Mr. Campbell expressed the same idea, in St. John's words, "What we have seen and heard, that declare we." Three brief Apostolic prayers were selected as especially appropriate: "We wish above all things that you may prosper and be in health, even as your soul prospereth." "The Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men." "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope."

Health, love, and hope were keywords of the address. The speaker drew no couleur-de-rose picture of a missionary's life. Physical conditions, born of climate and separation from home and friends; mental depression arising from the prejudice, misunderstanding, or even malice of those among whom they labour; spiritual ennui and disappointment at long-deferred results or apparent failure—all these oppress the spirit of the worker at one time or another; but each is provided for in the prayers above quoted, and the God to whom they were addressed is always near to succour and to heal. "You are going out," he said, "to the noblest work in which a man can engage, for it is the work in which the Divine One spent the whole of his earthly life.

WHAT A MISSIONARY'S LIFE IS LIKE.

Some of you know it by brave and patient experience, and the experience will come to all before they have drawn the ploughshare far. Life in the tropical regions, to which most of you go, is only luxurious and pleasant in the imagination of those who have never tried it. The near actualities speedily dispel the enchantments of the distant view. All of you will have to endure countless irritations and oppositions and sights which make the heart sad and weary. Some of you will be in journeyings and perils often; you will know toilsome days and sleepless nights, and if you are spared the more formidable hardships, if your lives are not put in daily or frequent jeopardy, all of you will, at least, have to suffer that trial which is inevitable in the lot of a missionary—the lingering pain of loneliness. Every man in the foreign field is, more or less, like the Master, treading the winepress alone. You are not fit for this work unless God keeps that light in you shining to the end; unless you are always listening for the sounds of Pentecost, and watching for the morning; unless every day you feel a singing in your hearts like this:

> Thy saints in all this glorious war
> Shall conquer though they're slain;
> They see the triumph from afar,
> And shall with Jesus reign.

In those seasons, when the feelings of distance and solitude oppress you most, you may always find some comfort in the thought that you are compassed about by innumerable prayers. If you could hear one-hundredth part of them, as they are heard in heaven, you would never again wrong yourselves and us by grieving over imagined neglect. We pray that you may be endued with all the patience and the abounding hopefulness of Jesus Christ. We pray that you may see great things done, and have your part in doing them. We pray that you may sow in faith, and reap in joyous measure, and that now and always you may win the 'Well done!' of Him above, whose steps you follow and whose commission you bear."

Rev. J. H. SHAKESPEARE, M.A.
Secretary of the Baptist Union.

From a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, W.

A meeting similar in character and purpose was held on Thursday afternoon in connection with Zenana work, leave being taken of several ladies going forth to work among the women of India.

The great missionary meeting in the Town Hall at night was an inspiring occasion, and was presided over by Sir John Barran, who proudly described himself as "one of the oldest Baptists in Leeds, who perhaps had been connected with the Society longer than any living resident in the city." This is a record he might have legitimately enlarged upon, but with commendable restraint he paid tribute to the honoured names of other days, whose memories he cherished, and whose works do follow them. He was supported by Rev. John Bell (Congo), who feelingly appealed for increased financial support to the Society. Another missionary speaker was Rev. C. E. Wilson, of Serampore College, who gave a cheering report of the work of God in that city, where William Carey baptized his first convert.

The event of the evening was the masterly address of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, who traced the history of Jesuitism with a view of showing its paralysing effect upon individual thought and action. He described, as the most awful fact in Europe, affecting, at least indirectly, the prospects of every missionary society, and the work of God in every land, the fact that, after a long struggle of three centuries, the Jesuits had captured the entire machinery of the Latin Church.

AS TO THE MISSIONARY OUTLOOK

of to-day, he trusted that the Free Churches would never make the mistake of the seventeenth century, which nearly destroyed Protestantism. Instead of carrying the war into the enemy's country, Protestants of that century spent their time in quarrelling with one another. Unless Christians quarrel with the devil, they are sure to quarrel among themselves; but, thank God, the fighting is all over now, and the fact that representatives of so many Churches are associated and feel quite at home with each other, is a glorious sign of the times. "'We are not divided; all one body we.' Other people sing it; we act it." An Italian Protestant pastor, who said the great curse of Protestantism in Italy had been the disunion in face of the apparent unity of Rome, had asked permission to translate the Free Church Catechism, that all the Italian nation might see that Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, and Presbyterians really believed essentially the same Gospel. By such means as this the main source of their weakness was passing away altogether.

If Tuesday was considered a full day, was more so, meetings being held at 9, 10.15, 2.30; and no fewer than three more in the evening. The morning session in Oxford Place Chapel (which the Methodists had generously placed at the disposal of the Union, as well as its schoolroom, during the entire week, for writing, post-office, and other accommodation) had for its programme an address from the president (Dr. Clifford), sundry resolutions on public questions, and "other business." But when it is said that the eloquence of the Doctor extended over nearly two hours, it will be understood that "other business" received but minor attention. It would be impossible to give within these limits even a cursory glance at such a compendium of brilliant rhetoric and sober sense.* But it struck a chord of hopefulness in many an evangelical breast to listen to the speaker's earnest plea for a

WEDNESDAY

"RETURN TO PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN FAITH."

He scouted the idea of Christianity being "played out," regarding it not as an institution, but as "the energy that creates institutions." Christ Himself said little about organizations, but much of ideas; nothing as to forms or moulds of faith—much of repentance; He never referred to temples and synagogues as being necessary for worship, but insisted upon sincerity of heart. The disciples were not pedants, but men; not machinists, but missionaries. The religion of Jesus is always individualistic, appealing direct to the conscience and the will; to individual reason and judgment. It is in this far removed from Romanism, which seeks to enslave the minds of its devotees. Dr. Clifford dealt, further, with the reverse side of truth—the relation of the Christian to his fellow-men, and here he was quite at home in his own forceful way.

* The address is published as a pamphlet (2d.) by Veale & Co., 31, Cursitor Street, E.C.

This led up to a strong expression of opinion as to the state of affairs in South Africa, and so paved the way for the resolution that followed, moved by Rev. Samuel Vincent (Plymouth), which has been described, by the way, as "framed so as not to cause dissension, and so meant nothing!" But it was a reasonable appeal to Government to extend its forbearance, and to try all legitimate means to avert war.

Other resolutions dealt with the Drink Traffic and l'affaire Dreyfus.

Dr. Parker preached in the afternoon to an overflowing congregation of 2,000, while more than as many again had to swallow their disappointment at not being able to get inside the building. His subject was "Our Lord Jesus Christ;" tracing the term through the New Testament, as showing alike the discipline and the consolations of Christ. Christians must not hobnob with the unbeliever, or catch the measles of the infidel's folly; it is their duty to love the Lord with all their hearts, minds, and strength. People sometimes talk as if they were forced to be Christians. There is no force except the greatest of all forces, the compulsion of the love of Christ. Our choice is voluntary; we have the chance of being infidels, and do not accept it; of seeing all the infidelities which had ever strutted across the stage of life, and one by one we reject them. Many of us know something of doubt and fear, of infidelity, and possibly of atheism. We have seen what those things could do, and summarily renounce the whole of them. Our cry is "Jesus Christ, my Lord and my God." Ministers have no right to take their doubts and fears, their spiritual indigestions, into the pulpit. The doctor then delivered himself of very modified approval of demonstrations (which he had "outlived")—in the sense that they must be the outcome, and not the motive force, of steady perseverance in the Christian life all the year round. He heard young men boasting that they would go through fire and water for their mothers, but refused to gratify them as much as to go home an hour earlier at night. There are people everywhere waiting for some great opportunity, and failing the while in the fulfilment of daily duties. They want the sound of trumpets and the beating of drums. He did not believe in genius if it were not translatable into some deeds of every-day kindness, and the sweet civilities of life. We must not be content with great demonstrations and the waving of banners; but see also to the little simple tasks of household life on the lines laid down by our Lord Jesus Christ.

A WORKING MEN'S MEETING

filled the Town Hall in the evening, when such important topics as the Transvaal Crisis, Religious Equality, National Education, and the Relations of Church and State, were forcibly and tersely touched upon by the chairman (Mr. A. E. Hutton, M.P.), who was followed by Rev. E. G. Gange (Regent's Park), on "Baptist Principles"; Rev. G. R. Thorne (Wolverhampton), on "Total Abstinence"; and Rev. J. Wilson (Woolwich), on "The Strength of the Free Churches." We only wish the audience had been made up more exclusively of the working men for whom it was intended, in view of the importance of the topics, and the excellent treatment they received; but, as the last speaker humorously suggested, there was a "Baptist look" about the meeting, and the men looked "suspiciously like Baptist delegates!"

Simultaneously with this gathering, another, equally notable, was held in South Parade Chapel, for young people, addressed by Dr. Clifford, as chairman, and Revs. W. Knight Chaplin (London), G. H. James (Derby), and P. H. Smith (Northampton); and yet a further special service at Farsley, at which Rev. J. Thomas (Liverpool) was the preacher.

Each speaker contributed his liberal share to the supply of good and useful words which made for the stimulus and edification of the several congregations.

It was impossible to spend every day at such high pressure, so on the engagements eased off somewhat, being confined (except the missionary farewell already mentioned) to forenoon and evening session. At an early hour, however, a breakfast was given to celebrate the of Rev. Chas. Williams, of Accrington, whose portrait we place before our readers. His long and useful ministry was gratefully referred to, both in speech and in an illuminated address, which was presented, on behalf of the Union, in appreciation of the many services that he has rendered to it.

Then came the more serious business of the day in the second union session. The two chief addresses were those of Professor Medley (Rawdon College) on "The Consecrated Life: its Opportunities and Influence," and Rev. J. G. Greenhough on "Denominational Loyalty." With both these utterances we hope to deal more fully in our next issue, as they deserve more than a passing reference.

The rest of the session was claimed by Rev. J. H. Shakespeare (secretary) for the Centenary Fund. The denomination has pledged itself to raise £250,000 during the next six months. In answer to all criticism of such a course stood the facts that their reserve fund was exhausted to its last penny, and the possibility of meeting the needs of their aged ministers depended upon it. Their Foreign Missionary Society depended upon it, for its only chance of getting £100,000 a year was through the new life and energy of the denomination in the twentieth century. Their Baptist witness depended upon it in the twentieth century.

In further justification came the assurance of the treasurer, Mr. H. Wood, that the scheme meant that, with God's blessing, they desired, first of all, as their great business, to win souls, and that they intended to take their part in aggressive work in the cities and towns as well as in the villages of the land. While adhering, as he trusted they might, to a simple and spiritual form of worship, they must see to it that they attracted rather than repelled. Not only did they require buildings, but they required men—those who had been trained for the ministry, and those who had not, but who were scholars in Christ's school; men whose lives were consecrated, as well as their business, to the service of the Master, and whose souls were on fire with love for their fellow-men.

These remarks had the "right ring" about them, and fittingly introduced the resolution then put to the meeting, after Rev. J. B. Johnston (Worcester) had appropriately seconded it.

It would take all the space occupied by this report to do justice to the evening meeting alone, so fresh and inspiring were the utterances of Rev. William Cuff (Shoreditch), Rev. C. H. Kelly (Wesleyan), and Dr. Maclaren, of Manchester, to say nothing of the Chairman, Alderman J. C. Horsfall, who referred with pride to some of the practical achievements of the Free Church Federation since it had come into being.

The subject of the meeting was, "The Exposition and Enforcement of Free Church Principles." Mr. Cuff characterized the present time as one of fevered restlessness, the Church and the world alike standing, as it were, on tiptoe, expecting something new, they know not what. The muddle in the Established Church, the message of the Free Churches, and the movement of the Baptists, formed the alliterative headings of his speech. As to its first head, the present state of things in the Anglican Church is no joy to Free Churchmen, but a source of sincere regret. The only remedy he could see was the relieving of the clergy, by statute, of the "galling fetters of Establishment." As he understood the message of the Free Churches, it was one from God to the people, of liberty and salvation, righteousness and peace, and in this the movement of the Baptists take no mean part—with special emphasis on the raising and disposal of the Centenary Fund.

Rev. C. H. Kelly, as president-elect of the Free Church Council, made special plea for the villages, in which Nonconformist children are being forced into Anglican schools, and other forms of undue pressure are in vogue. Thankfully recognising the liberty the present century has secured, he claimed the right of religious equality, with a trite reference to the Dreyfus verdict. "Pardon is much to a man who has spent five years on Devil's Isle, but honour is more. Liberty to worship we prize, but equality we claim, for we see no cause to apologise as Nonconformists for our existence." He urged that there lies a heavy task to accomplish in the future. Crime, vice, perturbation amongst men, and enormous sins—these would tax the resources of all the churches to remove. Our forefathers were not silver-tongued nor soft-handed; they enforced their principles. And to-day the Free Churches would never advance unless they were prepared to stand to their principles, and to all they believed to be right, and in accordance with the New Testament teaching. On several pages of the log-book of Christopher Columbus appeared the words,

"SAILED ON."

Despite opposition, let the Free Churches sail on towards their desired haven. There must be no retreat of the Churches from the masses. Crowds of people are destitute of the knowledge of truth and of spiritual life; the Church must go to them if England was to be saved. No one Church can accomplish this great work, but united, each doing its own work, energized by the Spirit of the living God, they can achieve much. Christianity is a great deal more than Nonconformity or Churchism, and Jesus Christ must stand before all other leaders.

Having thus spoken to their "enforcement," Mr. Kelly gave way to Dr. Maclaren's "exposition" of the principles involved. These were set as four foundation-stones on which the fabric was built, and stood four-square to all comers—viz., (1) The Supremacy of Scripture; (2) the Freedom of Christ's Church; (3) the Bond of Union between Christ and his People; (4) the Universal Priesthood of all Believers. Whatever rules of doctrine or practice are not clearly found in the New Testament those they discard. Those who rely upon "antiquity" for their authority do not go back far enough. The Scriptures are the lesson-book, and the teachings of later times are no more than the

to master its contents. He described as comic, if it were not so pitiful, to see two archbishops and several bishops, together with their legal advisers, "sniffing up and down the centuries to detect the fragrance of a bit of incense" wherewith to invest with authority its use. Then, in more serious vein, he appealed to the younger ministers not to preach out of the newspaper and the latest society novel, but out of the Bible, so that their sermons might be the exposition of what God had thought it worth his while to say.

In his second axiom, the Doctor defined the true Church as the congregation of faithful persons, as against any conception that loads it by a mass of people who are united to it only by material rites, or one that narrows it down to a synonym for a clerical order. He had seen on a garden lawn picking up grubs, when its true place was winging on the breeze. It was "established!" But it had been destined for freedom. Many feel that the church was shaken and unsettled to its foundations the day it became established by law, and that its true establishment will be when it severs its connection with the State.

Under the third heading Dr. Maclaren urged the freedom of access with which the soul of man may approach to God, as against the attempted intervention of priestly rite or caste. The one is reason, the other is superstition; the one is Christianity, the other is Paganism; the one opens the door for the influx of the supernatural, the other is a position of unintelligible magic. The twofold result of sacramentarianism is found in Spain and France—the one effete and dying, in the midst of superstitious beliefs; the other, corrupt, and, in the immense majority of its most influential minds, wandering in the darkness of Agnosticism, which is the excusable fruit of an inexcusable superstition.

Lastly, we hold to the universal priesthood of all believers. This means: (a) Direct access to God. (b) A priest must have something to offer—our offering must be ourselves—daily surrender of heart and will, and all else to his blessed service. (c) Brotherly mediation. We have not any priests, but there are a great many of you Christian men and women that have not realised that your priesthood means that you should be heralds of Christ's work in your own persons. What is the use, he urged, of our taking up this great truth of the universal priesthood of all believers, using it as a stick to shake in the face of the sacerdotal tendencies in other churches, if it is not regulating the lives of our own churches. For all these principles I have been trying to speak about have got a double edge. They cut against those who do not recognize them; they cut still deeper into those that do, and my best wish for you, dear brethren, of all churches, and for all communions, is that, having these great truths, we may be worthy of them. We have a great heritage. Noblesse oblige. Seeing that we have to witness to these truths, let us see that they penetrate, ennoble, sweeten our lives; and, by the elevation of the character and the beauty of the type of the religious life which they produce in us, commend them to the world.

After all, more souls are won for Jesus Christ by saintly conduct than by any argument. And let us beware of falling into our principles. Principles may be very good, the foundation may be strong, the building may be very mean. Free Churches can corrupt and become stagnant; and, for all their high principles, can become but a bit of the world under another name, which suits the world's purpose exactly, and gains immense applause.

But He that walks amidst the seven candlesticks needs not only principles, but their issues in our lives. And so we have to take heed how we build thereon gold, silver, and precious stones. And, above all, brethren, let us remember what all churches are for—to bring men into personal union with Christ by faith—and what all churches are fitted for their purpose by—individually and collectively keeping up that union by faith in Him who is the source of all our vigour and of all our prosperity. Not abstract principles, but a living Christ, is our strength; not abstract principles, but a dying and living Christ, is our message.

This was the concluding meeting of the Union, and on FRIDAY.

The Missionary Society once more held the field, commencing with a missionary breakfast and conference, at which were discussed various ways in which young people can help raise the Centenary Fund.

In the evening an important gathering of young people met in Brunswick Chapel (Judge Bompas, Q.C., presiding) to hear addresses from Revs. W. B. Frame (Congo), P. E. Herbeelet (India), and S. F. Whitehouse (China).

Great things are expected from this year's assembly, the fruit of which will, it is hoped, be seen and felt both at home and abroad.

A MINISTER'S IMPRESSIONS.

I was at the first meeting on the Monday night at South Parade Chapel, and at almost every other till the last on Thursday night in the large Town Hall. From first to last the meetings throbbed with spiritual life and power. There was not one jarring note. Brotherly love began at the beginning and continued to the end of the proceedings.

I never saw such greetings, hand-shaking, and enthusiasm in the Baptist Union before, though I have attended thirty-three autumnal sessions.

Tuesday was the missionary day, and as ever it was fraught with blessing and great power. Every meeting seemed overwhelming. At the valedictory service in the morning, when seventeen missionaries were present for the last time before going out, some to India, some to China, and some to the Congo, 2,000 people gathered in the beautiful Wesleyan Chapel. Everybody was deeply moved, for the whole place seemed charged with spiritual forces that worked mightily. The Lord was present, and all felt it. One thing in that meeting will never be forgotten—namely, Mr. J. G. Greenhough's farewell address to the missionaries. It was replete with holy fervour, tenderness, and brotherly love. Christ was glorified, and the Gospel exalted, in every paragraph. The large audience thrilled and wept, and prayed as the speech rolled on. It was a remarkable scene of overwhelming spiritual power, and we were all refreshed with the presence of the Lord.

The great missionary meeting at 7 p.m. in the Town Hall was crowded from end to end, and was most successful.

On Wednesday the president's address was the one expectation of the day. Its title was long, but just like the man—"The Christ of the Coming Century: or the Christian Faith in its Application to the Institutional Life of Man." I need not say the address was eloquent, impassioned, logical, for Dr. Clifford can hardly help being that even when he is in one of his heretical moods. This time that mind was not on him, and he was at his best. The address rang with evangelical truth, and was balanced and measured. He insisted on the Fatherhood of God, and with equal force and clearness on the necessity of the new birth. Dr. Clifford laid great stress on this through a great passage in his speech, and the audience was breathless and excited as he uttered it with tremendous pathos. To quote one sentence—"Say it in what language we may, man must be born from above."

I differ from his optimistic views of the future, but the whole address was a great deliverance, and all rejoiced at its high evangelical tone and purpose.

Noting, en passant, the address of Professor W. Medley, of Rawdon College, on "The consecrated life: its opportunities and influence," which was deeply thoughtful, refined, and Scriptural, the next meeting of importance was that held in the Town Hall, for "the Exposition and Enforcement of Free Church Principles." The speakers were Dr. Maclaren, Rev. C. H. Kelly, and W. Cuff. Dr. Maclaren received a most remarkable ovation as he rose to speak The whole audience rose to their feet, and cheered, and waved hats and handkerchiefs in the most enthusiastic fashion. He was worthy, and it was a grand testimony to the dear old Gospel, of which he is such a master expositor. Again entire unanimity prevailed, and it was a mighty meeting. Each speaker pleaded for the Baptist Union Twentieth Century Fund in very hopeful terms.

On the whole, from beginning to end, the meetings were singularly successful in the best sense. They were marked with deep spiritual fervour and true evangelical zeal. The Lord Jesus was exalted and honoured in them all, and "the faith once for all delivered unto the saints" was expounded and enforced as the one great need of the day. I left Leeds praising and blessing God for sparing me to see the Baptist Union in such spirit and power.

The Faith Mission.

THE seventh annual Convention of the Faith Mission was held at Rothesay from September 20 to 26. The following speakers were present:—Revs. C. G. Moore (London), J. G. Mantle (Brighton), G. C. Grubb, and R. J. Ward, L.M.S. (Madras). Revs. C. Inwood and E. L. Hamilton were expected, but, at the last moment, were unable to attend. The meetings were held, first in the Faith Mission hall, and then in the large public hall, which was needed to accommodate the ever-increasing numbers.

The first evening was chiefly devoted to prayer, with a short address from Mr. Grubb, who had, as he said, "a message from the Lord," and so it proved.—Luke x. 38-42. He drew the contrast "between Martha, who was longing to serve the Lord, and saw only his outward weariness, and Mary, who by faith saw his inward fulness, which was longing to give."

The three addresss of Mr. Ward were very fresh. Mr. Moore did not arrive until Saturday, but his addresses were very helpful. Mr. Mantle was only able to stay for part of the time, but his earnest words bore fruit, as many in the praise meeting testified.

Mr. James F. Govan's address on "Abiding with God," at the early morning meeting, on Sunday, was a message from the Lord to very many. On Sunday night there was a large "open-air," followed by a Gospel meeting, which was addressed by Mr. Grubb, and attended by large numbers. The afternoon meetings each day were on mission work in various parts of the world, and taken by Mrs. Ward, L.M.S., Mrs. Goslin, S.A.G.M., Mrs. Todd Osborne, Soldiers' Home, Gibraltar; Pastor Smith, Argentina; Mrs. Baker, U.S.A., and the Faith Mission workers, who gave accounts of what the Lord was doing in Scotland and Ireland. At the praise meeting, on Tuesday morning, many testified to having received blessing — some through one speaker, some through another; but all alike gave glory to Him from whom alone cometh "every good and perfect gift."

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, October 8. 1 Chron. xii.

IT is thus that Christ's hosts are gathering around Him, whilst He yet keeps Himself close; for as yet, though crowned King of those who love Him, his Kingship is not recognised by the world. But loyal hearts are gathering to his standard, from far and near, to be his mighty men, helpers in the war.

Let us separate ourselves unto our David. Let us learn to handle the shield for defence, and the sword for attack. Let our faces reflect the courage of the lion, and our speed be swift as the flight of the roes upon the mountains. And, as we yield ourselves to Jesus, be it ours to cry, Thine are we, Jesus, and on thy side, Thou Son of God; peace, peace be unto thee; thy God helpeth thee.

Notice the varied purposes which these heroes had at heart, when they gathered thus around the person of David, and apply them to our relationship to Christ. Some came to help him (22); some came to make him king (31, 38); some came to turn the kingdom of Saul to him, according to the word of the Lord (23). Oh, let us band ourselves together for the same high purpose, and let us, day by day, endeavour to extend his kingdom over some fresh acres of territory, over some new spirits, that have hitherto withheld their allegiance! Oh, for the perfect heart, perfectly set upon this, swerving neither right nor left to lower aims! And happy will it be when, of the whole Church, it can be said: "They were of one heart to make David king."

Those who come to Jesus find rich provisions spread for them. Even from Zebulun and distant Naphtali, the furthest and least likely places, the supplies are sent in. The three days of feasting, the abundant preparation, the great joy, are all emblems of the things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, but which are prepared for them who love God.

MONDAY, October 9. 1 Chron. xiii.

What a confession for David to make, that they had not sought unto the Ark, the emblem of God's Presence, in the days of Saul! Yet this is enough to account for the disasters that befell that ill-fated monarch. And the surest guarantee of the stability and prosperity of David's reign was his early and zealous regard for the Ark of God.

The mercy-seat above the Ark was always considered to be the throne of God. He sat between the cherubim, and his sacred Name was known upon it. It was this that inspired the trust and praises of Israel. None ever uttered that mysterious sacred Name, Jehovah; but the thought of the ever-living, ever-present, God was the inspiration of their national life. That Name has been invested with new and deeper meaning since Jesus spoke it, and made it spell "Father." Tell us thy Name, O God, we beseech Thee, in all its wealth of power, and mystery of beauty; so shall it be the comfort and strength of our lives! "They that know thy Name shall put their trust in Thee. In the name of our God we will set up our banners."

It was a great shock to David when Uzzah was stricken in sudden death. "It displeased him." But there was an outcome of it, which was very salutary. The incident proved that the old Levitical code had not become obsolete, and that its provisions must still be obeyed. (Num. iv. 15). There would have been a tendency, if this violation of it had been overlooked, to have set aside other of the commands and precepts of the old law, and to have devised another code of doctrine and practice, to the great detriment of the people, and the blurring of dispensational truth. Centuries were to pass till the rent veil showed that Leviticus had done its work. You cannot disobey one of God's commands without incurring the just recompense of reward.

TUESDAY, October 10. 1 Chron. xiv.

Such moments come to all men as this, in which David suddenly perceived that God had made him king for Israel's sake. It was as when a flash of lightning illuminates a wide range of landscape through which we have been travelling in the dark, and suddenly we perceive the way we have come and the direction we are to follow. These moments of illumination are not given us at the commencement of our life. They might confuse us, and hinder our simple obedience to duty. Your life is in God's hands; and it is for Him to give you power, or withhold it. And remember, also, that whatever you have is entrusted as a stewardship for the sake of others.

All such revelations prepare us for the hours of trial and temptation which follow. David was inclined to yield to luxury and self-indulgence, after the fashion of neighbouring monarchs, and he was destined to pay dearly for it in after life; and his demoralization would have been complete, had it not been for the strong enemies by whom he was assailed. Yes, child of God, trial is necessary, not only to root you in those things which you have been taught, but to counteract other tendencies which are at work within you, and which God must check, if you are not to be a castaway. We are not to meet our enemies always in the same way, as David's experiences with the Philistines show. It is needful to abide in God for his direction. Each case requires different treatment. Above all, let us listen for the tread of his angel-hosts, as they march to our help.

WEDNESDAY, October 11. 1 Chron. xv.

The three months of waiting were not lost on David or Israel. They were brought back to the sacred oracles, which taught clearly that the Ark of the living God should be borne only on the shoulders of living men, specially selected and consecrated (12, 13, 14). If we will but set ourselves to learn the reason for past failure and chastisement, God will quickly reveal it. He does not afflict willingly. There is a needs-be for every stroke of his rod.

Some of the Levites were appointed to bear the ark, and some to minister with sacred song. The sweet and well-trained voices of the choristers were sustained and accompanied by a band of instruments, the psalteries set to Alamoth (Psa. xlvi., title), and the harps to Sheminith (Psa. vi., title), whilst the clang of the cymbals was heard resounding through all. It seemed as though it was impossible to do enough to set forth the praises of the God of Israel, or testify to the jubilation of the people, as the day of national prosperity began to break so auspiciously.

There is not enough song in our lives. Our daughters will sit down at the piano and play over familiar, or novel tunes; but too often this is intended to please the ear, rather than to address God in loving adoration and thanksgiving. Even our Church psalmody is too often prized for its artistic charm, rather than for its expression of congregational praise. But the true heart will love to pour out its gratitude and joy in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs; and it is a serious lack in our Christian life if we do not seek and cultivate such natural and spontaneous expressions of feeling towards our good and gracious God.

THURSDAY, October 12. 1 Chron. xvi.

To dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of a man's life—this seems a very blessed and desirable lot. The progress of the year, marked by recurring festivals! All the holidays, holy days! All the festivals, days of festive prayer and praise! No sound of alarm breaking upon that blessed peace! No intruder's foot resounding over the pavements, trodden by the bare feet of Levite and priest! Morning and night the lamb, sacrificed as an atonement, and the unceasing cadence of sacred song by the white-robed choirs! We are told that David left Asaph and his brethren there to minister before the Ark, as every day's work required; and there is mention made of burnt-offerings with their sweet savour, and the songs of God (40, 42). O calm and blessed life, how different to the fever of our modern strife and turmoil!

"My willing soul would stay,
In such a frame as this;
And sit, and sing herself away
To everlasting bliss."

But stay! The world needs us. Listen to its cries for help. That is the voice of a strong man going down in the dark waters, and that of a child, and that of a woman sorely beset. We must not linger in the cloisters, beneath the spell of chiming hours and sacred song, but must hasten to answer appeals for help. Yet there is a sense in which we may dwell in the house of God always, when we have learnt his secret, when we yield ourselves wholly to his appointments, when we put him between ourselves and all the shocks of worldly trouble and temptation. Psa. xci. 1.

FRIDAY, October 13. 1 Chron. xvii.

Even inspired men like Nathan sometimes run before God, speaking without due consideration of his purpose. How much more are we in danger through our impetuous nature! Let us specially ask that we may not walk in advance of God. The primary reason why David was not permitted to build the house, was that, from his youth, he had been a man of war, and there would have been an incongruity in associating him with the Temple of Peace. But God's refusal of his offer was, so to speak, wrapt up in such abundant promises, that it could not inflict a wound, however slight, on that generous heart. God may say No, but He does so with the utmost gentleness. We do well if a thing is in our heart, even though it advances no further.

It is beautiful to learn that David sat before the Lord. Sometimes this is our chosen attitude, when the Bible lies open on our knee, and we speak to God, as a man speaks with his friend. It is good to pray on our knees, but communion may be equally real as we recline on our couch, or sit in our chair, or pass swiftly in carriage or railway train.

Let us also remember to imitate David in taking God at his word. He took the promises of the previous chapter as equivalent to performances. "Thou, Lord, hast blessed, and it is blessed." When God promises a thing, it is as good as done; there need be no further parley about it, but the soul may repose with perfect serenity, only looking up now and again to remind Him that its expectation is from Him alone. "Let thy word to thy servant be established, and do as Thou hast said."

SATURDAY, October 14. 1 Chron. xviii.

These conquests laid the foundation of Solomon's vast empire, and accumulated the wealth out of which the temple was constructed. It was on this platform, as laid by David, that the magnificent structure, with which his son's name is associated, emerged before the eye of the world. How perfectly David would have been repaid for all his strenuous endeavour, if he could have realized the firm security and glory to which his son succeeded. O weary contenders against impurity and drink, and the evil of the world, these are the Hadarezer and Tou, the Edomites and Moabites, which must be dealt with in the age that precedes the millennial reign.

How gladly the historian records twice over, that the Lord gave victory to David whithersoever he went (6, 13). This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith. By faith, we take victory, from the royal hand of Him, who overcame for us, and waits to overcome in us. The only condition is that we do not go out to meet the foe, apart from the very distinct indication of God's will. Our Father guarantees victory in every battle that meets us in the path which He has chosen. He does not pledge Himself, however, to make us victorious in conflicts of our own seeking, though even then, in answer to our prayer, He will succour us. Nothing happens to us by chance, no temptation comes to us apart from the will of God. Before the temptation is allowed to molest us in the path of duty, both it and our strength have been carefully measured, and we may meet it without fear, knowing that God's grace is sufficient, and He waits to give us victory.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

ON Tuesday evening of last week was held the final preliminary gathering of the workers who have joined hands in this great effort for the evangelization of the city of Glasgow. The main object of the meeting was prayer; but interesting statements were made at intervals, showing something of the nature and completeness of the preparations for the work.

As president of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, Lord Overtoun has been chairman of the Campaign Committee, and gave a key-note to the proceedings by reading Acts i. 6-14; ii. 1-4. Referring in vivid terms to his personal recollection of the revival times of twenty-five years ago, he replied to those who deprecated the planning of the campaign on account of the so-called "narrowness" of its aims, by declaring that all the great Christian organizations in the city and neighbourhood—with the exception of the ministry of the Word—had, if not actually originating at the time, at least received a new impetus and power. One thing that made this possible was the way in which the wave of spirituality gave to all the churches a new view of their denominational differences—by enabling them to see over the dividing walls, and to realize how truly they held all the great truths in common.

Those who took part in the former movement have cause to look back and thank God. But a new generation has sprung up, and leaders in the work are anxious that they should enjoy and share the blessing. One of the great uses of the past is to give fresh experience; but all are seeking to approach the work in a spirit of humility, not necessarily in the old way, but through any channel and in any way by which God may send it. "Critics have been saying that the ministry of the Word is sufficient. We thank God for a faithful ministry, and believe that many of us do not appreciate it as we should; but we are expecting that there will be such a time of blessing as will cause ministers to 'beckon to their partners to come over and help them.' If God gives the blessing, what will the reaping be but the logical outcome of the faithful sowing of past years? The ministers are the officers; and, under their leadership, we pray that the membership will be stirred up to service."

PREPARED TO RECEIVE BLESSING,

In response to a desire expressed by a number of the volunteer helpers, Mr. John W. Arthur described in graphic terms the present position of affairs. Towards the close of the year 1898, the proposal which had been made for the putting forth of such an effort began to take definite shape in the Committee of the Evangelistic Association. One of the first steps taken was to approach, by deputation, the local presbyteries of the three great Presbyterian Churches (Church of Scotland, Free Church of Scotland, and United Presbyterian Church), where the scheme met with entire approval; and each of these bodies appointed commissioners to act on the general committee. Representatives were also appointed by other churches and various religious societies, till the members numbered over a hundred. The committee, with further additions, was divided into nine sub-committees, and the noteworthy fact was announced that, in filling up the 154 positions, was received from any one to undertake the work proposed to him. The city area has now been divided into eleven sections, with a local committee in charge of each, and helpers have been secured for every department, until it is believed that no fewer than a thousand persons are engaged in official positions for the direction of the movement.

For the past two years there has been no formal Convention for the Deepening of the Spiritual Life in Glasgow; but on Monday of this week, under the direction of the Campaign Committee, there was begun a fortnight of meetings for Christians, which is believed to be the longest season of special consecration services ever held in the city. Every afternoon a gathering is being held in the great St. Andrew's Hall, while every evening a service will be held in a church within the bounds of each of the eleven divisions. The catholicity of the movement is shown by the fact that during the week the churches thrown open will include buildings belonging to congregations of the Established, Free, United Presbyterian, Congregational, Episcopal, and Baptist Churches. On the list of speakers announced are to be found the names of Rev. Principal Rainy (Edinburgh), Rev. Dr. Alexander Whyte (Edinburgh), Rev. Professor Laidlaw (Edinburgh), Rev. John McNeill, Rev. J. J. Luce (Gloucester), Rev. Professor Denney (Glasgow), Rev. George Wilson (Edinburgh), Rev. Dr. John Smith (Edinburgh), Mr. Henry Varley, Rev. Charles G. Moore (London), Mr. R. B. Stewart, and Mr. William Thomson, jun.

After fourteen days of waiting upon God most of the churches will gather round the table of the Lord on Sabbath, October 15, for the Autumn Communion; and on the following day, Monday, October 16, the work will begin with eleven evening meetings for adults, and nearly as many for children, all widely separated. The centres of work will be changed from time to time, within the area of each section, until the whole city has been covered. St. Andrew's Hall, and other large meeting-places, will be utilized, in addition to the churches; and, in all, have been arranged and provided with speakers. Among those who are to speak during the course of the winter, we find the names of Rev. Charles Spurgeon, Rev. R. J. Campbell (Brighton), Rev. Dr. J. Hood Wilson (Edinburgh), Rev. William M. Clow (Edinburgh), Rev. William Muir (Blairgowrie), Rev. James Houston (Cambuslang), Rev. Dr. Hanson, Rev. Dr. Robbins, Rev. Arthur Mursell, Rev. John McNeill, with Messrs. George Clarke, Henry Varley, Charles Inglis, W. D. Dunn, William Thomson, jun., and the Brothers Weaver. Much help has been promised by the evangelists of the Free and United Presbyterian Churches, the Evangelization Society, and the Children's Special Service Mission, as well as the staff and students of the Bible Training Institute.

OVER TWO THOUSAND MEETINGS

It has been arranged that each church or hall in which a mission is being held is to form for the time being the centre of a group of congregations; and the ministers and workers in these grouped churches will mainly supply the workers for service in their own sections. Believing that Christian work should and can be done as thoroughly as rate-collecting, those in charge are arranging for bands of visitors by whom invitations will be left at every house, shop, and place of employment. All possible use will be made of wall-posters, newspaper advertisements, and pulpit intimations; and it is believed that the means used will leave no family or adult in the city in ignorance about when and where the Gospel is being preached.

The work among the children is in the hands of a special committee in each section. Many of the ablest, and most consecrated have been enlisted in this work. Through Sabbath schools, Foundry Boys' Society meetings, Christian Endeavour Societies, and all other available juvenile organizations, the meetings will be announced until every boy and girl who can be reached shall also have the invitation given to "Come to Jesus." The lantern, the blackboard, and the spoken address will all be used in this department.

In dealing with the question of the large number of helpers required in the work, both Lord Overtoun and Mr. Arthur laid great stress on the care which had been, and will still be, exercised in the selection of those who are to deal with the inquirers. A large staff is being called out, consecrated men and women qualified to lead wisely, and to guide along sound Scriptural lines. For this and other branches of service preparatory meetings will be held, and cards of instructions will be issued to give counsel and help, so far as that can be done, by leaders of experience.

"To-night," said Mr. Arthur, "we stand on the threshold. The movement has been slighted and opposed. Coldness and indifference, and countless difficulties have had to be met; but the committees have gone straight on with their work, never turning aside, never turning back. The sin, and misery, and hardness of a great city confront us. But the city is made up of men and women, boys and girls, with human hearts and deepest needs. The world is putting the old question of unbelief in Psa. lxxviii., 'Can God?' We, too, stand and ask the same question,

'CAN GOD?'

"We have given these months of thought and labour ungrudgingly, whole-heartedly: we are going to do more still in the months to come. Our answer is the answer of faith, 'God is able, God can.' We put all that has been done into his hand, and we believe that He, by his mighty Spirit, will now take up his own work, and that we shall have in our city this winter such a manifestation of his power as has never before been known. 'Let Glasgow flourish by the preaching of the Word,' and to the Name of God be all the glory!"

Much time was spent in prayer, among others who led in the devotions being the Revs. David M. Macintyre, Rev. William Ross, Rev. John Tainsh, Mr. Alexander Mackeith, Mr. John Anderson, and Mr. Thomas Boyd. A final exhortation to prayer in private, in the family, and in the congregation—for those whom it is desired to reach, and for all workers—was given by Rev. James Paton (St. Paul's, Glasgow); and we separated with a note of triumphant faith in our hearts, with the light of the other world visible to the eyes of many.

Glasgow, September 28.

On Monday, St. Andrew's Hall was crowded at three o'clock. Principal John Rainy and Rev. John McNeill spoke with power. Much interest is apparent in the city, and special prayer is asked for continued and increased blessing.

The Late Mr. W. T. Paton.

DEAR SIR,—May we ask the kind consideration of your readers to help us to perpetuate the memory of the late Mr. W. T. Paton, who, for twenty-one years, devoted his time and his untiring energy to the work of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission and the Young Women's Christian Association.

We are anxious to have a permanent Memorial Home in India, to which a Widows' Home will be attached, for those who were saved from famine by a fund which Mr. Paton worked so hard to raise. With this object in view, we are trying to raise the sum of £3,000 among his friends, and the kind supporters of our Societies, to build this mission house in India, and to perpetuate the work carried on among young women at the Cloudesley Institute where Mr. and Mrs. Paton have worked for so many years, and which Miss Paton is still carrying on.

Many kind friends have already given us their support, and we have received over £800, with promises of about £400 more. We feel sure that this will meet the eye of many who may not have had an appeal, but who would wish to show their gratitude to the memory of one whom to know was a privilege.—Yours faithfully,

Kinnaird,
W. Joynson-Hicks, } Treasurers.

A Trip to Alaska.

By Rev. E. PAYSON HAMMOND.

YOU may not all be able to visit Alaska, as many have been doing the last year or two in search of gold, but with the help of my note-book you can visit it with me and witness some strange sights. You will find the scenery delightful. All the way from Portland, Oregon, to Sitka, Alaska, we shall be astonished many times by gazing upon magnificent mountains covered with snow; and if we turn aside a little we shall see a glacier five miles high, and at the base 2,000 feet in thickness.

Before I tell you about our journey over these beautiful waters, I must give you an account of the way a Sabbath school was commenced, in which an Indian chieftess was converted, in Victoria. A few Christians in that place determined to do what they could for the Indians. At length they gathered in a number of these people, and began to teach them to read. One Sunday there was not an Indian present. They therefore started over to the Indian rancherie to find why there were none at the Sunday school. As they approached they heard a and saw about seventy-five in a circle making the most hideous noise with drums, rattles, kettles, dancing round the man who stood in the centre holding a dog by his hind legs and neck. It was thought by the Indians that if he could thus hold the dog and tear him to pieces with his teeth and eat him, and then go into the woods without any blanket, and come back after three days alive, he was fitted for an Indian doctor. They were so painted, some of them covered with tar and feathers, that they did not look like human beings. Among those very Indians were numbers who are to-day earnest, devoted Christians. Amos was the first that was converted. I heard him tell his experience a few days ago in one of our meetings. His eyes filled with tears as he spoke of the great love of Jesus in giving Himself to die for a poor heathen savage. These Indians have built a nice little church. There they meet and study God's Word, and sing and pray. None of the Indians feel they are too old to study the word of God, hence there are more adults than children present in their Sunday school.

Nearly every one wept when they stood up and told the story of their conversion. I felt as I had never felt before the truth of the words of Jesus, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all unto Me." Yes, the poor Indians when they see how Jesus has loved them and given Himself for them, feel their hearts in return going out in love to Him. At the farewell meeting in Victoria, five or six hundred people walked across the platform to shake hands, and among them were

THIRTY OR FORTY OF THESE INDIANS.

Nearly all of them wept as they bade me goodbye.

At Nanaimo we fell in with an Indian missionary who took us in a canoe to a village of several hundred Indians. There we found a church and street on which were houses built by Christians, in which everything was clean and comfortable; but in the same village we saw the wretched abode of the heathen Indians. In a great building, made of rough boards, with leaky roof, lived from fifty to 200 of these wild Indians, huddled together like animals. There is no chimney in this great, rough building; all the smoke finds its way through cracks in the roof and sides. When the Indians fill it at night, and fires are burning in different parts of it, it looks more like some dark cavern filled with evil spirits.

If I had never believed in the power of the Gospel, a visit to this Indian village would have been enough to convince me of the truth of it.

The first Indian who was converted in this village took us in his canoe, made out of a log, on a fishing excursion in the Straits of Georgia. I was more interested in hearing the story of his conversion than in trying to catch salmon.

As you have been reading, dear young people, of these savage Indians being led to Christ, have you been able to say, "I, too, love that same Jesus who is so dear to them"? If not, let me entreat you this very hour, make Him your friend and Saviour. He bids you come to Him just as you are. Do not try to make yourself better first, but trust in Him.

A gentleman once saw a dog jumping into his garden. He threw his cane at him, intending to hit him, but the dog picked it up and, in a good-natured manner, brought it to him, as much as to say, "You tried to hit me, but I brought your stick to you." The gentleman's heart was touched, and after that he allowed the dog to come into his garden whenever he chose. That dog would not run away from his enemy, but sinners, old and young, often run away from Jesus, their best friend, though He bids them come to him.

Personalia.

Mr. Thomas Payne has returned from his recent evangelistic tour in Virginia, where, especially at Danville, among the negroes, much blessing attended the gatherings. Mr. Payne's address is 23, Hyde Grove, Manchester.

Rev. Charles Inwood, who is about to conduct meetings for the deepening of spiritual life in Sweden, Egypt, and India, similar to those he conducted through China last winter and spring, intends to return to regular pastoral work next summer, and to this end he has accepted an invitation to succeed Rev. William Gorman in University Road Methodist Church, Belfast.

Mr. Esu Churran, of the Indian Christian Realm Mission (Raj-i-masih), is to be married on October 13 to Miss Bell, a lady who has a number of relatives in the mission-field. Mr. and Mrs. Churran have arranged to sail in November for India, where they hope to commence work in the high mountainous parts of Kumaon.

Rev. John Bradford, president of the London Baptist Association, is the subject of the biographical sketch (with portrait) in the current issue of the Baptist Magazine. Mr. Bradford is minister of the church at Fillebrook, Leytonstone, which has a communicant roll of 500, including a large body of devoted workers. Mr. Bradford is a man of warm sympathies, and is ever cheery and considerate, whether battling with pastoral duties or overtaking the imperious demands of his presidential office. Mr. G. Andrew Hutchison, who writes the sketch, says what all who know Mr. Bradford will readily allow: "He has unquestionably rare business abilities and tact, and these have proved of untold value in helping him over rugged places, and in enabling him wisely to aid many a one suffering from the heat and burden of the road, or, unhappily, fallen by the way."

Letters to the Editor.

The Friends and Holy Scripture.

SIR,—Those of us who were privileged to attend the "Friends' Summer School," at Birmingham, had not the advantage of Mr. William Tallack's company; and he has fallen into certain errors in consequence, which would have been avoided had he been present.

For example, he states that "both at Scarborough and at Birmingham the Old Testament was more dealt with than the New." Now, as secretary of the committee which arranged the programme for the Birmingham School, I may be allowed to inform your readers that the total number of lectures and addresses delivered during the eleven days that the School lasted was thirty-six; that eleven of these were on the Old Testament, or the period to which it belongs; twelve were directly on the New Testament, and eight more on Christian ethics and the lives of saintly Christians; three were on some of the present-day problems of eligion and morals, and two it would be har d to classify.

Again, your correspondent's allusions to Professor McGiffert's handling of the New Testament passages, which are supposed to prove that the ceremonies of Baptism and the Eucharist were instituted by our Lord, are a travesty of what was really said, and could not have been made by one who had heard the lectures. What Professor McGiffert—who is a Presbyterian, and one of the first authorities on primitive Christianity—really did, was to show, by the most careful arguments, every step of which was based on clearly-stated facts, that there are strong reasons for believing that historical students of the New Testament and of early Christianity will eventually come to the conclusion which the first Quakers reached by intuition—viz., that there is not sufficient evidence of such institution by Christ Himself.

Once more Mr. Tallack is writing entirely without knowledge when he states that the doctrines of the Incarnation and the Cross were absent from the Birmingham Summer School. He has probably not even read a report of Professor A. S. Peake's lectures on the Pauline Theology, in which these doctrines were set forth with a power and freshness which some of us had rarely or never heard before. Nor is he in a position to know anything of the spirit of our devotional meetings, in which the thought of Christ as our risen Lord, and his work for us and in us, were deeply and powerfully kept before our minds.

I believe I may safely say that there is not one of the seven or eight hundred persons who attended those gatherings who did not leave them with higher thoughts of God, with more reverence for the Bible, with a larger sense of its inspiration, and a deeper yearning for the inspiration which we, too, may share,—I am, yours respectfully, Edward Grubb.

Southport, September 23, 1899.

Dear Sir,—As you have kindly allowed me to see Mr. Edward Grubb's letter, permit me to say that, as I attended the Scarborough Mission School throughout, I can fully endorse what I said about that gathering.

As to the Birmingham "School," I wrote after seeing the first week's reports only. And it is now satisfactory to find that in the second week the New Testament had a good share of attention.

In regard to my observations generally, it is well known that an influential section of the Friends hold views differing considerably from those which are usually considered evangelical. And I have received, from evangelical Friends, warm approvals of my recent letter in your columns.—Yours truly, William Tallack.

Books for an Infirmary.—At the Newcastle-on-Tyne Infirmary there is a library of miscellaneous literature, many of the books being of a decidedly Christian tone. It is largely used by the inmates, and has been the means of blessing to many sufferers. Additional supplies of helpful books are pathetically pleaded for by the librarian and Scripture reader, Mr. Thos. Hare, to whom gifts may be addressed at The Royal Infirmary, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Christian Endeavour.

Topic for the Week beginning October 8.
"Work where Christ tells you."—John xxi. 1-6.

IT is difficult to understand the precise thought that was in Peter's mind when he proposed to go fishing; whether there was a regret in his tone as he turned back to his nets, or it was his intention thus usefully to employ the interval of waiting for the Master's appearance—it is impossible to say. The lesson, however, is obvious that it is in moments of disappointment and despair that the Master comes to us. The boat was probably the one which once was laden to its gunwale with fish; the night was obviously the fittest time for plying their calling; the fishermen themselves were not lacking in skill; but the morning found them weary, chilled, hungry, and with not a single fish to reward their arduous exertions. That failure was permitted—may we not say, contrived—as the background against which the Master's figure would presently stand radiant. How many days and nights we have gone forth to catch men alive for Christ, with apparently no results. It may be that such is your position now.

Such is the precise condition in which you can best receive Christ's indications of your work, and how to do it. There is a right side of the ship; and an auspicious moment when the great multitude of fish swarm in the deep water. Jesus knows the hour and the place, and those who abide in Him can make no mistake. If we work according to our own wit, toil as we may, we shall be baffled. But if, broken by failure and disappointment, we are prepared to take his direction, to serve under his orders, to make Him captain, his voice will roll across the waves with its sure indication. Be at your post; let your nets be clean; your arms strong; your souls on the alert—then wait for Him. It will be hardly possible to draw the net. And He who appointed your work, will prepare your provision, lighting the fire with his own hand, so thoughtfully adapted for warmth and breakfast, the type of his greeting on the shores of eternity.

On September 26 and 27, Rev. F. B. Meyer, President of C.E. Union of Great Britain and Ireland, held the first of his presidential meetings in Bolton and Hanley. The programme in each case consisted of a sermon by Mr. Meyer, followed by a conference on C.E. methods, and a public meeting in the evening. Miss M. Jennie Street and Rev. James Mursell took part in both afternoon and evening meetings, giving special addresses to young women and young men respectively. All meetings were well attended and characterized by the usual hearty singing of Endeavourers, whilst a deep impression was made at both places, giving ground for the belief that this series of some sixty conventions which are being arranged will be for the quickening of the movement.

Christian Endeavour on the other side of the water is much alive. The Endeavourers connected with the Reformed Church of America have been for eleven years past building home mission churches. The latest report shows 15 churches to their credit, and a C.E. station at Chitoor, India, with 15 out-stations, wholly sustained by Endeavour offerings, whilst assistance is given to work in Oklahoma, China, Japan and Arabia.

The fifth annual meeting of the North London Christian Endeavour Union was held in the Finsbury Park Congregational Church on Thursday evening last. Rev. J. Ossian Davies, president of the London Council, presided, and gave an address on the Kingdom of God. Three happy and suggestive, though short, papers were read on Committee Work by Miss Heron and Messrs. Waller and Harmsworth. Miss E. M. Weatherley gave a most interesting description of the plans for the great World Convention in July, 1900. It is to be held at Wembley Park, which, for the time, will be a city of white. Two huge tabernacles, each accommodating 9,000 people, are to be brought from America, and 1,000 bell tents, for sleeping purposes, will be erected. Every accommodation will be provided for 10,000 people to encamp within the Park during the Convention. The report of the year's work, presented by the secretary, Mr. Stanley P. Edwards, was most encouraging, and the outlook for the district is bright.

Dr. Stephenson's Children's Home.

IN connection with the Children's Home, it has been decided to have a day of special prayer, on Tuesday, October 10. Meetings for prayer and conference will be held at the Home Chapel, at Bonner Road, at eleven and three. The evening meeting will be held at half-past seven, in Wesley's Chapel, City Road. It is expected that a large number of ministers and others will take part in these services. At the country branches of the Home, a similar programme will be observed. Those friends who will not be able to attend the gatherings are asked to remember the Children's Home in family prayer.

Oxford Letter.

From Our Own Correspondent.

THE Oxford Branch of the Church of England Sunday School Institute held its fifth annual Conference on Thursday in St. John's College. Canon Christopher presided, and, in the course of an earnest address, pleaded for the appropriation by faith of the "riches" laid up in Christ. Quoting some words of the late devoted missionary, G. L. Pilkington, spoken in Oxford in 1896, he said: "What do you know in your own experience of the power of Christ to save? With a man who knows what the power of Christ to save really is, it must become the trongest passion of his nature to tell others."

The subject appointed for discussion was—"The Provision and Training of Sunday School Teachers." A paper was read by Rev. G. C. Bowring, who urged that a greater interest should be taken in the young teacher, both by the clergy and superintendents. Every opportunity should be sought for encouraging the young teacher. There were many discouragements for such in Sunday-school work, and often they go home feeling that their efforts have been fruitless. The Conference was full of help and stimulus.

The Bishop of Oxford has addressed a letter to the Ritualistic clergy in the diocese, asking them, for the sake of the Church in the present crisis, to comply with the archiepiscopal decision. Rev. W. Scott, vicar of Cowley St. John, preaching on Friday evening, said: "The use of incense at the offertory and consecration, which they thought an honour to God and to themselves, would be discontinued next Sunday." We understand that Rev. M. H. Noel, vicar of St. Barnabas, also intends to comply with the Bishop's request. How much heart-burning would have been spared if the practice had been declared illegal years ago. If it is wrong now, it was wrong fifty years ago.

Under the auspices of the East Ward Lodge of the National Protestant League, Rev. F. J. Horsefield, vicar of St. Silas, Bristol, lectured on Tuesday evening at St. Clement's on the subject, "Protestantism: our Principles, Duties, and Prospects." The Rector of St. Clement's presided. The lecturer, in illustrating the Romanising character of a large section of the clergy of the Established Church, gave the following statistics. He said: "I am told that there are 9,000 more or less Romanizing clergy in the National Church, several thousand of these belonging to the E.C.U. and other secret societies. Out of thirty-five colonial bishops, there are thirty connected with the Ritualists and the E.C.U." He pleaded for more faithfulness among Protestants in the face of so much error. It was a question, he said, not of mere matters of taste, but of principles and doctrines, and no one loyal to the truth ought to be silent.

Special interest gathered round the missionary meetings of the Methodist Free Church on Sunday and Monday last, as the deputation was Rev. C. H. Goodman, the only white man who escaped with his life in the hinterland of Sierra Leone during the late rebellion. Mr. Goodman's address on Monday evening will not soon be forgotten. He related his experiences during the rebellion, and all who heard him must have felt how plainly the hand of the Lord was on his servant, guiding and protecting him. For days he had to hide from the war party, and only escaped at last by the pleading of the women who told the king of his kindness in "mending" people when they were sick. Mr. Goodman returns shortly to his work in West Africa, and, we doubt not, will be upheld by the prayers of many who heard him on Monday.

Irish Notes.

THE Irish Presbyterian missionaries in India have made an earnest appeal to their friends and supporters in Ireland on behalf of the sufferers from famine in Gujarat and Kathiawar, which have a population of at least thirty millions.

The Belfast Local Preachers' Association, which consists of about a hundred members, has just held its annual meeting in Crumlin Road Church, Belfast, under the presidency of Mr. William Montgomery, and is doing an admirable work.

The Roman Catholic priests of Athlone have become alarmed about the effects of street preaching in the town. They have denounced the preachers in their chapels, and they have warned their people not to listen to them on pain of committing a grievous sin. They have also stirred up the Urban Council to take action in the matter, and to threaten to prosecute the preachers. It is true, all this has been done under the garb of preserving the peace of the town, but it is not the street preachers who are going to break the peace, and, if the priests wanted the peace to be kept, all that was required was a word from them, urging the members of their congregations to keep quiet.

Home Missionary Notes.

By J. W. C. Fegan.

I DO not know any sight more sure to stir up home-missionary sympathy than a glimpse of the tens of thousands of home heathen, in the Kentish hop-fields.

The purlieus of London annually pour into the county proudly known as the "Garden of England," for four weeks or so, their most degraded denizens. No Christian man or woman can escape sights and sounds that especially, alas! on the Lord's Day. The air reeks with drunkenness, blasphemy, and obscenity.

A great improvement has been made in the housing of these hordes in late years, but some hop-growers till lodge their hands in damp, draughty, dilapidated huts, or crowd them together in barns, under conditions which, from both a sanitary and moral standpoint, are a crying disgrace to our country.

crowded together, eight or twelve of both sexes and all ages, in a broken-down, thatched mud hut, 10ft. square, with greenish slime on its dank walls, are helots in truth.

This season our Medical Mission Aid was organised in only three parishes, but next season we hope to establish several more centres, as, from the hop-pickers themselves, on all sides, and, what is still more encouraging, from for many seasons in their midst, comes the assurance that no Christian work has ever had a more softening influence on the hearts of the hop-pickers.

The work has been distinctly missionary; and, in addition to the preaching at each Medical Mission service, a great number of patients were dealt with individually. We had two doctors and about forty-five other workers (including about twelve of our Ramsgate Orphanage boys, whose sweet singing touched all hearts). In three weeks the doctors had and paid about 140 visits to those too sick to attend, treating about seventy-three different forms of sickness and casualty.

In one parish the District Council have bills posted announcing that diarrhœa mixture can be obtained for "adult persons" (thus leaving children, so many of whom—infants especially—suffer sadly, without any provision) at six or seven places

(BUT EACH IS A PUBLIC-HOUSE).

Across the bill is printed, "or from your employer." It seems very regrettable that these poor people should be sent for medicine where they must face not only this temptation, but almost the obligation to drink intoxicating liquors.

It is true that many of the hop-growers subsidise the local practitioner to attend to any cases recommended by them free; but, of course, he cannot cope with a temporary influx of 7,000 or 8,000 people into one parish. Besides, even if he could, he would only prescribe for their bodily needs, while a medical mission takes advantage of the bodily need to deal with

THE SIN-SICKNESS OF THE SOUL.

A Medical Mission Tent, suitably arranged on a plan experience has taught us is most convenient, with compartments in the rear for consultations, dressings, and dispensary, including forms, lamps, medical and surgical chests, &c., will cost only £68. This equipment will last for many years with care, and in one such centre in body, and be spoken to and prayed with for their souls' welfare. We want to have at least ten such tents in working order next season. I shall be glad to hear from any friends moved to help in our effort to obey the Lord's command—"Heal the sick, preach the Word."

THOUSANDS MAY BE RELIEVED

Besides the Medical Mission services, we held evangelistic meetings in some of the tents, in the camps at night, and in the village streets into which the hop-pickers flock from their "camps" on the nights when they draw a "sub" (a portion on account) of their earnings for marketing, drinking, &c.

One night I was suddenly moved to go

and got permission from the astonished landlord to bring a harmonium, our nursing sisters and our Ramsgate Orphanage Choir, right into the taproom. Many were

MELTED INTO TEARS WITHIN.

A great crowd gathered outside wondering at the strange spectacle. A hop-grower said to me, slipping half-a-sovereign into my hand, "Please take this—and you can have more when you want it—I never saw anything to touch me like this." When we got out, a crowd of the roughest men begged us to hold another service. Then, as we got nearer home, they pleaded for "Just another hymn, sir."

None of us who were in Yalding on Sunday, September 10, will forget our last service that night. The "second Sunday" is the hop-pickers' yearly At Home for the relatives and friends from London, &c. The scene baffles description. One priest was instrumental in bringing down 5,000 excursionists, many of whom arrived drunk. Some of the most disgraceful scenes met my eyes that I have ever seen in nearly thirty years' experience. As the night advanced, things grew worse. About 9 o'clock we took our stand with a shouting, singing, dancing, blaspheming, drink-maddened crowd around us.

We felt utterly helpless. It was hopeless to try to make our voices heard. The people were beside themselves. We just to God to look down in pity, and to witness to us that we were there for Him, and bid the raging elements of folly and passion "Be still." The power of God fell on us. From that moment God began to give us the victory. Poor drink-frenzied souls drew near one by one—a solemn awe began to hold them—by-and-bye not a murmur was heard—only sobs. The public-house closed; out staggered more drunken men and women to hang open-mouthed on every word. Who of us will ever forget the uncovered heads of the men, and weeping of the women, as rose from that gathering, as the stars seemed so reproachfully to look down on that sinful scene, that sweet summer night? We prayed. They would not let us go. It was almost eleven o'clock when we got to our gate, tired out with with speaking and journeying since eight in the morning. Still they entreated us—poor, ragged, half-drunken men—to go on again.

Space will not allow me to give any cases of manifest blessing in detail. Perhaps it is better, as a rule, to preach the Word, prayerfully and believingly, and let the results be proved by-and-bye; still there are some cases one longs to mention in which God's hand was so clearly seen.

I am glad to say that the most happy fellowship prevailed throughout amongst all the workers we came in contact with. We received a most hearty welcome and much valuable help from Rev. A. Havergal Shaw (the Vicar of Paddock Wood), Rev. John Leigh (the Vicar of Yalding), and Pastor Henman (the Baptist minister there); also from fellow-labourers connected with Mr. Kendon's Mission to Hop-pickers, the London City Mission, Church Army, and other home missionary agencies. All felt that "the fields are white unto harvest"—"the harvest is great"—and rejoiced that the Lord of the harvest had "thrust forth other labourers."

Now, after a Sunday at Ramsgate and Deal, I hope to settle down for our winter's work in the Homes and Missions God has committed to our care

somewhat wearied in body and mind, but much encouraged in spirit—

> Happy if with my latest breath,
> I may but grasp his name,
> Preach Him to all, and cry in death—
> "Behold, behold the Lamb."

I am sorry to add that, while I have been thus employed, the stream of help for the Lord's work in South-East London has almost dried up. On my return, I find arrears which give me much anxiety. I feel sure that when my fellow-Christians know this some of them will feel moved to help in removing a load of wearying care from

THE HEART OF A TIRED FELLOW-SERVANT.

Personally, I shall feel most grateful to all who may kindly help us in this trying juncture.

Our Homes here, at Greenwich, Ramsgate, and Toronto, are in acute need of speedy support

TO PROVIDE DAILY NECESSARIES.

Our Medical Mission in Southwark has been open all the summer. We have had more patients in August and September than we had in the spring. We did not close or curtail the work here while we were doing medical missionary work in the hop-fields.

No words of mine can describe what a boon this Medical Mission has been to this neighbourhood. We shall never know till we meet in the glory how many souls have been thus led to the feet of the Saviour. Now we sorely need the wherewithal to continue this ministry to bodies and souls, and to sustain for sending portions of appetising food to the sick poor, who need nourishment even more than medicine.

In our Home Hall, besides evangelistic services, we hold a great Mothers' Meeting, with various clubs to encourage thrifty management. This summer we were able to give some of them a week's holiday at the sea. It was such a sweet relief from the monotonous drudgery of their lives, that I hope by next summer we may have a Poor Mothers' Holiday Home.

WHO NEEDS A HOLIDAY MOST?

Surely the worn-out slum mother, trying to keep the peace and make things comfortable for all in her one-room home. "What a treat to sit down and enjoy a meal cooked for you," was the constant remark of the poor mothers this summer, as they sat down with exclamations of gratitude to a well-spread table. Surely when there are cats' homes, dogs' homes, homes of rest for horses, &c., it is time we provided homes for weary mothers. A plainly-furnished, roomy house, with a nice shady garden, near the sea or in a bracing country village, is what we need. Will not some friends perpetuate the cherished memory of a devoted mother by helping to provide and furnish such a resting-place for toiling, fainting mothers, on their weary, difficult way through life?

In our Factory Girls' Institute a most precious work is going on uninterruptedly all the year round, in influencing the hearts and lives of hundreds of girls for God, and purity, and usefulness. The restaurant is a very busy scene at mid-day when the girls get cheap, nourishing meals or gadding about the streets, and sing a hymn or two, and join in prayer before they go back to their factories.

In our Working Youths' Institute, equipped with reading-room, class-room, gymnasium, shower-baths, &c., the youths who, by foregathering at street corners in idleness at night, in so many cases and the organised outlawry that has made this part of South-East London so notorious of late, are rescued from such perils, and find a home-like, Christian influence and congenial occupation or recreation, which are such a safeguard at their critical age. The expense of maintaining such an institute in a neighbourhood, where even a railway arch commands a rental of £100 per annum, is necessarily heavy, and I think few of my Christian friends know what an important work is being done there, quite in addition to our work amongst waifs and strays.

With all these heavy responsibilities, I am in

as to the winter's work. I shrink with pain at the thought of curtailing any part of it. Only those who live day and night in a neighbourhood as I do, can estimate the need aright, or appreciate the real value of such efforts. My council and I feel we ought not to increase our liabilities. To escape the painful necessity of closing or curtailing some branches of the work, during the next few weeks.

WE NEED, AT LEAST, £2,000

I must not say more. I can only lay the crisis we are now passing through before my Christian friends, and in unceasing prayer, and believingly plead with Him to witness, by our deliverance from this dilemma, that we are here for Him, and that He has purposes of mercy through us towards thousands of dear souls in S.E. London this winter.

COMMIT THE FUTURE OF THE WORK TO GOD

The sympathy and God-speed of all my fellow-Christians will be very encouraging and comforting just now.

Y.M.C.A. Notes.

A NEW Association has been formed at Liscard in Cheshire. A building has been purchased, and is to be opened on October 7.

The Association at Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ireland, has secured, for its work, a most eligible building, which, when fully equipped, will cost about £1,500. The members of the Association have already subscribed £250.

As part of the Y.M.C.A. Forward Movement in behalf of the young men of East London, Dr. Harry Guinness has been conducting a ten days' mission in the Public Hall, Barking Road, Canning Town. Sir George Williams presided at the opening meeting.

The Autumn Conference of the Southern District Union of Y.M.C.A's. has been held at Ryde. Interesting reports were received from a number of centres, and it was stated that new associations had been formed at Poole and Boscombe. Mr. W. H. Mills, secretary of the National Council, opened a discussion upon, "How to extend, strengthen, and consolidate the Y.M.C.A. in the District," and a resolution was adopted inviting the co-operation of the Council in placing a travelling secretary in the field, which comprises the two counties of Dorset and Hants. An address upon the work of the Association among young men in heathen lands, by Mr. Frank Anderson, M.A., led to many delegates undertaking to form Foreign Missionary Departments in their associations.

"I WAS AN HUNGRED; NAKED; IN PRISON."

Eight Days' Missions conducted regularly in the Prisons of England and Wales by a special staff of Church Army Prison Missioners. Many stories can be told by these missioners of lives changed, and a new world opened out to prisoners and ex-prisoners. Men, women, and lads received direct from Prison into the Society's Homes. Special Homes for First Offenders. Help is given in cases of necessity to the families and dependents of those in prison. 72 HOMES, &c., in London and in the Provinces, from Newcastle to Plymouth, for helping those who have "fallen by the way" to help themselves, without distinction of creed.

Chaplain, Pentonville Prison, writes:—"Your labour homes are simply invaluable."

Chaplain, Durham Prison, writes:—"Your work is sound and invaluable."

Chaplain, Wormwood Scrubbs Prison, writes:—"I believe the Church Army to be doing an immense amount of good, and to be the right thing in the right place."

FUNDS and OLD CLOTHES of every description urgently pleaded for.

Central Staff almost wholly unpaid.

Christian Women in France.

SURELY there never was a time when the Lord's workers in France had more need of the prayerful help and support of his people everywhere.

A few particulars of one of the workers, Madame Dalencourt, of 33, Rue Mouton, Duvernet, Paris, may be of interest. Brought up as a strict Roman Catholic, she was, in 1859, whilst teaching in a school in London, much impressed by some words spoken to her by a Christian lady, when sympathizing with her in her father's illness. "Suppose," she said, "your good father, believing he was going to die, and not wishing to leave you without his counsel, wrote a letter for his children; and, that after his death, some of the elder brothers should take possession of the letter and say, 'We will not let you read it all, but we will let you read some extracts,' would you be satisfied? Well, your priests do that; they keep from you your Heavenly Father's letter."

These words, "Your Heavenly Father's letter," led Madame Dalencourt to read the Bible, and were the first dawn of light on her soul, though it was not till some years later that she publicly left the Church of Rome. During the Franco-German war she came to England, and whilst there became interested in the working and influence of some of the mothers' meetings in London; and on her return to Paris in 1871 she began to gather the women together in her own home.

The work thus started has extended to about twenty other towns and villages in France; other Christian women being encouraged by her example to try and teach their poorer sisters about the love of Jesus. It consists, in most places, besides the mothers' meetings, of classes for children and temperance work; and while there is and many efforts are made by priests to draw away those who come to the meetings, there is proof that God is blessing his message, in the changed lives of many, both older and younger.

Madame Peladan, who is working at Salavas, near Vallon, Ardèche, in a recent letter says: "We have had more joy this season than we have had before since we began to work for God, in seeing several decide to give themselves to Christ. One woman, unable to read, understood that Jesus Christ had entirely forgiven her sins. She has four children; and, though without much means, is trusting and joyful. A young woman of twenty-one, after six or seven months' illness, was able to tell us, several days before her death, when hearing John i. 12, 'Oh, I have received Him, I believe in Him,

HE HAS PARDONED ME!'"

This work amongst the women and children of France is under the care of a committee of English Friends, and, since 1888, a Home for the Training of French Christian Young Women as Evangelist Nurses has been carried on in Paris under Madame Dalencourt's direction. There are three mothers' meetings each week, held in different districts, to which the trainers in the Home go, besides engaging in Temperance and other work, and visiting amongst the people who attend. These young helpers are each made responsible for some department of the work, thus giving them practice in keeping accounts, writing reports, &c. They also take a course of medical lectures; and, if successful in passing the examination at the close, they are entitled to some practical experience in a hospital in Paris by daily attendance. Whilst in the Home they take their share in the household duties. The value of this branch of the Mission may be judged by the fact that there is a constant demand for the services of those who have been thus trained, most frequently occurring in country districts, which will become fresh centres, the committee believe, of great and spreading blessing. Each young woman who is accepted, after proving her suitability, is expected to contribute £12 towards the expense of her year's training; but where unable to do this, the committee have often to bear the whole expense. Since the commencement, about forty young women have passed through the Home, and nearly all of these are now actively engaged in Christian work in France.

The lease of the present house expires at the end of 1899, without option of renewal. After much inquiry as to a future location, and a careful consideration of the whole subject, in view of the increase of rents in Paris, the committee have decided to try to raise a fund of at least £2,000, to be invested in the names of four trustees, viz., J. Bevan Braithwaite, jun., Jos. G. Alexander, LL.B., Justine Dalencourt, and Catherine L. Braithwaite, the interest arising from which is to go towards the extra rent now required. The Committee have already received £1,370 of this sum (the first £400 being contributed by a friend of the work in Switzerland), and they greatly desire another £700 or £800 to enable them to meet the largely increased liabilities that the move involves.

When we consider what consecrated women have done in other lands, shall we not rejoice that the Lord has given us a share in helping to lead some of his handmaidens out into active work for Him, especially in a country where women's share in Christian work is beginning to be appreciated? The sympathy and interest of your readers will be gladly welcomed.

(Miss) C. L. Braithwaite.

Work in Buenos Aires.

A MISSIONARY paper, entitled Echoes from Argentina, published in Buenos Aires, gives the following account of the work in that city:—

"Besides ourselves, there are working in this city, and preaching the Gospel in Spanish (the language of the people), the North American Methodists, the Church of England, the Salvation Army, and the French Baptists. Work among the English-speaking people is, of course, well represented.

"What an outcry there would be if, in Glasgow or Liverpool (about the same size as Buenos Aires), there were not accommodation for more than about 2,000 people in the buildings where the Gospel was preached! And if, to reach such a place, it were necessary for thousands of people to walk miles! This is the condition of things in Buenos Aires, and the great majority of the inhabitants are living and dying in darkness. The need is unknown by English Christians.

"We have two halls as centres of work, and need the help of God's people to carry on and extend our mission to the neglected multitudes around us. We have a very earnest Dutch brother – Ramon Bysitter—full of love to Christ, ready to devote his whole time to the Lord's service, should his support be forthcoming. He has been already working as colporteur, taking from house to house the Word of God; but his sales were not sufficient to support himself and family, and he had to return to his work. We commend him to our readers.

W. C. K. Torre."

The English correspondent for the Mission is Major Mackinlay, 6, Highland Road, Upper Norwood, S.E., to whom communications may be addressed.

The Gospel at Paris Exhibition.

FRENCH Christians are purposing to erect a large hall at the coming Exhibition, capable of seating 1,500 or 2,000 persons, so that a large number may hear the pure and simple Gospel who would not otherwise do so. In the Mission Intérieure is made an earnest appeal to Protestant members all over France to co-operate in this matter. Let all English friends who are disposed to help send in their gifts promptly, as a convenient site should be secured as soon as possible. Communications may be sent to Mons. le Pasteur Houter, 7, Rue Dragon, Marseilles.

A Felt Need in India.

MISS A. G. HILL, the travelling secretary of the Indian Y.W.C.A., writes home asking very specially for prayer for the extension of the work of the Y.W.C.A. among the families of railway employés in India, and gives the following interesting account of the work already done:—

"Do ask for special prayer and help for our railroad department. India is being bisected with railroads; this is 'The Railway Age.' Government owns most of them, though some are private companies. Every railway must get out from England its workers—drivers, guards, workmen in shops—all the subordinates, besides all the engineers, superintendents and other officers, small and great. These, with their families, are set down on an open plain, and form a little city by themselves. The company owns the whole town, of course, or it may be some extra people come and settle there also, just adjoining the railway reserve. Perhaps Government may send a few companies of soldiers and officers there too, as it is convenient for all English people to live near together, as the markets then keep English food and necessaries. So it comes that there are many large centres where there are from fifty to 300 English-speaking families; but for church or Sunday school, or for their spiritual help at all.

"The companies are so good to their people; they provide reading-rooms, 'institutes,' tennis courts, and everything to try and make them satisfied to stay in India; but you can imagine how easily they drift into low ideals of spirituality or morality, when Sunday becomes as any other day, and there is nothing to help them nearer to God; but Satan and his hosts are not inactive.

"The companies see that they ought to make some provision for the spiritual needs of their people; but it is expensive to provide chaplains for each station, so they get one man, perhaps, and he has to travel over the whole line, and that may mean holding one service in three months in a place; and then only a service, no personal work—the thing most needed. They then try to give some minister who lives nearest a pass once in a while to go and hold a service.

But we want to put into each of these places an earnest Christian woman who will be there working all the time amongst the people; there is such an opportunity to work in times of illness and death. I fear if we do not do this soon, the nuns will fill up these places, as they are already doing in the educational institutions.

"Jhansi, a town I have just visited, is one of these centres, and it is a different place since Miss Stubbs, our Y.W.C.A. worker, went there three years ago. She is now the Christian leader, parish visitor, nurse, and general friend of the whole community. I only wish we had money enough to keep such a one in each large railway centre. We are wanting at this moment to buy a little house for her to live in, with a large room for meetings. The whole thing would not cost more than 2,000 rupees, and we have nearly 1,000 in hand towards it. The Indian Midland has given us 500 rupees, as Jhansi is their headquarters. This shows that the good of the work is recognised, and the railways

REALLY APPRECIATE IT.

In the meantime we must count upon the help of God's faithful stewards, many of whom He has at home, I know. Please ask for much prayer for this railway department."

We would, at the same time, ask for prayer for the Secretary of the World's Y.W.C.A., Miss A. M. Reynolds, who sails on October 6 for a six months' tour in India. She goes to visit the different branches of the Association, and encourage the workers; also to collect information which may, with God's help, aid in the extension of his Kingdom, and may be of benefit in stimulating the interest of the various branches at home in missionary work.

The offices of the World's Y.W.C.A. are at 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

Soldiers in India.

PLEASE let me appeal to such of your readers as care for our soldiers, and commiserate their lot in India, far from home influences, from friends, from all that tends to check evil courses.

Wellington, in the Nilgiris of Madras, is the hill station of Madras. An entire regiment is stationed there, and, in addition, there is a depôt for invalids, &c. Men on furlough from the plains go up there. Women and children are sent there to recruit.

Mrs. Moore has, single-handed, started a soldiers' home there, which is in course of construction; but will have to be stopped if funds are not forthcoming at once. We want £800 to build and furnish the home. Address, Mrs. Moore, Soldiers' Home, Wellington, India. Alfred Porcelli, Colonel R.E.

Evangelistic.

Mr. Charrington's Work.

A PRAYING people are a successful people. In the Divine order of things this must be so. The prayer meeting in connection with Mr. Charrington's work, held every Saturday night, is an indication of the earnestness of the workers, and their anxiety for the souls' salvation of their neighbours and friends. When a thousand persons can be found once a week gathered together to plead with God for souls, it is no wonder that blessing follows the preaching of his truth. Although the month of September has not been so fine as previous months, yet the great tent has been comfortably filled each week-night, and the services in the Great Assembly Hall attended with above the average for the time of year.

Rev. John T. Vine, whose evangelistic efforts have been so blessed in America for the past twenty years, was the preacher. His thoughtful, earnest, telling addresses were greatly blessed, and many good cases have been recorded as the result of his preaching.

One of the pleasing features of the work has been the increase in the interest shown in the "men's own" meetings on Sunday afternoons. Mr. Vine and others have addressed the men. Some of the roughest of the neighbourhood have been induced to attend the gatherings, and not a few have come out boldly in front of their fellows and confessed Christ.

Work in South Wales.

The bright summer months have presented golden opportunities for our open-air and tent-mission work, of which we have readily availed ourselves. Night by night the Gospel trumpet has sounded forth the grand old story of God's grace and love for poor lost sinners. We could relate many touching cases of conversion. Let one suffice. A sailor, coming up to one of the brethren at the tent door, asked if God would save such a sinner as he? Yes, to be sure! The man came for that special purpose; and, led inside, he gave heed to the preacher. At the close of the meeting, he was on his knees praying for salvation. Afterwards he told us of a vision which he had on board ship, six days previously; how he was seen in the Gospel tent, and had become a Christian! This vision had worked mightily on his mind, and was used, doubtless, by the Lord in leading him to Himself.

The wonderful influence of a mother's love and care is strikingly seen in these rough sons of toil; the last tender feeling left in them is often love for their mothers. This should encourage all Christian parents to keep praying for their prodigal sons and daughters.

An urgent need at the present hour is a shelter for men in Barry Docks. There is nothing of the kind here. Many men come here in the hope of getting a ship, or some work, but, alas! in many cases meet with disappointment, and at night are at their wits' end to know where to lay their weary head. They come to us in their distress, and it is very hard to have to turn them away. We try to find some kind of refuge, such as sleeping in the smaller hall; but, of course, we cannot do that too often. We could furnish a shelter for £50. The cold months will soon be upon us, and what is done must be done quickly.

Gerald R. Coultas.

Mission House, Barry Dock, South Wales.

Mr. George Bennett reports blessing at the recently concluded seaside services for young people at Blackpool and Aberystwith. Both young and old were profited, and the workers were much encouraged.

During the special meetings conducted by Mr. E. Telford in connection with the Borough Baptist Mission, Southwark, large numbers of people gathered, and not an evening passed in which some did not confess Christ. E. P.-C.

Mr. Ben Alberto has been engaged during the past few weeks in Evangelistic work, in connection with Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road. Midday meetings have been held among the workmen who labour at the various extensive factories in the vicinity. At the evening meetings in the Mission Hall, several persons yielded to Christ.

A fortnight's mission has been held at Seend, Melksham, by Mr. C. B. Jolliffe, in one of the Evangelization Society's tents. Though the start was difficult, owing to the opposition shown, yet God graciously overruled matters and quite a large number of believers and unbelievers testified that they had received blessing. It was with real sorrow many of us viewed the taking down of the tent for the season. A. M.

A Gospel Tent Mission has been carried on at Wrexham since June last by Mr. J. Bollard. The meetings have been well attended, the open-air gatherings especially have attracted numerous hearers, and large quantities of tracts have been distributed. The workers were cheered by some decisions for Christ, while the Lord's people were stimulated to more aggressive service. The closing meeting of the mission took the form of a conference, Messrs. F. S. Arnot, Cox, and Ashworth taking part.

A sixteen days' mission has been held at the Gospel Tent Mission, Penge. On two Sundays the meetings were conducted by Mr. Ned Wright, and on the third by Mr. Russell Hurditch, who kindly lent the tent. At the week-night meetings, which were conducted by local ministers and friends, the tent was generally filled, and on Sundays it was densely crowded. Many professed to pass from death to life. At the concluding Monday's service, the Divine presence was felt to a remarkable degree; several persons were broken down, calling upon God to save them.

The Brothers Weaver have concluded a fortnight's mission in the Cecil Street P.M. Chapel, Carlisle, this being their fourth annual visit. Although the weather was boisterous, large companies attended the meetings, some of the people coming many miles to the services. From the very commencement, power accompanied the singing and preaching, and the greatest interest was manifested by the people. Many entered the inquiry room and professed to find the Saviour. Many others were deeply convicted of sin. The singing of Mr. Frank Weaver was a great attraction, while the preaching of Mr. Bewley Weaver was with power.

G. E. Lloyd, Primitive Methodist Minister.

The London Street Mission is continuing to do a good work in the new premises, Percy Hall, Abbey Street, Bermondsey. On Thursday last, at a special gathering, addresses were delivered by Miss Wardrop, Miss Patricia Thomson, and Mrs. Bustin (Madame Annie Ryall). A deep impression resulted, and on Mr. Bustin asking for decisions, one young woman rose, and subsequently several others expressed concern of soul, and a soldier, who was present, made his first public confession of Christ. Again, on Sunday night, after an address by Mr. Joseph Kitchin, there were other decisions for Christ in response to Mr. Bustin's appeal.

A ten days' mission at Ulverston has been conducted by Mr. Josiah Nix, the Wesleyan Connexional lay Evangelist. In addition to the usual mission services, Mr. Nix gave two Bible readings, addressed meetings for men, and also for women only, and held a great temperance meeting. The attendances at all the meetings were large beyond expectation, even although all the houses in the town had been visited twice. On both Sunday evenings, and at the final meeting, the chapel was crowded, in spite of unfavourable weather. Mr. Nix preached with his usual power, and deep spiritual influence attended all the meetings. Persons of varied ages and classes entered the inquiry rooms; a large number professed to find peace; and over two hundred temperance pledges were taken. The oldest officials and members testify that they never remember such services and scenes in the old chapel. Such a blessed mission, following the laying of the memorial stone of the new church, opens a bright and prosperous future for Methodism in the old town of Ulverston.

R. W. G. H.

Speaking at the noon prayer meeting at Aldersgate Street on Monday last, Mr. William Grove gave a cheering report of the opening services at the Nine Elms Tent. Headed by the vicar of the parish, Rev. A. G. Wilcox, the workers processioned the slums on Saturday evening, and the subsequent meeting was attended by hundreds of working-class people. A number were under the influence of alcohol. On Sunday, in spite of much wind and rain, the meetings were well attended. At night the tent was crowded. Help was cordially given by the vicar and his congregation, and there were some remarkable cases of professed conversion. Mr. A. Holness referred to the work at the Peckham Rye tent. On the previous Sunday the addresses of Rev. John T. Vine were with power, and, out of the large gathering which assembled at night, there were a number of seekers, who evinced deep concern and sincerity. The meeting was continued until a late hour. Mr. Holness was impressed by the way in which people were convicted by quoted words of Scripture, and added that, while only a week since they were praying for Revival, they were now in the full tide of one.

Obituary.

MR. CHARLES MACLEOD.

THE late Mr. Chas. Macleod, who recently passed away at Glasgow, at the age of eighty-four years, was born in Easter Ross in 1815. In 1843, he was appointed town missionary of Inverness. For about fifty years he was actively employed in different parts of the country as missionary in connection with the Free Church. During the last thirty-five years he was settled in Islay, Argyllshire, where he was highly esteemed for his consistent Christian character, and where his labours were greatly blessed and appreciated.

MRS. LEECH, PORTRUSH.

The death is announced of Mrs. Leech, widow of the late Mr. Charles Leech, Q.C., of Dublin. She died at her residence, in Portrush, at the ripe age of nearly eighty-two years, on September 26, and was interred in Mount Jerome Cemetery, Dublin. She was longing to "go home" and meet loved ones "gone before," and spoke much of this during the last few weeks of her pilgrimage.

REV. R. J. WILLIAMSON.

After a long and painful illness, endured with wonderful fortitude and resignation, Rev. Robert John Williamson, pastor of the Teddington Baptist Church, passed to his rest on Saturday, September 23. Some years ago he lost his wife, and, not being of robust physique, the sense of bereavement, together with the incessant strain of the pastorate, sufficed to break down his health, and at the early age of forty-one he has gone to his reward. He was greatly beloved by all who knew him, and at his funeral not only all the local Free Church ministers, but the vicar of the parish and his curate, participated in the service.

Notes & Comments

IN response to the call of the National Free Church Council, a large number of Christian people assembled in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C., on Monday afternoon, to pray for the preservation of peace. Dr. Clifford presided, and was supported by Revs. Hugh Price Hughes, M.A., and Thomas Law. The meeting was characterized by quiet earnestness and intensity. May we call our readers generally to prayer in this matter, and suggest that in their petitions they remember the natives, who have large interests in the controversy.

If a twentieth part of the attention paid to the grievances of the Uitlander in South Africa were given to the wretchedness and destitution and vicious surroundings of our own festering population in Spitalfields and other crowded parts of our great city, it would be better for ourselves and for the world. Nothing would raise any nation in the estimation of all others so much as a watchful care to preserve the weak from becoming wicked, and the poor from being trodden down into hopelessness and despair.

The result of the Venezuelan award is a thorough triumph for the principle of arbitration as a remedy for long-standing disputes between nations. The one in question had been the cause of friction between this country and America for a couple of hundred years, and four years ago had almost led to war between the two countries. By referring the case to arbitration, Britain has established the reasonableness of the claims she had put forward over the disputed territory, and ensured a final settlement of a long-standing and sore disagreement. Venezuela, on her side, has received a solatium in the possession of the coveted mouth of the Orinoco. The unanimity of the members of the Commission—a unique fact, so far, in the history of arbitrations—gives special weight to the award, and effectually closes the question.

While the war-clouds are massing more and more densely over the South African Colonies, so that scarcely a ray of hope remains for the preservation of peace, this gratifying issue of the Venezuelan problem helps us to believe that the Peace Conference has not failed of its purpose. Every successful arbitration makes with increasing emphasis for general peace. It means one more war avoided, with its countless sufferings and its inevitable heritage of sorrow and bitterness. However far off the day may be before the sword will finally become a pruning-hook, we must be thankful at the slow, but steady, discredit into which the war spirit is sinking, the increasing unwillingness of civilized peoples to appeal to the "gauge of battle" for the settlement of their disagreements. The deepening relief felt everywhere at such results as this is indeed a reason for devout thankfulness.

The very mention of the word Reformation has become a source of offence to the Church Times and its party, and an indignant protest is made in its columns against the Bishop of Winchester's significant reference to it in his recent pastoral, "which conveys the impression that never before Cranmer's day was there any pure form of Christianity known to exist." This High-Church organ goes so far as to say: "In the long history of the Catholic Church, the Reformation, after all, was a mere moment, a single episode." Well, there are episodes and episodes. Even a man's conversion may be described, from one point of view, as "a mere moment." Nevertheless, such moments are fraught with a significance which Eternity cannot exhaust. And the Reformation, if it was an "episode, a mere moment," was just the episode and moment which gave a new course to history, and rescued the Gospel from the grave-clothes of a moribund ecclesiasticism, "loosing it and letting it go" on a new career of life and conquest. But for the Reformation, what would have become of the true faith, and of practical Christianity?

It would appear that at a time when the principle of episcopal authority is under a cloud in the Anglican Church, and practical obedience is at a discount, the Archbishop of York deliberately belittles his own position by his vacillation over the incense question. Having officially denounced the use of it as unauthorized by the Rubrics, while on the one hand he counsels his clergy to obedience to the double archiepiscopal mandate, he proceeds on the other hand to confess that "personally" he regards incense, "when used after the scriptural model, as one of the most beautiful and most significant symbols of Divine service;" that he is "not without sympathy" for those who, feeling thus, are called upon to discontinue its use, and plainly hints that he is not without hope that in future there may be a relaxation of the present rigour. All this clearly shows that the sacerdotal temper has permeated the Church only too thoroughly, and that the highest officials are only waiting their opportunity to evade public watchfulness to carry on their illegal and anti-Protestant practices. This snake is scotched, not killed. Protestants, once awake, will do well not to go to sleep again.

In corroboration of the above, we may refer to a sentence in the St. Ethelburga Parish Magazine, where the editor, Dr. Cobb, speaking in the name of those Ritualists who have suddenly surrendered to the Archbishops' mandate, writes:—

> It is not only politic to obey the Archbishop's decision, but a duty. It is politic, because disobedience only means further strife in the Church, and further strife means that Parliament will shortly be invited to put an end to the strife. Already it is pretty certain that the next Parliament will be strongly Protestant. It is, therefore, abject folly to give additional reason for making it still more Protestant.

This is a frank avowal of policy, and should be duly weighed by those who think that the Church crisis is over. Clearly, we shall hear less and less about Catholic doctrine and usages till election time, in the hope that the British nation, so easy to send to sleep, will forget all about Ritualism; but if the next Parliament is not strongly Protestant, we shall probably see developments which will startle us when too late. The moral is obvious.

The close relation between superstition and Romanism is once more illustrated by the accounts that are published by a society started among the pious Catholics at Turin for the distribution of wonder-working medallions and other charms. As usual, it is a money-making business. The idea was started with a view to obtain funds for the building and endowment of various institutions in memory of a worthy citizen of Turin, Don Bosco by name. Funds are flowing in as a result of certain marvellous cures already effected by prayer and contributions. We hear of ten francs saving a man from mortal sickness; of a person with an incurable sore in the neck cured at a cost of five francs, and of other marvels. This exploitation of the faith of simple folk in the interests of the "Church" is an old story. There is no end to the credulity of ignorance, and to the ingenuity which preys upon it in the name of "religion." Only the "open Bible" can effectually deal with such travesties of the real thing.

We are glad to hear that the Bishop of Winchester, in that portion of his charge at Portsea which deals with the observance of Holy Communion, condemns, in strong terms, the use of certain booklets and devotional manuals bearing upon the subject. One of these specious publications warned the child-candidate under instruction > to wash its mouth overnight, lest if this were done in the morning a drop of water might be accidentally swallowed. [Another teacher]. If you swallow even a drop of water that is breaking your fast. To make your Communion after breaking your fast dishonours Jesus; it is a sin against the Holy Ghost if done wilfully, and against light it is a mortal sin.

The conference recently held by the Commercial Travellers' Christian Association, on the subject of "Secret Commissions," was timely and important. The evil in question is a steadily growing one, and, as one of the speakers (a Member of Parliament) said, the legislation that had been proposed, while essential, cannot be expected to do much without a thorough awakening of public opinion on the subject. Until recently this country has been tolerably free from the practice, which, in America and France, has become too much of a common-place to be a matter of comment. There are abundant sources of corruption, dishonesty, and faithlessness in commercial life, and nothing short of a higher standard of honour among all concerned will effectively deal with it. The members of the above association are just the people who have most influence in starting this reformation. If they loyally abide by their resolution to do so, they will render the country and true religion a signal service.

The current issue of The Puritan contains a very serious and weighty contribution, by the editor, on the duty of Christian people towards the stage. The writer speaks from long acquaintance with the inner life of the theatrical profession, at a time when he was on the staff of The Sketch; and his indictment of the morality and influence of the modern drama is scathing and pitiless. The kind of play that is nowadays popular is such as no lover of purity is consistently able to patronize; and the efforts to raise the tone of theatrical life have, so far, been of little account. The article is one which, if it contains little that is new to those acquainted with actual facts, puts those facts before the reader in a way to bring home some very sad conclusions, and should give very serious reflection to such as still cling to the idea that they may frequent or occasionally visit playhouses while making an open profession of Christian discipleship.

During recent weeks, while Birthday Congratulations have been reaching us from all parts of the world acknowledging the blessing which God has given upon the circulation of The Christian during "these forty years," we have been cheered to receive many words of warm thanks for our "Day by Day" page. For years past, whether in the form of Bible reading-notes or of short spiritual meditations, this feature of our paper has met with warm appreciation. The last series of this character, containing a helpful daily reading based on a passage from each succeeding chapter of the Holy Scriptures, has been issued in volume form, five handy little books completing the work. These are among the most blessed products of Mr. Meyer's prayer and thought, and form an important item in his wider ministry. In order to make the volumes more generally acceptable, the set has now been issued in a cheap form, and in a neat cloth case. (5s. nett, upwards. Morgan & Scott.)

Sir Wemyss Reid, the veteran journalist, who has just retired from the editorship of The Speaker, gives it as his experience that no man can succeed as a writer for the Press who has not convictions, or who does not write up to those he has. Faith and honesty are necessary graces even in a political editor. Sir Wemyss says that "the man who writes without convictions, or contrary to his own views, cannot permanently impose on the public," the public mind having a keen consciousness of reality and unreality. May it never be dimmed!

There is a general desire among leading temperance reformers to sink minor differences, and to make a determined forward movement on the basis of the minority report of the recent Licensing Commission. The lines of advance will be broadened so as to make it possible for teetotalers and such "moderates" as are sincerely anxious for the reform of the drink traffic to join their forces. There is abundant ground for these two classes to occupy in common. Lady Henry Somerset, in this month's Contemporary, makes a powerful plea for united action on a broad and liberal platform. It is a hopeful sign that the question is about to pass into the broader phase, for by this time it is clear that the policy of "all or nothing" in temperance legislation is doomed, at any rate for the present. Those who would remove the superabundant temptations to strong drink out of the path of the community must be prepared to sink personal preferences, and work with others who, in spite of minor differences of opinion, are at one on the great central principle.

We are glad to see two things in the temperance movement at the present time—a determined effort to increase the number of pledged abstainers, and a willingness to accept Lord Peel's suggestions for diminishing the power of the drink traffic. The first is of primary importance; for, without a large number of men and women who have deep convictions and strong feelings on temperance, nothing can be done. They are the army of workers and fighters. The movement, like all moral movements, must ultimately rest upon individual conviction: the personal conscience must be the barrier to the surging tide of intoxication, and also the supreme force that impels to new and victorious effort. Therefore, may great success attend the campaign for new pledges. Were one-half the Christians who are non-abstainers, brought over, to say nothing of others, it would be a vast gain to the forces that make for righteousness. And if, in addition, there can be vigorous concentration to carry out Lord Peel's ideas, temperance reform will certainly be on the up-grade.

No reform in the drink problem is more to be desired than the abolition of grocers' licences, and there are few that would command the intelligent assent of the community more thoroughly. It is one of the leading recommendations of Lord Peel's minority report. The amount of private drinking to which this form of licence has, directly and indirectly, given rise can never be fully known, for by the nature of the case the statistics are impossible to arrive at. Many families have been ruined, many fair lives been wrecked, and many more have been crippled in all that makes for holiness and self-control, through the undue facilities which it has afforded women to obtain intoxicants without detection. It is probably responsible for more female drunkenness than any other forms of licence; and, as the evil is rapidly on the increase, it is high time it should be dealt with, and that with a firm hand.

It is a common belief that there is no nation so difficult to evangelize as the Jews. As regards certain classes there is, no doubt, much truth in this. But as regards the Jewish race generally, it would appear that the truth points exactly in the contrary direction. A remarkable confirmation of this position is afforded by a three-volume work on the relation of the Jewish people to Christianity, from the pen of Pastor de le Roi. His results are summarized in a long article in Nathanael, a mission journal edited by Prof. Strack, of Berlin University. He points out that a great revolution has taken place in the attitude of Israel towards modern civilization, the old barriers of exclusiveness being gradually broken down, and with that the hopeless antagonism hitherto shown towards the Christian faith. Since the beginning of this century, when this revolution began, the number of Jews who have embraced some form of the Christian faith is startlingly large.

The figures relating to these extraordinary facts are conclusive. Taking the results from the Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Greek Churches, together with those of organized missions to the Jews, we find that the Jews have, of late years, been more accessible to Christian influences than any non-Christian nation. Here is a summary of the number of Jews who have received the rite of Christian baptism since the beginning of this century:—Protestants, 72,740; Roman Catholics, 57,300; Greek Catholic Church, 74,500, which makes a total of 204,540. To these must be added the effect of mixed marriages, which have almost always resulted in favour of Christianity, which would swell the above figures by 20,000 more. The annual additions now being made to the above forms of Church life from Hebrew sources (following the same order) are as follows:—1,450, 1,250, 1,100; and mixed marriages, 1,450; total, 5,250. At this rate, which is steadily increasing, the final conversion of the ancient people of God to faith in his Son is a dream within practical scope of fulfilment.

Some startling facts have just been brought to light as to the profits of bookmakers. From documents found by the police, it was clearly shown that one man's profits during the past year came to nearly £14,000. It is appalling to read that the amount of money taken for this period, in this small room in Camden Town, was nearly £40 a day, including Sundays. The balances of loss and gain also showed that on the average the proportion was steadily kept up at two to three. That the bookmaker is sure to win in the end is a commonplace of betting; but that his methods were cunningly calculated, so that for every sovereign he lost he always won 30s., will probably be a melancholy surprise to his victims. There are some trades that thrive on the unbounded folly of men. Unfortunately the supply, in spite of all such warnings, seems unfailing, and the results are disastrous to the community.

In an article in the North American Review on the late Colonel Ingersoll, Dr. H. M. Field, while allowing the great influence as an anti-Christian teacher which he wielded on certain minds in America during his lifetime, rightly says that it will not survive him. "You cannot," he says, "make a party out of a man, nor a creed out of mere negations." How true this is may be seen in the utter collapse of the Bradlaugh party in this country. Since his death nothing has been heard of it, and the hall in which he delivered his famous infidel lectures is now used for religious meetings. Both men were orators of the first order, and they sacrificed a great deal for their cause. With all their rhetoric and their striking personalities, however, their teaching was still-born. It was an attempt to feed the soul on the east wind. They were mere voices, without a message. And so while the Gospel which they attacked remains unshaken, and goes on its conquering way, their attempt to discredit it will soon be forgotten. (1 Cor. iii. 12, 13.)

A Call to United Prayer.

THE present time of difficulty is, indeed, a great opportunity for making effective use of the Christian's great weapon—prayer

Diplomacy seems powerless to obtain a peaceful settlement of the Transvaal difficulty, and negotiations appear to be at a deadlock; but what diplomacy (of itself) cannot do, prayer can. Let us then use the Christian's weapon unitedly, and with our whole heart.

It may be said that we do not know that it is God's will that there should be peace, and, therefore, cannot pray with faith; but when we consider that war would probably put back the progress of the Gospel in South Africa for years, and cause deep racial hatred for generations, I think we shall come to the conclusion that if we do not have peace it will not be from God's unwillingness to grant it, but from our want of prayer, or our lack of faith.

As the need for a settlement is so urgent, let us on Thursday or Friday evening of this week, say at eight o'clock, either in our own homes or at public or private gatherings, pray earnestly and unitedly that the Holy Spirit may so operate on the hearts and minds of those in authority here and in South Africa that, IN HIS OWN WAY, peace may be preserved.

Can we not have "faith as a grain of mustard seed," and say to this war-cloud, "Be thou removed?"

We have often sung at Keswick, "I believe God answers prayer." Can we not believe for this?

"If thou canst believe, all things are possible."

"I will yet for this be inquired of—to do it for them." J. H. Greene.

"A Very Nathanael."

By Rev. Dr. CULROSS.

AMONG the earliest disciples was Nathanael of Cana in Galilee. Philip of Bethsaida, who seems to have been a friend, told him one day that the promised Messiah had been discovered, and invited him to come and see for himself, which he did. The account of the interview is extremely simple, and at the same time suggestive. It repays careful study, for the view which it gives of our Lord. I wish to take note of only one thing in the account—the description of Nathanael as "an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile."

Nathanael had that in him which turned Jacob into Israel. Just as men who believe God are children of Abraham, so this man was an Israelite—an Israelite not in mere seeming, but an Israelite, indeed, before Him who seeth in secret, and to whose eye all hearts lie open. An Israelite, indeed, in whom was no guile. The first Israel had guile—a crafty man who gained his ends by scheming and "policy." The guile was never wholly taken out of him. Nathanael simple, transparent, true, was an Israelite without the guile.

It is not uncommon to describe some simple-hearted man with nothing in him as "a very Nathanael." But must there not be far in a man to warrant the application of a title so noble? Must there not be the prayer power, which turned Jacob into a prince, and won him the name of Israel? Is not a true Nathanael a man who can pray?

We are taken back to that night when the name was given to Jacob. He is on his way homeward from his long exile. From the heights of Gilead he has his first glimpse of that land from which he had fled more than twenty years before. The sight revives the past, and confronts him with his old sin, as if it had been done yesterday. Though he and his brother Esau had, doubtless, heard of each other once and again, yet no interchange of kindness seems to have taken place throughout the long years; no acknowledgment of fault on the one side, and no forgiving on the other. Ignorant of his brother's mood, miserably conscious of the wrong he had done, and eager to conciliate, Jacob sent messengers to Esau desiring to find grace in his sight. The messengers return with tidings that Esau was on the way to meet him, attended by four hundred men. It was not like brother meeting brother after a parting of so many years; and Jacob's worst fears are aroused.

What is to be done? The schemer's disposition comes into view. First of all, he divides his company into two bands, moving them along different lines, so that if one should be smitten, the other might have a chance of escaping; and then, having put everything in train, he

BETAKES HIMSELF TO PRAYER.

He has reached the brook Jabbok, which struggles through the forest-clad mountains of Gilead, and falls into the Jordan a few miles below Succoth. The dreaded hour is fast nearing, and action must be taken at once. A man's gift makes room for him and pacifies anger; so, in order to propitiate his brother, he sends forward a costly present from his flocks and herds to him, drove after drove. Nervously anxious, he sent his two wives, his women-servants, his eleven sons, and all that he had, across the brook, dividing them so that all risks might not be in one venture; and he, himself, was left alone on the other side, like the captain of a ship from which passengers and crew have gone, himself the last to leave.

Left alone! It is night, the constellations of the Syrian sky shedding a faint gleam on the labyrinth of foliage around, and on the quivering surface of the stream. There is no one to whom he can speak in the unendurable suspense. Is it only Esau he has to reckon with? All of a sudden, unknown hands seize him in the gloom, and a struggle ensues (unparalleled even among the marvels of the Bible), which lasts all through the night, "till the rising of the dawn." In whose grasp is he held? He does not know. In the outset his antagonist is "a man" like himself, and not till the close of the struggle does the human melt away and leave him in the grasp of God. Throughout the night held his own. Though years of shepherd hardihood had knit Jacob's frame into that of an athlete, he gains no advantage; strength and skill seemed matched with strength and skill. All night long, beneath the awful heavens, with no spectator, the silent conflict goes on.

But it is an equal struggle only in appearance. As dawn approaches the Stranger touches the socket of Jacob's thigh, just at the point on which a wrestler most depends; and on the instant his thigh is out of joint, his strength is gone, and the combat is decided. As if now content, the mysterious combatant says, "Let me go, for the day breaketh—unloose thy useless grasp, and I will now leave thee." A strange request from the victor. Does strength, then, yield to weakness? Earlier in the struggle Jacob might gladly have let Him go, but knowing now that this is no mere mortal antagonist, the helpless man, though maimed and pained, retains his grasp, like one who holds on for life's sake; nay, with the boldness of all-conquering faith, he cries out as he clings, "I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me." There is nothing mightier or more prevailing than this.

Hitherto Jacob had been trying to manage both his own affairs and God's. He had schemed himself into exile; he had schemed himself into wealth; he is now scheming his way back to the old home. But in his scheming he has been leaving God out of his reckoning. This night the whole significance of his past mode of acting is made clear to him, and, renouncing it,

HE THROWS HIMSELF ON HIS CONQUEROR:

"I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me." Here is prayer in its nakedness; no feint; no petition which it is "proper" to make, but which the heart does not urge; no set words that once burned and glowed in every syllable, but are now only cold platitudes; no finely-turned phrases that charm the ear of the listener without reaching heaven—but the whole soul tense as it cries out to the living God.

Thus, from the forth-putting of his own strength, and trust in his own devices, Jacob falls back on prayer; self-confidence gives place to bold petition. And not in vain. The blessing that could not have been compelled by force or skill is freely yielded to suppliant weakness. A new name is given him, token of a new and nobler character. Men sometimes live much in an hour or two; the experience of years may be condensed within the limits of a night. So with this man. He enters the conflict Jacob; he comes out of it Israel. This is the first part of the blessing—an Israel-name given, an Israel-character created, in that night of wrestling; the schemer turned into a patient waiter on God. And just this is what constitutes one "a very Nathanael"—an Israelite indeed.

It would be interesting to look at other things in the narrative, but space is more than exhausted.

This night scene, under the Syrian sky, thousands of years ago, unique, mysterious, two figures stepping forth and meeting from the two worlds, wrestling silent through the dark, fascinates the imagination. But it is fitted to do more. It is a revelation of God. It is true that scornful men have found something inexpressibly grotesque in this "story of Almighty God wrestling all night with a herdsman," unable to throw him or get away from him. But how significant the night conflict becomes when it dawns upon us that in God's dealings with the human soul. He who brought the race into being, could stamp it out; but his Spirit "strives" with men. It is this very thing that has been going on throughout man's history, and that makes "this battlefield of earth" the most tragic yet glorious place in the universe. Did we only know what went on last night in the next street, with men who lay tossing and sleepless till dawn, an intolerable and wild agony convulsing them, and fears like ocean billows sweeping over them, while their very soul shrank, we should cease to be surprised at this night encounter.

Nay, our own experience might teach us. In some season of distress, with guilty memories, and with evil fronting us or lurking unseen in the dark, we make our dispositions to meet all possible contingencies. To-morrow is to bring the crisis that decides our fate. We lie down—but not to rest. In strange, trance-like mood, we turn everything over in our mind, again and again; in troubled vision we review the possibilities and precautions we have taken, for the hundredth time. The soul seems to get involved in a life and death struggle, in which every nerve sympathises. Suddenly, as by the touch of God, we are made to realize the nothingness of our strength; self-confidence dies; we are helpless in the grasp of an Almighty power, which we know is not Fate but Love; and now we cling and cry in undespairing helplessness, "I will not let Thee go, except Thou bless me." As we cry thus to the living God, a great peace floods the soul. Losing self-confidence in Divine trust, we say, with thankful gladness, "When I am weak, then am I strong." We can calmly wait any crisis now.

Come.

Come unto Me, poor troubled soul,
My cleansing blood can make thee whole,
And set thy spirit free.
The healing stream from day to day
Will take the power of sin away,
And make thee live to Me.

Come into Me, in Me abide,
Safe sheltered in my wounded side,
The sure abiding place.
With Me commune, in Me confide,
Then happy be whate'er betide,
Sufficient is my grace.

Come under Me—learn in my school,
And let the Master bear the rule
In all thy daily life;
Put all the government on Me,
No end of peace there then will be,
Where all before was strife.

Yes, Jesus Lord, I come to Thee,
Thou shalt my full salvation be,
Now take me while I call;
Reveal thy Spirit's life in me,
Peace, purity, and power to see,
In Thee to find it all.

Studies in Zechariah:

Fasts Turned to Feasts.

ZECHARIAH VII., VIII.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

THE Jews, during their captivity, appear to have observed four fasts. Four months were darkened by them. That of the tenth month re-called the first enclosure of Jerusalem by the lines of circumvallation. That of the fourth month commemorated the capture of the city in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer. xxxix. 2, lii. 6, 7); of the fifth, the disaster which capped all, when the house of the Lord was set on fire (lii. 12-14); that of the seventh, the murder of Gedaliah, resulting in the dispersion of the remnant (xli. 1-3).

The Jewish year was thus filled with sad retrospects, and the national life was perpetually oppressed with gloom; for it is clear that the observance of these days was a rigorous obligation (Zech. vii. 4-6).

On their return from captivity the people still maintained these fasts, and it seems to have struck some of the exiles who had settled in Bethel as altogether incongruous to continue wearing sackcloth, and casting ashes on their heads, when the Holy City was rapidly rising from the dust, and regaining much of her former prosperity and beauty. It seemed to savour of unreality and hypocrisy to continue to profess a grief which had long since been assuaged, and even changed into great joy. Surely the confessions and lamentations, which were befitting enough in Babylon, were out of place in the land of their fathers. They sent, therefore, a deputation to the house of God, to consult the priests and prophets congregated there, saying: "Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years?" (Zech. vii. 1-3.)

It was a very reasonable inquiry, and becoming to honourable men, who felt that fasting and mourning must be both meaningless in themselves and displeasing to God, unless they were the outward expression of the soul's genuine emotions. It was surely worse than useless to keep up an antiquated form, the effigy of the past, the withered mummy of a service which once expressed the most profound anguish and repentance. It is, above all things, necessary to be real in our religious life, never to profess what we do not feel. Do not keep up a form for form's sake, if you have left behind the experience of which it was once the expression. Nothing will so deaden the soul as the maintenance of rites from which the fire and light have died, leaving them as the scoriæ of the volcano.

Zechariah seems to have given four separate answers to this inquiry. Four times "The Word of the Lord of Hosts" came to him.

In the first (vii. 4-7), he reminds the people that these fasts were of their own appointing; and suggests the inference, therefore, that as they had inaugurated them, they were at liberty to discontinue them when they chose. He suggests the further inference, also, that it would have been far better if, instead of appointing fasts, which satisfied national sentiment, the people had set themselves to ponder the words of the older prophets: Should ye not hear the words which the Lord hath cried by the former prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited, and in prosperity? It is so much easier to set up fasts, and to insist on outward observances, than to bow down the heart before God, and to obey the ordinances which He has enjoined.

In the second (vii. 8-14), the prophet says, that whatever they may or may not do with respect to the outward fast, they should at least exemplify the spirit of true religion, which was of priceless importance. Execute true judgment, and show mercy and compassion every man to his brother; and oppress not the widow, nor the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor; and let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart. Thus had God spoken to their fathers, and thus He was now speaking with them. Their fathers had refused to hear, but had made their hearts as an adamant stone; and it had befallen, therefore, that, as they were deaf to God's cry, so He had been to theirs. He had scattered them as with a whirlwind, and left their land desolate. Thus Zechariah implored the people of his time not to yield to the obtuseness and disobedience of their fathers, that they might escape their fate, and that no catastrophe should interrupt the resurrection of their nation, or cast it back into the disasters with which it had been visited.

In his third answer (viii. 1-17), Zechariah dilates on the great prosperity which was awaiting the chosen city. The Lord had returned to dwell there, to constitute Jerusalem the city of truth; and Zion, his holy mountain. The streets should yet be full of old men and women, staff in hand for very age. The ringing, careless laughter of boys and girls at play should proclaim the prosperity and security of the times. From east and west, contingents of exiles should troop back to repopulate the former desolations. Now I will not be unto the remnant of this people as in the former days, saith the Lord of Hosts. For there shall be the seed of peace; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to inherit all these things.

And, again, on these delightful promises ensue the reiterated appeals, that every man should speak truth with his neighbour, that true judgment should be executed in the gates, and that all things which God hated should be put away. It was as though these golden visions of prosperity and blessedness were enumerated to convince the chosen people that God desired to remember their sins no more; and to urge that, instead of dwelling mournfully on the past, they should launch upon the swelling tide of light and love, which was creeping up their shores.

This is God's way still. He chastens sorely. If we profane his name and pollute his temple; if we strike hands in ungodly alliances, and go after strange gods; if we dye our hands in the vats of the world's vanity, we are sent, as Israel was, into captivity, and our seventy years are fulfilled. But when we have profited by his stern discipline, and returned to Him with all our heart and soul, we are restored to our former position, God's hand wipes the tears from our eyes, and He bids us turn from our bitter repinings over an irretrievable past to accept the unalloyed mercy, which remembers our sins no more:

> God who, whatever frenzy of our fretting
> Vexes sad life to spoil and to destroy,
> Lendeth an hour for peace and for forgetting,
> Setteth in pain the jewel of his joy.

Such dealings with his rebellious and erring children are very wonderful. They pass all human thought. It is much to be forgiven: but to be forgiven so utterly, so completely, so extravagantly "according to the riches of his grace"—here is a marvel indeed. But there is no marvel with Him! Such grace is no effort to his glorious nature! He is not sensible of strain! It is simply the bubbling over of his heart, which is Love. Thus saith the Lord of Hosts: if it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes saith the Lord of Hosts? "His ways are higher than our ways, and his thoughts than our thoughts."

In his final answer (viii. 18-23), Zechariah gives a delightful anticipation of future days, which are still awaiting complete realization, but in some measure were fulfilled in the history of the Restoration (viii. 18, 19).

This is a welcome exchange. We could not be surprised to learn that God had so blotted out the memory of the past that fateful anniversaries would pass without special recognition. Our memory of the dark and disastrous is commonly short-lived. Bitter recollections soon fade from memory's tablets. What we do not like to recall, we drop into the keeping of oblivion, and that sea is never in haste to give up its dead. But the remarkable point here was, that these anniversaries, which had formerly brought the deepest melancholy, would henceforth be hailed as festal days, as though the events which had happened on them, and seemed only disastrous, were really full of the choicest blessing, and had been misinterpreted. It reminds us of the dark lines in the spectrum, which stand for new and unrealized constituents in the solar atmosphere. Does the astronomer regret them, when he understands their significance? No, he counts them of inexpressible worth.

As we inquire how such a revulsion of feeling could be brought about, we catch a further glimpse into God's thoughts. He set Himself to assure his people, in effect, that in the future, when they could view his dealings in their true perspective, they would discover that their darkest days had been the source and origin of their gladdest ones, because through them they had come to know themselves, been weaned from their sins, and had acquired those virtues which attracted the reverence and love of the world.

Read carefully the glowing predictions in vv. 13, 20, 23, which have already been marvellously fulfilled. In the midst of the dark night of heathen idolatry, when the foremost and wisest nations of the world were given up to the grossest idolatry and impurity, the synagogues of the dispersed Jews shone like sparks of light, holding forth the great doctrines of the unity and spirituality of the Divine Nature, the need of forgiveness, and the sanctity of Home. In every considerable Gentile city, the synagogue had a large following of devout proselytes drawn from the leading Gentile families.

From the Jewish nation came the Saviour of mankind, and the earliest members of his Church. To Jews we owe the New Testament, as the Old. It was at Jerusalem, on the occasion of a Jewish festival, that the Holy Ghost descended to begin his mighty work. And in all the so-called Christian ages, whilst persecuting the chosen people, the foremost nations of the world have taken hold of their skirts, going with them to their sacred shrines, using their conceptions of God, appropriating their sacred writings, and venerating their lawgivers, prophets, and saints with a reverence equal to their own.

There is also a time, yet future, but probably not far away, when the Jewish people shall be brought to own the claims of Jesus, and shall look on Him with repentance, faith, and love, and then they will be still more sought after by the nations of the world as the representatives and teachers of the only true religion. These days are clearly predicted, and the signs on every hand corroborate our faith that it shall be even as the prophets, and this prophet specially, have foretold.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, October 15. 1 Chron. xix.

DAVID was grossly insulted in the person of his messengers. And there was no excuse for the provocation, because his relations with the kingdom of Ammon had always been friendly. When our Lord bids us not to resist evil, we must remember that there are three things which He did not prohibit.

He did not prohibit self-defence, which is part of the great law of self-protection. Nay, when grossly insulted in the presence of Caiaphas, He challenged his assailant to bear witness of the evil for which he smote Him. We may raise the hand to parry the blow aimed at us, but not to strike back in revenge. We must leave vengeance with God, as we cannot divest ourselves sufficiently of the personal element to be able to inflict it impartially.

The Lord did not prohibit our doing our best to arrest evil, either as individuals or in an organised society. If we know of some human shark who is preying on his kind, terrorising the fearful and victimising widows and orphans, and if we have a clear case against him, it is not only legitimate, but it is obligatory, that we take legal steps to expose and arrest him. Society would cry shame if we did not, and rightly. Surely Christianity is one great system of resistance against evil. The Puritans, in their revolt against priestcraft, the opponents of the slave-trade, the leagues against social impurity and drunkenness, are surely legitimatised.

But we must always beware of ourselves when our passions are strongly aroused. Be quiet at such times; let the fever-passion subside, let the action to which you are prompted subside. It may be that you will have to take action on the behalf of others; but, if so, do it as God's soldier, not as his executioner.

MONDAY, October 16. 1 Chron. xx.

The chronicler tells the story contained in 2 Sam. xi., xii., xxi., but omits the dark record of David's sin. It was as though the record of David must not be tarnished by the sad episode which cast so terrible a blight on his fair name. So God will drop our sins out of his memory. He says, I will remember their sins no more: they shall be looked for, but they shall not be found. When we read the story of our life in the chronicles of eternity, we shall look in vain for sins which we could never forget, but which God has refused to incorporate in our biography.

The setting of this crown on David's head indicated the conquest of Rabbah, which was to become an appendage to the kingdom of Israel. Is not this a clue to the announcement that on Christ's head are many crowns? Each subjugated foe adds a lustre to his empire—a crown for his brow. The crowns of commerce, of science, of politics, of art, as well as those of death and the grave, encircle the brow of our Saviour. In each of these provinces He is supreme, and He has conquered them for his Father's glory. Let those who work in any of these departments realize that they are as much serving the King, as they who are engaged in direct religious and philanthropic toils, if only they are of the truth.

These giants had something unearthly about them. We cannot but recall Gen. vi. 1-8. They seem to have embodied the gross wickedness of their time. To overcome them, therefore, indicated the possession, through faith, of the very power of God. The warriors whose names are mentioned are probably included in the recapitulation of Hebrews xi., and it is almost certain that they wrought much more by faith in the power of God, than even by their strong right arms. May God give us grace so to deal with the strong forces of evil around us!

TUESDAY, October 17. 1 Chron. xxi.

Nothing is so offensive to God as pride. In David, there was something of the spirit of Nebuchadnezzar, when he said, "Is not this great Babylon which I have builded?" Whatsoever God gives in success of any kind, be sure to turn from it to Him, thanking Him with heart and soul and strength. Success does not injure a man who can say, "Not unto us, not unto us, but to thy Name give glory."

When David must choose between the evils which God offered, his answer was very characteristic. He had boundless faith in God—more faith in Him than in man. With us, the reverse is generally the case. We are always wishing that human love could be the arbiter of our destiny. The Divine love seems distant and unpalpable. It is a profound mistake. They that trust God cannot be disappointed. The drawn sword is placed in its sheath, the angel is arrested in his chastenings, Jerusalem is spared.

The true shepherd heart of David spoke out in his cry. He was not like the hireling of whom our Saviour speaks, whose own the sheep are not, and who, when he seeth the wolf, leaveth the flock and flees; but David was more willing that he should suffer than his people.

How good it was that the threshing floor of Ornan should be thus signalized; for Ornan was a Jebusite, one of the original peoples of the land. Here, afterwards, the temple was erected, as though to teach us that God is willing to accept the gift of one in whom there is the smallest modicum of faith, which struggles with an immense amount of superstition and ignorance. The gift of such may be used for ever in connection with his worship. If you have seen the angel with drawn sword staying his strokes, look up with love and gratitude into God's face; and, out of that agony, find a platform for a temple of sacrifice and adoration.

WEDNESDAY, October 18. 1 Chron. xxii.

The Man of Rest and Peace builds the Divine temple, and we are reminded of the sacred words: "So the Church throughout all Judæa, and Galilee, and Samaria, had peace, being edified (or built up); and, walking in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, was multiplied." Times of Christian peace are always times of advance and progress. In storms we strike our roots deeply; in peace we spread abroad and build on the foundation towards heaven.

There was great fervour and tenderness in this address, as from an old man on the verge of eternity. Age gives the right to speak, and words spoken by those whom youth respects live long in the heart of life. It is said that Professor Tholuck, the great theologian, used to spend the walks he took for recreation and exercise, in speaking with his students individually about God and eternity; and that, in this way, scores were led to God. A well-known Christian man informed me recently that, in his young Christian life, his voluble talk and criticism of other Christians were checked by an old man saying to him: "Take care—lest—you—fall—im—per—ceptibly."

How closely discretion, prudence, and prosperity are linked with obedience to the law of God—"Thou shalt prosper, if thou observe to do the statutes and judgments." But we need divine strength and courage, or we shall flinch before the dead weight of opposition, which we shall encounter from within and without. Yet, if God be with us, one word shall avail; and even though we do no more than prepare the materials for God's house, when it stands complete, David will be remembered, and all his affliction, not less than Solomon. (Psa. cxxxii. 1.)

THURSDAY, October 19. 1 Chron. xxii.

The number of priests and Levites employed in the Temple greatly augmented the splendour of its ceremonial. The Levites were subject to the priests, but superior to the Nethinim and other servants, who were not of the tribe of Levi. They were allowed to serve from the age of twenty to that of fifty—in this, at the end of his life, David seems to have altered the ancient Mosaic code (27). The specification of their duties, in vv. 28-32, is very interesting—the more so, as there is hardly one of them which may not have a counterpart in our own lives. Every morning we should stand to thank and praise the Lord, and to offer to Him prayer and praise and holy service, to see to all that pertains to the maintenance and advance of his kingdom.

But the special interest attaches to the service of the house of Aaron. We are priests unto God. Let us remember that we have been sanctified; set apart for his high use (v. 13). To burn the incense of daily prayer and intercession; to minister unto Him, as they were doing at Antioch, when the Holy Ghost spoke to them (Acts xiii. 1); and to bless in his name, always and for ever. Such are our holy functions and prerogatives. And these our Lord expects from us, even when we have come in from our plough or our flock, before we relax ourselves and begin to eat and drink. Our first duty is always to Himself. (See Luke xvii. 7-10.)

FRIDAY, October 20. 1 Chron. xxiv.

At first sight there seems a discrepancy between 2 Sam. xv. 24, 35; xx. 25, and the statement of v. 3. But there is none really. Ahimelech was the son of Abiathar, and associated with him in his office. In allotting the offices among these two great families, every endeavour was made to guard against jealousy. Hence the use of the lot (5).

We should be very careful in our dealings with others, and especially in regard to Christian service, to guard against the intrusion of jealousy, which is among the most prevalent temptations of Christian workers; and nothing is so woefully and lamentably destructive of our power for good. The pure fire of the Holy Spirit, and the lurid fire of jealousy, cannot co-exist.

It is quite possible to argue against jealousy, to show how irrational and weakening it is—to prove that God has a special sphere for every one, in which He will support and use him, and in which he cannot be disturbed by the usefulness and success of another. So great is our God, that He can give to you and him, without stinting either.

But argument often avails nothing. Even prayer will not help us, apart from our willingness to minister in some way to the person of whom we are jealous. To say all the truth we can, to express all the good wishes we can, and to perform little acts of helpfulness—is the sure way of deliverance from jealousy.

SATURDAY, October 21. 1 Chron. xxv.

The entire musical choirs numbered no less than 4,000 (chap. xxiii. 5); but the superior and experienced musicians, 288; i.e., twenty-four courses of twelve men each.

It is interesting to find Psalmody running in the families of these chief singers, Asaph, Jeduthun, and Heman. Good also to see that the daughters are specially named; evidently they were reckoned on the same level as their brothers. What a sight it must have been when Heman, and his fourteen sons and three daughters, of whom it is distinctly said that God gave them to him, stood together in the house of God. What sweet music they must have made, with their cymbals, harps, and psalteries. They were not always at the temple. The regular courses enabled the different families to take the work by rotation; so that, at least, alternate weeks could be given to new compositions. It was thus that the tunes for the Psalms came to be composed.

We should do well to cultivate in our families the love of sacred song. Let each of the children be instructed to play some chosen instument, that, on the evening of the Lord's Day, and at other times, they should minister enjoyment to themselves and their friends. We should hear less seldom of promising lives being wrecked, if Christian parents were more careful to make the home bright.

Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland.—The "Bible Book" in connection with this Society finished its work for the season last week. The report shows that there were sold: 527 Bibles, 1,528 New Testaments, and over 200 Pilgrim's Progress. Over 22,000 tracts were distributed. The places visited were Ayr, Lanark, and Paisley Races, Glasgow, Kilmarnock, and Dumbarton Fairs.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

MEETINGS FOR PRAYER AND CONSECRATION.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

ON Sabbath of last week there were many signs of the spirit of expectancy which has been aroused in connection with the Evangelistic Campaign. Special prayer meetings were being held; sermons bearing on the subject were announced from various pulpits; and, wherever public prayer was being offered, the work and workers were remembered.

On Monday, October 2, the Campaign was begun, and within our knowledge more than one director of the Evangelistic Association felt his faith rebuked by the large attendance, at the opening meeting, of men and women, from all parts of the city and neighbourhood. Meetings were arranged every day in St. Andrew's Hall at three o'clock; and the following twelve churches were open each evening for prayer and consecration services:— Partick Free High Church, Free Anderston Church, Sandyford Parish Church, Cambridge Street U.P. Church, Springburn U.P. Church, Bluevale Parish Church, East Campbell Street Free Church, Dalmarnock Parish Church, Elder Park Parish Church, Maxwell Parish Church, Cunninghame Free Church, and Queen's Park Free Church.

MONDAY (Oct. 2).

At the afternoon gathering, the chair was taken by Rev. J. Elder Cumming, D.D. (Sandyford Parish Church); and the proceedings were opened with prayer by Rev. Sholto D. C. Douglas, of Douglas Support.

The first address was given by Rev. Principal Rainy (Free Church College, Edinburgh), who referred, at the outset, to the wide-spread recognition of the importance of the occasion; and said that the movement was one in respect to which they should look up to God, that He might deliver them from those dangers and obstructions, especially such as were connected with themselves, which might hinder and mar it. They ought not to be faint-hearted, but expectant, believing that God would be with them and grant success. Yet they should carry with them a consciousness of their foolishness, their sin, their deadness, their unbelief, and so not give occasion to the enemy to blaspheme.

It was intended to carry the truth to multitudes who were in various conditions of mind. Some were connected with congregations, and some were not. Some were entangled in great vices and sins, which held them fast. Some were respectably and vigorously pursuing their walks in life, and achieving success; yet too much pre-occupied to give their souls a thought. Some were professed unbelievers. Others were mystified with doubts, honest no doubt, but easily dissipated by the Word of God. A great deal would depend on the spirit in which the movement was undertaken, not only by those who were prominent in carrying out the operations, but by all who supported it and upheld it in prayer. He remembered a professor telling his students that was simply to go upon an errand and to carry a message. He said: "If you are not content to be an errand boy, you are above your business." This is an errand in which a great deal depends, not only on the wise ordering of God, but on the spirit in which it is gone about and delivered, and the sympathy with our great Leader—the first great Messenger—in which his work is undertaken. It is first of all his work. He is the Messenger of the Covenant.

Then perhaps they needed to have their hearts filled in a new way with a sense of the reality, of the authority, of the wonderfulness of the Gospel as a gospel for themselves. "Does the Gospel make you wonder? Does it fill you with sincere surprise? Does it startle you to think how true it is, how good it is, and how best for ourselves even in this life? Let us seek to learn for ourselves what Christ meant—Christ who spoke, who came, who is looking to us, and thinking of us now."

Rev. John Smith, D.D. (Broughton Place United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh), remarked that the occasion carried him back to a day when he stood looking upon Carmel, with its memory of how Elijah challenged the prophets of Baal. "Aye, more; there Elijah challenged God. If this movement has any validity, it is to challenge God, to prove Him, and see whether He will not open the windows of heaven and pour down a blessing." To many the keynote of the Epistle to the Romans was "Righteousness by Faith;" but to him it was "Power:" "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation." If the great Gospel we wish to carry to the sons and daughters of men is a power, it is the power of God working through certain means and machinery which He has been pleased to appoint.

"We must humble and empty ourselves in order that everything that might hinder may be taken away. There is a great peril in these big gatherings. We get swept away by the externals of the movement, and we need to realize that it must be a work solely in the power of God, that it is an individual work—soul by soul being convinced of sin, humbled before Christ, and coming into the kingdom."

Rev. John McNeill spoke on the Healing of the Lame Man (Acts iii.), saying that the whole problem with which we are confronted is represented in this man. "There is the problem—East and West. We think of the East End, but there is a photograph of the West End. Take away the fine clothes, the houses in the terraces, the carriages and the education, and with every stripping the deformity comes out, until—when you have taken off all the masks and the padding, and all the attempts at culture and education that may hide, if not decorate, the deformity—the

HIDEOUS, AWFUL FACT IS THERE.

The man was 'lame from his mother's womb.' What is wrong with Glasgow, and with mankind, is not a little something that happened yesterday, and may be better to-morrow. Let us, at the beginning, go back again to the Biblical view of what is wrong."

In the evening, the speakers at the different centres were Rev. Professor Laidlaw, Rev. J. J. Luce, Rev. John Sloan, Rev. James Macmillan, Rev. W. D. Moffat, Rev. J. R. Macpherson, Rev. A. Cameron Watson, Rev. James Smith, Rev. William Dickie, Rev. John McNeill, and Mr. Henry Varley.

In Free Anderston Church, Professor Laidlaw (Free Church College, Edinburgh) gave a searching address on "The Law and Method of Christian Holiness," his text being 2 Corinthians vii. 1. He called attention to the extraordinary breadth of the Apostle's demands. All defilements are to be set aside. How very easily unholiness is allowed among us! There are no Christian people who do not suppose themselves to have a certain amount of virtue, who do not endeavour to come up to God's requirements in some way; but the defect is that so much else is forgotten. How we aim at a little part instead of the whole!

Many take fright at this and say, "This is perfectionism. Why, here is the very word—perfecting." We have always been tender upon that point. We have not much need, or reason, to be; but we have much need to be afraid of setting aside the Christian ideal, contenting ourselves with a lower standard. Look how Paul took it: "Not as though I had already attained." He expressly says, "I am not perfected; but I do this one thing: I see what God intends me to be, and I seek to take hold of that." When you see a soul in that position, you have nothing of the perfectionism in which there is any danger. You have the idea of a runner, who has his eye upon the mark. A man who has that view of Christian holiness will not run uncertainly, or fight as one beating the air. He will have something to strive after.

TUESDAY (Oct. 3).

At the afternoon meeting on Tuesday, Rev. James Wells, D.D. (Pollokshields Free Church, Glasgow), presided; and the opening address was given by Rev. J. J. Luce (Gloucester), based on 2 Kings ii. 9, 10. He said he prayed God that they might all have the spirit of Elisha as they went forward into the work of the Lord, and into such a work as they were now contemplating—a movement (might he say?) that made them in England, who knew, and heard, and read about it, and prayed for it, perfectly envious of the grace of God bestowed upon them. "It is worthy of Glasgow, and I pray God that it may in its issues bring untold blessings upon this great city, so that all classes of Christians may be turned into Elishas, to whom the call of God is a business, a matter almost of life and death; to whom it means something intensely real and Divinely important."

Rev. James Houston addressed the meeting from Matthew v. 47: "What do ye more than others?" "The fact we have got to face is this, that a great many Christian people—yes, they are Christians, converted people—are living at a low, dull, dead level, with no enthusiasm, no power, no brightness, no beauty: shall I say no joy? The Lord expects, the world expects, that Christians shall do more than others and be more than others; and we are not to be content to live just as certain other people live. We ought to do more than others, because we have received far more."

Rev. Professor Laidlaw called attention to the two aims which John Wesley and his first followers set before them: (1) A campaign against the world and Satan to produce conscious conversions; (2) to get an inner ring of Christians combined together full of the Spirit and of holiness, that the work might be done through them. "No man ever saw the connection between these two better than John Wesley. He said, 'If ever the world is to be converted, it will be through Christians at white heat.' So he urged the preaching constantly, vividly, strongly, of a full salvation. By a full salvation John Wesley meant entire holiness, the entire consecration of Christians. Until we convince Christians of the necessity and the worth of full salvation, we will not produce a revival in the world."

In the evening many of the speakers were the same as on Monday, the new voices being those of Rev. Professor Denney, Rev. J. S. Rae, and Rev. William Miller.

In Maxwell Parish Church, Rev. J. J. Luce spoke on "The Three Divine Necessities" in John iii.: (1) For the sinner, v. 7; (2) for the Saviour, v. 14; (3) for the saint, v. 30. "The best part of a sermon is this, that Christ is well spoken of, that He is exalted; and the best part of our lives is that in which most of Christ is seen, and heard, and felt. We find out, when we first come to Christ, what an absolute necessity it was to Him to have been lifted up on the cross; and that lesson we have to learn over and over again in the Christian life. It is Christ, not only for the sinner, but for the saint. If there is to be Christian testimony and progress worthy of the name, Christ must increase and self must decrease."

WEDNESDAY (Oct. 4).

On Wednesday, Rev. George Gladstone (North Dundas Street Evangelical Union Congregational Church) presided over the afternoon meeting. The first address was given by Rev. Charles G. Moore (London), taking as his subject "The True Centre of Things, and the Immense Benefits to be Derived by Making it the Home of our Spirits." He showed that in all ages God has been giving to men in Christ Jesus the vision of this Centre. There, first of all, we find God; and he put the question whether the one thing needed to-day in the Christianity of Great Britain is not a sense of the majesty and greatness of God, with a power to minister a sense of God's greatness to his creatures? Next we find the creature, also the enormity of sin. At this centre, also, there is redeeming love and restoring grace, a God that delighteth in mercy, and is able to save to the uttermost.

Rev. George Wilson (St. Michael's, Edinburgh) spoke on "The Stewardship of Christian Privilege" (1 Cor. ix. 15 sq.), remarking that it might be called the Stewardship of the Presence of God. He was perfectly sure that the stewardship of Christian privilege lay near the root of the power that will triumph in this Campaign; and that there is dynamic force from God, through the Christians in Glasgow, to move the city in its deepest convictions, and to awaken the highest Christian aspirations—if we only understood the significance of our Christian stewardship. The stewardship of the Gospel does not mean the Christian working through God so much as God working through him in love, in purpose, and in power. God pledges achievement to faithfulness. But here is the sad thing—He takes the privilege away from the unfaithful steward.

Rev. John Smith, D.D. (Edinburgh), chose as his topic "The Secret of Christ's Life" (John v. 30.; viii. 28). He could of Himself, He said, do nothing, but yielded Himself absolutely to God. What was Christ leaning on in that awful hour? He was leaning on the witness of his people: they were going to make the life that He lived real before men. Here are we to-day, and the world believes nothing of the kind. There are tens of thousands standing aside from this Campaign in the belief that it will come to nothing. Men talk about the higher Christian life. I do not know about that. This is the lower Christian life. The difficulty with men and women is that they will not come down to Christ's standard. They do not realize their own nothingness. There is just one platform for the victorious life, and it is the platform of absolute, unreserved submission.

In the evening the new voices heard in different services were those of Revs. Charles G. Moore, W. D. Moffat, and A. T. Donald.

Speaking in Cunninghame Free Church, Rev. Professor Denney called attention to Paul's three questions in Romans iii. 27, 29, 31. "Looking at Jesus on the cross, Paul asks: (1) 'Where is boasting then?' He answers himself, 'Shut out.' The deepest thing in our religion is the sense of what we owe to our Saviour. A Pharisee had room to boast in his religion. He could spread out his good works, and challenge God's approval. But if we feel that the only way into God's presence is the way of the cross, we must say: 'I am debtor. I owe everything.' That obligation is abiding. (2) 'Is He the God of the Jews only?' God meant it for everybody, and it is sure to find entrance for itself into the hearts to which He sends it. We must not preach in a timid, despairing, fearful way; but with a strong confidence. (3) 'Do we make void the law through faith?' The New Testament preaches forgiveness free to us, but not free to Christ. It cost Him the shedding of his blood. The cross is to make our dead faith alive and sensitive, and quick to do and keep God's will. If God blesses and deepens these impressions, we shall be fit to be used, fit to be evangelists.

THURSDAY (Oct. 5).

The afternoon meeting was presided over by Rev. James Black, D.D. (Wellington United Presbyterian Church), and the first address was given by Rev. John Smith, D.D. (Edinburgh), on "What is Required in an Ambassador for Christ" (2 Cor. v. 20). "Do we believe in our inmost souls that everything in the world is working to moral issues, that every person and every thing is to be brought up for judgment? Our fathers believed that: it dominated their thought, it inspired their intense desire for certainty in religious truth; and unless our minds and hearts are filled with this great fact, our words will lack power. A great many people have been thinking, 'Well, this is a big work we are going in for.' But it is God who is going to do it. When we are empty of self to the last atom, then, mayhap, He will put his hand upon us, put words into our mouths, and send us forth to be a soul of fire among our fellow men in the best possible way.' Yes, and Paul knew that. Preachers are not the blind, wall-eyed men some people think they are. 'I may be mad, but it is in God. If I am a shrewd and crafty man, it has not been for myself.' Some men say they are loving humanity, and that is equivalent to loving Christ. I am waiting to see what they are going to do. It is all speeches yet; perhaps it may be deeds some day, but they have not come yet. Paul put it the other way, 'The love of Christ constraineth me.'"

Rev. Dr. Alexander Whyte (Edinburgh) began by quoting the hymn—

Tell me the old, old story,
Of Jesus and his love.

"Go and tell all nations," he said, "the oldest of stories, the oldest of love stories. It was the hand of Love that wrote the Lamb's Book of Life. This is the philosophy of creation—not a philosophy, falsely so-called, groping about blindly amid the mysteries of Nature, and God and man; but the philosophy of Him who is the Son of God. Philosophy, the platform, the pulpit, the Press, have tried many expedients. The broken heart of man, the agonized conscience of man, still cries, "Tell me the old, old story." They whose hearts are weary and heavy-laden, and empty, and broken, and disappointed—and the house is full of them—let them bind their hearts to that everlasting and unfailing foundation set forth in the Gospel. I believe hearts hunger for these deeper things, and that preachers often waste their opportunity. As you make progress by such teaching, you will be able to go out among your congregations with a growing sense of power."

At the evening gathering in Sandyford Church, Dr. Alexander Whyte gave a second address on "Prayer" (Luke xi. 1). He could not forget that, humanly speaking, we owe to the disciples' desire the giving of what we call the Lord's Prayer, and the parables of extraordinary beauty which follow it. To him it taught a great lesson in what we lose by not bringing large petitions. "The Holy Ghost reads a lesson to my prayerless heart from the clause, 'when He ceased.' When He went away to pray, He must have remained a long time before these words would be used. We can almost hear the disciples asking, 'Is He never going to cease?' And then come the words, 'when He ceased.'" Quoting an old minister, "God does not care so much for verbs as for adverbs," Dr. Whyte went on to explain that, while "to pray" is the verb, the adverb is the word that describes the prayer. He pointed out: (1) The command to pray "secretly." Zechariah had the same thought, "apart, apart." "The best of closets," says Augustine, "is the mountain top of a man's praying heart." (2) The need for praying "deliberately," as if we had made up our minds to do it.

FRIDAY.

The services for the week were brought to a close on Friday, October 6. Rev. F. H. Roberts (Hillhead Baptist Church) presided over the three o'clock gathering, and the opening address was given by Rev. Charles G. Moore (London), on "The Law of the Spiritual World, which puts at our Disposal the Power of God for Christian Service" (Rom. vii. 10; Matt. ix. 29). He said all were agreed that in its beginning the Christian life is supernatural: in its continuance, in its root and fruit, in its true expansion and increase, there must be the putting forth of Divine and supernatural power. "In all our Christian life the real issues are these—what God has said; whether we have heard and believed; and whether, in response to our faith, God is acting on his Word."

Rev. John McNeill said the more he read and studied 1 Samuel vii., he felt inclined to call it the Divine directory for revivals; and for public worship, that had for its end recovery from coldness, compromise, and backsliding—the revival and renewal of grace, of peace, and of power. It is a brave thing to go back to God. It is easy to drift; but to repent and return require this courage. If we want a revival, to bring back the hundreds of thousands who are churchless, careless, and spiritually dead, there must be hard work as individuals, as heads of households, as ministers, before the Lord.

Rev. George Wilson spoke on "The Place of Obedience in the Spiritual Life." In the modern Church he believed there were many things for which we should be very thankful; but we are specially weak in the spirit of obedience.

In the evening, the new speakers in the districts were Rev. George Wilson and Mr. R. B. Stewart. The pulpit of Cambridge Street United Presbyterian Church was occupied by Rev. John McNeill, who spoke on "The Vision of Dry Bones" (Ezekiel xxxvii.). After making clear the reference of the passage to present circumstances, he said the first call was 'to Christian people to have the courage to audit the books of their lives correctly—remembering that our God is the God of things as they are. There are very many professing Christians, and they may be living; but they contrive only to show every sign of death. 'Can these bones live?' Like Ezekiel, looking at the bones, we cannot say 'Yes;' but, looking into God's face, we dare not say 'No.' The Lord open our eyes, not only to see things at their worst, but to see Him. Ezekiel had the simple homely virtue of obedience. Let us work for the bringing of the dead to life, and God will give us that."

Notes by the Way.

Early in the week the weather was of a most stormy and unfavourable character, but it improved in the closing days.

The Musical Committee have been almost surprised at the offers of help they have received from leaders, organists, and choirs—all anxious to consecrate their gifts to the work.

It is remarked that in those churches situated in working-class districts the attendances have been best maintained—the highest average being in Cunninghame Free Church, which is surrounded by a teeming population; and we ourselves saw in its pews those who bore every evidence of recent rescue from the depths. In the suburban districts the interest has been steadily growing during the week.

Many and various have been the comments and criticisms in the daily Press. But one leading article, after recounting many tests which the world will apply to the results of the campaign, concludes: "It is by the addition to the number who are living pure and honourable and useful lives that the success will be measured; and, if we judge by the spirit in which the meetings have begun, there will be reason to hope for success when tried by this rule."

On Friday evening, Mr. McNeill said his experience of the week showed him that in the bulk and the mass God's people are taking heartily to this Campaign. "What we hoped, and prayed, and looked for, thank God our eyes have already seen." In all his years of evangelizing he had not been more hopefully impressed with the beginning of any mission. Referring to the six months' mission at the Chicago Exhibition, he said this in Glasgow had made more progress in a week than that did in a month.

Mr. Charles Inglis,

EVANGELIST.

IT is a pleasure to give the portrait of one of our best-known evangelists, especially at the present time, when he is entering upon a season of arduous labour in connection with the Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign. Mr. Inglis has had a part in great movements in days gone by, and has been associated with efforts attended by signal blessing. It is earnestly hoped that his impending journey northward will result in many seals to his labour in the Gospel.

A Londoner by birth, Charles Inglis has travelled in both hemispheres and in all latitudes. When quite a youth, he was brought to the Lord, and he lost no time in "stirring up the gift" with which God had endowed him. He witnessed for Christ in mission halls and other available buildings; and the numerous invitations which reached him, combined with the earnest counsel of godly friends, compelled him to face the question whether evangelism was not to be his life-work. The Lord decided the question by opening the way; and, in 1867, Mr. Inglis relinquished the business which had previously engaged him, and gave himself to the great Head of the Church for "the work of an evangelist."

There have been cases in which men have thus launched out under a mistaken sense of duty; but the score and more of years that have passed since Mr. Inglis took the decisive step have amply proved that his action was of the Master's ordering. In East and West London, in the largest buildings available, he has preached season after season, and in the provinces he is widely known, as well as loved by many who look upon him as the minister of God unto them—one who was instrumental in opening blind eyes, and giving liberty to such as had been in spiritual captivity. But while pastors may stay at home and feed the flock, it is for the evangelist to act on the well-known saying of John Wesley, "The world is my parish." So Mr. Inglis has gone west and south and laboured among our kith and kin in the United States, and the more distant lands of Australasia.

We cannot say how many times Mr. Inglis has visited America, but again and again we have heard of his labours in the great Republic, also in the Canadian Dominion. He has proclaimed the Gospel to Red Indians and Negroes across the Atlantic, and to Chinese settlers and Aboriginal tribes in Australia. But, over and above that, he had held a large number of missions among the general populations of America and our colonies. He has preached in all kinds of places—in prisons and coalpits, on ocean steamers, and in log huts away on the rolling prairie, as well as in the fashionable churches of large crowded cities. When in America, he has often preached on Sunday mornings to as many as 800 or 1,000 convicts, and at one of these prison meetings over 100 men stood up to be prayed for, among the number being one who was reputed to be the most accomplished forger in the world.

One great feature of his work, wherever it is carried on, is found in the afternoon Bible readings; it is not unusual for hundreds of persons to assemble at these gatherings. This feature is one that is highly appreciated by Mr. Moody, who takes care to secure the services of Mr. Inglis, when he is in America, to give lectures to his students, with the result that great blessing has followed. Speaking of his Bible readings, Professor Torrey says: "There is no man who visits our students that can give such an amount of suggestive thoughts and points in a lecture as Mr. Inglis."

In the course of his travels, Mr. Inglis has made many friends, and encountered very varied experiences. Once, when travelling in Tasmania, he was thrown from his horse down a deep ravine into the river, and for the next six weeks he was found on crutches preaching twice a day. One of the most disturbing of his experiences occurred some five or six years ago, when, while returning from a meeting in the great north-west of Canada, along a lonely road, he found himself face to face with a bear. For a moment, they stood looking at each other; then they went on their respective ways!

On another occasion, when a revival meeting was being concluded, he issued the customary invitation to those who desired to interview him to meet him in the vestry, with the result that he found himself face to face with a well-dressed, demented man, who warned him that he had but five minutes to live. However, by a little parleying and a good deal of diplomacy, Mr. Inglis managed to retire from the vestry and rejoin the deacons of the church.

Mr. Inglis has enjoyed good health during his entire career, and we trust the same blessing will continue with him, and that God will still more abundantly own his work in coming days. Finally, many will like to know that great success has attended our friend's book "Pegs for Preachers, and Points for Workers."* This contains 450 Bible-reading outlines and 3,000 points. It has already reached its tenth edition in Great Britain, while in America thousands have been sold.

Twenty-five Years' Work Among Hop-pickers.—The children, with the assistance of a few friends in the hop-gardens in Selling and district, embracing pickers from Ashford, Sittingbourne, Whitstable, and Dover, have presented a purse to Mr. Geo. Heath, of Canterbury, who, for twenty-five years, has conducted services each Sunday during the hop-picking season. It is satisfactory to note that a splendid work has been accomplished, and that great results have accrued therefrom.

"These Forty Years."

A FRIEND AND COMFORTER.

"The Christian has been an unspeakable comfort and joy to me for some thirty-four years. I was introduced to it by a friend on coming to England after a long residence on the Continent. I look on it weekly as my friend, and comforter, and teacher under many trying circumstances. "A. P."

KIND WORDS FROM INDIA.

"I well remember the first number of The Revival; and how, while working at Dorking, I circulated fifty copies a week for some time. I rejoice to know that not only does the work there abide, but that it now bears fruit in the maintenance of a native evangelist in our Telugu Mission here. You have my continued hearty good wishes. "G. W. Gillings.

GREETINGS FROM THE CAPE.

"I have a great desire to add my weak testimony to the immense value of The Christian, and the price set upon it by my late husband and myself. I trust it is not too late to send you a word of congratulation, with thanks to the Giver of all good, for the blessing which has all this time been bestowed on your labours, and prayer for still more abundant blessing and a wider circulation." E. Van der Riet.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

"Having been cheered and encouraged to put my trust in God, amidst the perplexities, and trials, and joys of life, I naturally wished others to be helped in the journey heavenwards. Therefore I have sent The Christian to various missionaries, and they and people at home have passed it on to others. 'Content to fill a little space, if God be glorified.' My heart has rejoiced at the many grateful letters you have received. "Matthew Nall.

FROM THE BLUEJACKETS' FRIEND.

"When, twenty-five years ago, God called me to attempt to open a Home for bluejackets, it was to the readers of The Christian that I turned for sympathy, encouragement, and help. I got all three, and the great work which God has confided to me is, in a large measure, owing to the prayers and practical sympathy of the readers of The Christian. The current numbers are to be found on our reading-room tables, and I have had the privilege of sending hundreds of copies to our ships of war all over the world.

"Agnes E. Weston.

GOOD THINGS TO COME.

"I thank God for The Christian. It often cheered me and many others in the lonely mission field. As a Christian I have grown up beside it, and it roughly marks the length of my spiritual life. What marvellous changes, successes, enterprises, biographies, and world-wide movements its pages record! May there be better and brighter reading in the future than even in the past! We look for a great revival, and we shall be expecting The Christian to report it and help it forward. Yours, in the service of Christ, and in gratitude for all your help in the past,

"London Medical Mission. "H. Soltau.

"HIGHLY APPRECIATED."

"Though so late in expressing my esteem for your valuable paper The Christian, which I have taken for the last thirty-eight years, I feel I must tell' you how highly it is appreciated by all to whom I send it, and how from India, Africa, and England I get grateful letters saying how helpful the paper is. Parents particularly are so glad to have its assistance in bringing up their children; and young people learn truths to establish them in the faith. May God prosper your work, and may it be circulated more widely, in order to bring souls out of darkness into light, the light of life. "An Old Friend."

A BOND OF FELLOWSHIP.

"The prince of religious magazines has just celebrated its fortieth birthday, and many have been the expressions of gratitude to God and goodwill to the magazine and its editors. In this we most heartily join. It has been for many years a link between God's servants in all lands, full of wide and accurate information, a marvellous pennyworth in this respect alone. But what we most rejoice over is its high evangelical tone, its defence of the Scriptures, its plea for national righteousness, and its genuine catholicity of spirit.

"It may be interesting to note here that for years we have sent copies regularly to a number of Jewish Christians abroad."

Rev. John Wilkinson, in Trusting and Toiling.

Mr. John Kirk.

SECRETARY OF THE RAGGED SCHOOL UNION.

THIS month Mr. Kirk completes twenty years of service in connection with the secretariat of that Institution which Lord Shaftesbury considered to be the greatest achievement of his life-work. That fact alone represents something to be devoutly thankful for; but, in addition, the Union has seen a great expansion of service, the area of its operation has been extended, and new enterprise has been undertaken. In the pioneer days of more than fifty years ago, Lord Ashley, as the recognised leader of a devoted battalion of teachers, saw that the service was one of heroism and danger; but, although the outlook improved, the advice still given was: "Keep to the gutter!" Though the prospect has brightened as regards the outward appearance of London, the need of such operations as those of the Union was never greater, and never before was so much work done, nor so many persons engaged in doing it.

Mr. Kirk's personal history has all along been closely associated with his work. When he first came to London, as a lad, in the early sixties, he had already had some experience in the work of Sunday School teaching. He commenced his business life as a clerk in the office of the Pure Literature Society, and at once joined the staff of teachers at Anne Street Ragged School, Old Kent Road, and soon after became hon. secretary. In 1872, Rev. William Pennefather asked Mr. Gawin Kirkham to become secretary at Mildmay Conference Hall; Mr. John Macgregor (Rob Roy) invited Mr. Kirk to accept the vacant post at the office of the Open-Air Mission, still retaining his connection with the R.S.U. as Night School Inspector. This service was retained for seven years; and in 1879 Mr. Kirk finally became permanently associated with the Ragged School Union by succeeding Mr. Joseph Gent in the secretariat of that institution.

While thus identified with the general service carried on in London, Mr. Kirk undertook the honorary superintendence of the school at Nelson Street, now known as the Camberwell Mission. That school, founded in 1810, had been associated with the heroic pioneer, Thomas Cranfield; and just fifty years ago the school became a station of the Ragged School Union. After the passing of the Education Acts, the old schoolhouse was rebuilt, and occupied as a station of the London School Board; but a new building for mission work was put up, and was opened by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts twelve years ago. The work of Cranfield and others is, therefore, continued with vigour until the present day. As regards Mr. Kirk, he seems all along to have been attracted by ragged-school service. Before he became connected with the school at Camberwell, he superintended the Sunday School at St. Stephen's, Spitalfields, and afterwards that at St. Mary's Church, Newington, of which Dr. Maclagan, the present Archbishop of York, was then rector. Dr. Maclagan presented his friend with some volumes of Jeremy Taylor's works, which are still a valued souvenir of those years.

At this time, in 1879, when Mr. Kirk undertook the responsibility of the secretaryship of the Ragged School Union, the work throughout London showed some symptoms of approaching low-water mark. Certain of the officers of the pioneer days were growing old; and although his enthusiasm had in no wise abated, the Earl of Shaftesbury himself was close upon eighty years of age. What was perhaps even more ominous, were the signs that public interest in the movement was also flagging. Even philanthropic people had their attention diverted to the more extended and novel enterprise of the School Board, which seemed to promise to sweep every arab of the London streets into its classes; and there seemed to be little need for voluntary subscriptions if rate-paid teachers were to do the necessary work on a universal scale.

The general outlook was totally misunderstood; for a great and comprehensive Christian agency for benefiting the poorest of the people of all ages, in such a vast metropolis as London, could never be superseded by what were practically secular elementary schools. When they were not otherwise provided, the Union had established day-schools; but the religious teaching of its Sunday classes was regarded as its main business; and in addition to all, since its first planting, the ragged-school tree had sent out many new branches, each being some indispensable agency for conferring benefit, mental, physical, and spiritual, on the poorest of the people of all ages.

Lord Shaftesbury and others saw the decline in popularity of their favourite work with some concern, and a conference was held, at which such speakers as the Duke of Westmimster, the late Earl Cairns, and Professor Leone Levi emphasized and attempted to show how they could best be sustained. The resolution moved by the Earl of Aberdeen was carried with enthusiasm:—"That, while recognising with gratitude the great extension of elementary education throughout the country, this conference expresses its earnest conviction of the need of maintaining the ragged schools and their affiliated missions, and heartily commends the efforts of the Ragged School Union in that behalf to the support of the country."

From the date of this conference there was a very visible increase of popular interest in the operations of the Union. Then those who were responsible for carrying on the work seconded Mr. Kirk's varied endeavours to extend it, and succeeded according to their faith. Not only did the schools continue to prosper, in some instances planning new operations on their own account; new enterprises were set on foot on behalf of the whole Union. One of these consisted of Holiday Homes at the seaside and elsewhere, of which there are now eight, the Homes being more especially intended for children who need attention; others being boarded out at cottages under the supervision of friends. Many thousands of little ones, pining for the fresh air and the green fields, are thus able to enjoy the privilege of a fortnight's change, which to many is almost equivalent to a renewal of life.

Then, what has been done on behalf of cripples is a wide extension of a work which, from the earliest days of the Ragged School movement, received some attention. The evidences of child helplessness and suffering which recent revelations have, however, brought to light, have greatly stimulated effort in this particular department. The number of such subjects requiring attention is found to be much larger than the teachers of a former generation could have supported, a total of 6,000 names being now registered within the area of Greater London. The attention given to them — surgical, recreative, and educational, as well as spiritual—relieves the sadness and monotony of life, and

CONFERS VAST BENEFIT.

In ways too numerous to mention, the Ragged School has developed other agencies in a wonderful way—free libraries, thrift clubs, evening schools, technical education now being commonplace adjuncts at many of the schools. At the same time, what is done on a large scale for what are called drift children—who still seem to be in danger of going to waste—may remind us that there are the lower depths which still have to be reached. As regards Mr. Kirk, he has been actively connected with the great movement, in one way or another, for thirty-five years, and the experience of earlier days is now being well utilized. During his seven years' secretariat of the Open-Air Mission, a great deal was learned about the poor and the working-classes of London; and while knowledge thus gained is being turned to practical account, he extended his experience by a tour through the United States, and also by once subjecting himself to arrest for carrying out the innovation of open-air preaching in Switzerland. Mr. Kirk is quite in touch with the Council of the Union, the members being a select band, many being actual superintendents of missions or schools, while all have tact and sympathy. Mr. W. C. Parkinson, L.C.C., the chairman, is a distinguished philanthropist; while the Marquess of Northampton, as president, is a worthy successor of one whom Spurgeon regarded as "the best man of his time"—the Earl of Shaftesbury. Some of the early Ragged Schools have grown into large institutions; and while these form part of the Union, there are many smaller schools doing among a most needy class, who would not be able to do what they do without the aid of the Union. At Clerkenwell, Bethnal Green, and Battersea, the Union also carries on prosperous missions on its own account.

Having been personally acquainted with Mr. Kirk and his work for many years, I can testify that he has the confidence and esteem of the Council and the large body of teachers. As the work of the Union is mainly spiritual, this would not be the case if the secretary was a mere official. He has entered heartily into every avenue of usefulness which offered; and he has never grudged personal service in preaching and otherwise which promised to advance the cause of Christ. Trained in the school of Shaftesbury, his well-nigh forty years' service has by no means lessened enthusiasm for the work, nor in any sense incapacitated our friend for the discharge of his duties. No man could more thoroughly realize that, first and foremost, the work has spiritual aims; but at the same time there must be tact and willingness to enter day by day into practical details; the secretary must be accessible, and be able, at all times, to advise with superintendents in all cases of urgency or difficulty. As regards the outside public, they are disposed to measure a secretary's devotion to his cause by his ability in ensuring the success of his society. The report of the Ragged School Union for 1880 shows the income to have been £2,566. The income for 1898-99 was £17,697. That also shows that the Christian public do not think the movement an obsolete one.

A C.M.S. Farewell.

LAST week a large party of missionaries returning to their work abroad, as well as a goodly company going out for the first time, bade farewell to their friends in a series of gatherings arranged by the Church Missionary Society.

On Tuesday evening of last week, the first meeting was held at Exeter Hall, under the presidency of Sir John Kennaway, M.P. Rev. H. E. Fox reported that there were 115 missionaries returning to their work, and eighty new missionaries, making a total of 195, compared with ninety-nine returning and sixty-seven new missionaries, making a total of 166, last year. They proceed to Persia, Turkish Arabia, Punjab, Western India, Ceylon, China, and Japan. Four of the old and four of the new missionaries then addressed the meeting, which was characterized throughout by much heartiness and enthusiasm.

On Wednesday morning a largely attended Communion Service was held in St. Bride's Church, when a sermon was preached by Professor Moule from the text, "What mean ye by this service?" In the afternoon a public meeting of the Committee was held to "dismiss" the outgoing party. The instructions were read by the Secretary, Rev. H. E. Fox, and an address was delivered by Rev. G. S. Karney.

On Wednesday evening, the last meeting of the series was held in Exeter Hall, Colonel Robert Williams, M.P., presiding. Several more of the missionaries spoke briefly; and the closing address to the missionaries was given by Rev. J. A. Lightfoot, the new Principal of the C.M. College, who spoke with fulness and power from 2 Tim. ii. 8: "Remember . . . . Jesus Christ."

The Indigent Blind Visiting Society has organized a special mission to the blind, who, with their guides, will be gathered at eight centres in various parts of the metropolis, embracing about 3,500 persons. The mission will commence on October 19, and close on December 6. Several well-known ministers and evangelists will take part in the services, and the earnest hope of the promoters of the movement is, that believers may be revived, and that many of those who are blind to the beauty of Christ and salvation may have their inner eyes opened, that they may see Him who is "the Light of the world." The mission is organized at the request and expense of a friend, who is deeply interested in the spiritual and temporal welfare of the blind, and all connected with them. Names and addresses of blind persons in London, not connected with the Society, will be thankfully received by Mr. W. Mead, Superintendent, 95, Gurney Road, Leytonstone Road, Stratford, E.

Conference at Exeter Hall.

AT the suggestion of several friends, the Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association determined to inaugurate winter's work with a four days' convention, in which Christians of all denominations might co-operate. The meetings began on Tuesday afternoon of last week. The Lower Hall was well filled with people of all ages, apparently all earnest Christians reaching out after the highest possibilities of religious experience.

Sir George Williams presided, and, after singing, reading of the Word, and prayer, spoke of winter as the summer of the Christian worker, and prayed that these meetings might be the beginning of a season of glorious harvest.

Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., was the first speaker, his theme being "The Christian's Life." Basing his remarks upon John xiv. 19, "Because I live ye shall live also," he said Christ is the Bread of Life, and so long as there is right relationship with Him, there can be no hunger or thirst. There is no insufficiency in Him. He is the Life because of his sacrificial death, and he that hath life through the crucified Redeemer is sustained, because Christ abideth in him.

The second topic assigned—"The Christian's Calling"—was dealt with by Rev. Archibald Brown. He said it is necessary to understand the Christian's "call" in order to comprehend his "calling." Turning to Romans viii. 30, he pointed out that it is the link between the purpose of God and justification with its subsequent glory. It is God's voice speaking in the inner recesses of a man's life, and constraining him by love. Passing to the "calling," in a brief Bible reading, he showed it to be "God's high calling" (Phil. iii. 14), coming from on high, and ever lifting upward; a "holy calling" (2 Tim. i. 9); a "heavenly calling" (Heb. iii. 1); a calling "from darkness into his most marvellous light" (1 Peter ii. 9); a calling into "the fellowship (or partnership) of his Son" (1 Cor. i. 9); a calling of "peace" (Col. iii. 15); and a call "to eternal glory" (1 Cor. v. 10).

The third address, on "The Christian's Hope," was delivered by Pastor Frank H. White. After reading Col. i. 4-5, he proceeded to define "hope" as something more than desire—rather the certain expectation of nothing less than eternal glory.

In the evening Mr. A. A. Head presided, and the speakers were Revs. F. B. Meyer, B.A., George Hanson, D.D., and C. Bradshaw Foy, M.A., who continued an exposition of the same subjects in the same order.

On Wednesday afternoon Rev. F. Trevelyan Snow drew some helpful lessons from the experiences of Jacob, as recorded in Gen. xxxii., culminating in the twenty-ninth verse: "And He blessed him there." The way of blessing is often through sorrow. Sometimes God stirs up the home nest, and in various ways brings his people through circumstances of trial into communion with Himself. The speaker traced the steps of difficulty and emergency by which Jacob ultimately became separated from all that hindered his spiritual progress, until he was alone with God. And God "blessed him there." Applying the lesson to the every-day life of his hearers, Mr. Snow added some instances of encouragement from his personal experience, and appealed to his hearers to make a whole-hearted surrender to the will of God. Then the Divine blessing would come, fitting them for service.

Rev. J. G. Train gave a brief exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians. The Apostle first deals with the subject of repose. The soul is quietly communing with and learning of God. The foundation truth is to sit with Christ in heavenly places. There is nothing respecting action or progress until this is made clear. The question of the Christian's position with regard to his fellows cannot precede that of his walk with God. Then, in chap. iv., Paul goes on to the activities: "I beseech you that ye walk worthy." We are, then, to manifest our experiences of communion with Christ by walking in newness of life. We are to be light, bearers. The walk will be distinctive-characteristic of a peculiar people. Finally, the epistle enumerates the foes with which the Christian has to contend, and the equipment provided, whereby he shall be enabled, "having done all, to stand."

The concluding address, by Rev. C. Bradshaw Foy, was a stimulating word on personal witness. The era of miracles passed, observed the speaker, and that of personal witness came; but as time went on, and in many respects, the testimony degenerated. It could witness only to the natural, instead of the supernatural. What wonder, then, that the world rejected a belief in the latter? The urgent requirement of the day in which we live is the witness of holy lives. The world will hold aloof from Christianity until it finds the satisfactory evidence, for which it contends, in an open confession of Christ, and a consistent walk. Mr. Foy concluded his vigorous address by setting forth the privileges of his hearers in manifesting, day by day, the virtues of a Christian life.

On Thursday afternoon, the speakers, addressing themselves to the same general topics, were Revs. J. T. Butlin, M.A.; W. R. Mowll, M.A.; E. N. Thwaites, M.A.; and Mr. M. H. Hodder.

In speaking of "The Christian Life," Rev. J. T. Butlin took for his text, Rom. i. 17: "The just shall live by faith." This, he said, did not simply refer to regeneration, but also to the life of momentary dependence on Christ. In the stress of life's storms, He does not always say, as He did on the Sea of Galilee—"Peace be still." He, rather, gives the assurance, as He did to Paul, that, although shipwreck comes, all shall be well. Strong life,—"more abundant life"—is conditioned in this faith. As the believer trusts, all the power of the arm that upholds the world is exercised on his behalf.

Rev. W. R. Mowll, in dealing with the second topic, emphasized several of the points dealt with by Mr. Archibald Brown at the Tuesday meeting. The same subjects being handled each day by speakers not in attendance at each session, this repetition was only natural.

The third address was delivered by Rev. E. N. Thwaites, whose words were earnest and pertinent to the subject of meditation.

Further addresses were delivered at night, and the Convention closed with two more meetings on Friday.

A New Welsh Organization.—The Young People's Christian Union for Wales is the outcome of a convention held for the deepening of the spiritual life in the young. It is an endeavour to federate into one powerful spiritual union all young people's religious societies in Wales. There can be no question as to the desirability of such an association, while the benefits likely to result from it are many and great.

Welcome Home for Sailors.—An enthusiastic meeting was held at Miss Child's Welcome Home for Sailors, Canning Town, E., on Tuesday, the occasion being the monthly muster of the C.L.B.C. During tea time, which preceded the meeting, one of the veteran Christians, nearly ninety years of age, presented a poem specially written by him for Miss Child, who presided over the meeting. She gave out the text for the month, "Unto you, therefore, which believe, He is precious," and thanked the friends for their prayers. Pointed addresses upon this text were given by Colonel Simpson, Mr. William Luff, and others. The accounts of the efforts put forth, and the blessing resulting from them, were most cheering.

Clifton Conference.

THE first word to be said in connection with the thirty-seventh annual gathering, last week, in the Victoria Rooms, must be one of thankfulness that its convener, Rev. James Ormiston, was able to preside as usual. With the exception of a slight lameness, compelling the use of a walking-stick, there was no trace of the accident which had laid him low for some weeks. The devotional meeting, on Monday evening, was well attended, and several old friends of the Conference spent some time in prayer for blessing to attend the engagements of the week.

"CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY"

was the topic which had been selected for a series of addresses this year; the convener stating, on Tuesday morning, that he had been led to select it because of its supreme importance in these days. He paid a tribute to the memory of the late Rev. Talbot Greaves, who for many years had delivered the opening address.

Rev. T. C. Chapman defined a true witness—one who knew a fact, or set of facts, and gave his testimony to those who did not know, either corroborating what a former witness had said, or giving entirely new evidence. The testimony of the Word is clear, and apart from that we do not, cannot, know God. God has ordained man, sinful man, redeemed through the precious blood of Christ, to be the witness of this fact, by the lip and by the life, to a God-denying world. Rev. J. N. Worsfold spoke of personal character as the first qualification, and next the clear enunciation of the truth. The devil is bolder than ever to-day, and is sending up from the bottomless pit the superstition and materialism now so rampant. We are on the last great fight of the devil to overthrow the coming of the King. But God is stronger than the devil.

Rev. W. F. Jepson, alluding to what passes for the "higher criticism," said, among other good things, the Word of God has stood, and will stand, and will triumph over all that the highest intellects are capable of. There was no theorising in the Christian's witness-bearing, for it was of what he knew.

It must be assumed that readers are well acquainted with the efforts set forth by various speakers in the afternoon. Mr. Samuel Thomas, who presided with his usual tact and kindliness, managed to keep them to the time allowed. The speakers were Rev. R. Montgomery, Rev. J. N. Worsfold, Deacon Abraham, Mr. J. E. Hazelton, and Rev. W. Hamlyn.

In the evening there was an excellent attendance, Rev. J. Ormiston presiding. Mr. James Wright offered fervent and soul-lifting prayer.

Rev. H. Dening held that, to bear true witness, there must be personal knowledge, unswerving truthfulness, and unflinching firmness. Our Queen, he said, amidst a suppressed murmur of cordial assent, has been a firm and consistent witness to Protestant truth, a grand witness indeed to the purity of home life, and her personal character is of infinitely higher value than the most costly jewels which shine in her crown.

Pastor Fuller Gooch said that Israel of old was distinctly called that they might be God's witnesses, although they failed to be impressed by the spiritual responsibility of it. Quite as definite is the calling of the Christian Church as to witness-bearing. But alas! that Church had not proved more steadfast to the truth than Israel of old, and there was at least a danger of their forgetting their responsibilities for the sake of temporal advantages attached to a position. Mr. Samuel Thomas and other speakers followed.

The topic for Wednesday was "The Lord's Witnesses: Their Testimony of the Truth."

Rev. F. J. Horsfield spoke of true witness-bearing, saying that there must not only be the clear perception and apprehension of God's truth, but there must be the spiritual experience of it, and a constant realization of the presence of Him for whom they were bearing testimony. Involuntary testimony is sometimes borne, and which cannot be hid, after the reception of some great spiritual blessing; but in addition there must be uncompromising condemnation of all evil if God will make our testimony useful. And it must always be based upon experience. A blind man's eloquent description of the beauty of the rainbow, or a deaf man's criticism of the great master's music—what is such testimony worth? Rev. Dr. S. G. Potter added that in these days of blasphemy, we need more courage, and especially more faith, to give effective testimony.

In the afternoon, Mr. Samuel Thomas said a cordial word on behalf of the Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland, and was supported by Rev. J. Ormiston and Mr. D. J. Evans. Other speakers were Rev. Dr. Wright, for the Protestant Reformation Society, and he remarked that there was greater need for its work to-day than when it was established, more than thirty years ago. Miss Robinson also spoke for the Anti-Sunday Travelling Union, and was followed by other speakers.

On Thursday morning, when the last meeting for conference took place, several visitors who had attended the earlier gatherings had left. The topic for conference was "The Lord's Witnesses, and their Lord's Approval, Present and Future."

Rev. Thomas Houghton, Kensington Episcopal Chapel, Bath, who attended this Conference for the first time, said the Lord's approval is the chief thing about which a faithful witness is concerned. St. Paul, in the end of his days, wrote to Timothy: "Study to show thyself approved unto God." Then he would be a workman that needed not to be ashamed, and approved, not unto man, but unto God Himself. We value the approval of God's people, but chief aim should ever be to have the smile of the Faithful Witness Himself ever resting upon us. Our Lord Jesus Christ regarded the Divine approval as the chief thing always—from childhood to the end. The same thing was true of his Apostles, who felt bound under all circumstances to bear their testimony. Their motto might be said to be, Do not seek to please men but God only. He proceeded to dwell upon the following points:—The Lord's approval is a present thing. He shows his approval by giving courage to testify, which is no slight thing in days like the present.

Rev. L. Price, Rector of Pakefield, dwelt briefly upon Numbers xiv. 24. But my servant, "Caleb . . . him will I bring into the land." God had promised the land of Canaan to the Israelites, but they entered not in because of their unbelief. Their children, however, inherited the land of which the Lord had said, "wherein I dwell." They had become selfish, and had grieved their Lord. God's people will never suffer ultimately. The love of Christ constraineth them, carries them away, and that is the effect of knowing God through his well-beloved Son.

In the evening, in the Memorial Church, Rev. Thomas Houghton preached the Conference sermon, his text being John xii. 32, and this was followed by the Lord's Supper. D. J. E.

Zenana Bible and Medical Mission.—The autumn reinforcements for the stations in India, comprising eleven returning and three new missionaries, are to be introduced to the society's supporters, and commended to God's care and protection, at a valedictory meeting to be held on Tuesday, Oct. 17, at Morley Hall, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W., at 3 p.m. The address will be given by the Bishop of Honduras. The chair will be taken by Lord Kinnaird.

Women's Armenian Relief Fund.—The fall of rain during the past summer has not been sufficient to ensure a good harvest, so that many fields have hardly paid for harvesting, and others have not yielded a full supply. Prices accordingly have not fallen and much apprehension prevails. Dr. Raynolds pathetically writes: "We look to the future with heavy hearts, and it does seem as if we could not bear another year of scarcity." The good, devoted doctor and his wife are exhausted with perpetual hard work and anxiety, and write that they are hardly able to endure the continued strain. The committee is co-operating with that of the "Friends of Armenia" to send two ladies and a gentleman to Van, to assist Dr. Raynolds in his many arduous duties. The hon. treasurer is Mrs. Madeleine Cole, "Danchurst," Upper Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.

Ezra's Journey to Jerusalem.—Ezra viii. 21-32. Golden Text.—Ezra viii. 22.

Lesson Connection.

YOU will remember that we have already had two lessons from the book of Ezra. Can you tell who he was, and what was his employment? Do you remember also that the first six chapters in this book tell of things which happened long before we read of Ezra himself, and that fifty-eight years elapse between the events of chaps. vi. and vii.?

It is now seventy-eight years after the 50,000 Jews returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel, and fifteen years since the great deliverance through Esther. The temple had been rebuilt; but the greater part of the city remained in ruins, and the wall was not repaired. The worst of all was that the Jews grew careless and indifferent about their religion, desecrated their Sabbaths, and married heathen wives.

The Exiles in Babylonia were better than those who had returned. With them religion had revived. They kept their Sabbaths as solemn days of prayer. They had improved with the learning of the nations where they lived. They had no temple or altar; but they had the Book of God's Law, and they had scribes who read it and expounded it.

Ezra,

no doubt, knew the condition of things at Jerusalem and planned to go there with some of the most earnest of the people, and "teach in Israel statutes and judgments" (chap. vii. 10). The Persian king, who was the son of Esther's King, was pleased to let Ezra go, and said as many Jews who liked might go with him; also, he and his nobles and the people gave gold and silver, brass and jewels, &c., for them to take for the beautifying of the temple. He wrote letters of introduction to leading people in the countries they would have to pass through. For all this Ezra praised and thanked God, and then prepared to go (chap. vii. 27, 28).

Ezra, Chap. viii. 21-32.

Ezra assembled the people, who were to go with him, by the banks of the River Ahava, about 1,700 persons in all. Notice the story is now written by Ezra himself in the first person.

Verse 21. When all were ready, Ezra ordered a day of prayer and humiliation before God. He could not start on such an important journey, without an assurance of forgiveness, and of God's protecting presence. (Picture the scene of this great prayer-meeting). (Refer, Exodus xxxiii. 14, 15; Psalm v. 8.)

Verse 22. The danger of attack from the Bedouin Arabs (robbers) was very great; yet after what Ezra had told the king about God's power and protecting care, it would not be for God's honour, if he trusted in soldiers (Ps. xx. 7). (Point out the difference between faith and presumption.) If we have a promise to rest on, we may always trust.

Verse 23. Such faith is always rewarded by God (1 Sam. ii. 30; Matt. ix. 29.).

Verses 24-30. Proper precautions were taken to protect the treasure. We must not run risks and then ask God to take care of us. All the gold and silver, &c., was weighed now, and then weighed again at Jerusalem before being deposited in the Temple, to make sure that nothing was lost (1 Kings vi. 5; Neh. xiii. 4, 5). The value was about a million pounds.

Verses 31, 32. The caravan started in March and arrived in Jerusalem in July. God's care was manifested all through the journey. After three days' rest, Ezra began his work. His distress was great when he heard how deeply God's people had again sunk in sin; then, with confession of sin, and prayer he induced the people to give up their sinful practices. Ezra may be compared with our Reformers and our Puritans. He was in dead earnest for the glory of God, and did all at great cost to himself.

Practical Points.

1. Prayer should precede all our journeys; God's guidance be sought as to where we should go; God's protection from perils.

2. The conditions of forgiveness are a sense of sin, confession of the same, repentance and faith (Acts xv. 31). (Apply.)

3. True trust in God includes the use of lawful means. "Trust in God and keep your powder dry," said a great general.

4. All known sin must be put away, if we would have God's blessing and help. We must thus show that we are in earnest.

5. In what things do we need reforming?

Other Lands.

International Congregational Council.

From a Ministerial Delegate.

THE second International Congregational Council, convened at Boston, Sept. 20-28, was, from the beginning, a large and enthusiastic gathering. President J. H. Angell, LL.D., of the University of Michigan, was formally elected to the presidency, and the other officers were appointed. Impressive prayer was offered by Rev. A. H. Bradford, D.D., of Montclair, N.J., and Rev. John Brown, D.D., of Bedford, England. The evening session packed Tremont Temple, the place of meeting, with upwards of 3,000 people, when addresses of welcome were given by Governor Walcott, of Massachusetts, and Mayor Quincy, of Boston. The Governor is a splendid specimen of a cultured, manly, New England statesman, and the delegates were delighted to meet him at a reception in the State House on the following day.

President Angell, in his inaugural address, briefly traced the growth of Congregationalism in the old land, and then more fully dealt with the influences and work of the Pilgrims in the new land. These fathers, the speaker pointed out, were not perfect men, and could be best honoured by acknowledging and avoiding their faults. An intense desire to do the will of God, a deep love for the Bible, a strong individualism which was marked by wise conservatism and intelligence, but too often wanting in helpful co-operation, were mentioned as some of their leading characteristics. Coming to the work of the Council, Dr. Angell reminded his hearers that they were assembled to consider the life and action of the nineteenth, and not the seventeenth century, and prayed the guidance of the Holy Spirit in their deliberations.

On the second morning, two able addresses were delivered by the President-elect, Dr. Harris, of Amherst College, on "The Fundamental Principles of Theology;" and Professor Chamberlain Porter, D.D., of Yale University, on "The Message of the Old Testament for To day." Both addresses were broad and strong, and a most valuable contribution to PRESENT-DAY THOUGHT AND ACTION.

The first paper in the afternoon was by Principal Gosman, of Victoria College, Australia, on "Theology the Order of Nature;" who was followed by Professor Fisher, D.D., of Yale University, on "The Historical Method in Theology." These addresses were scholarly presentations of vital questions; but a large part of the vast audience was disappointed in not being able to hear Dr. Fisher, whose voice was not equal to the great auditorium. Rev. P. T. Forsyth, D.D., of Cambridge, England, who followed, was distinctly heard in every part of the Temple, and his address, on "The Evangelical Principles of Authority," roused the great audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. The exaltation of Christ, by Dr. Forsyth, brought spontaneously from many hundred tongues the hymn, "In the Cross of Christ I glory."

In the evening, the long-looked-for sermon by Principal Fairbairn, D.D., of Mansfield College, Oxford, was listened to by an audience that more than taxed the utmost capacity of Tremont Temple. The text was Matt. xvi. 18, and for an hour and a quarter, and without a note, Dr. Fairbairn held the undivided attention of his great congregation. It was a masterly utterance—scholarly, devout, and inspiring. The abiding reality of the Church was contrasted with the dreams of Plato, Dante, More and others, and gratitude expressed that it was wide enough for a shrinking Erasmus and a bold, outspoken Luther. The true apostolic succession was shown to be not necessarily in any line of men, but oftentimes in humble, obscure souls who were faithfully walking in the footsteps of the Master. In the Church, the preacher contended, Christ should be exalted as the absolute, unqualified Saviour.

The third morning opened bright and clear, and the Temple was early crowded to hear Dr. Lyman Abbott on "International Relations and Responsibilities." The speaker was at his best, and, without notes, held the closest attention of his audience. Intercommunication, the free exchange of national products, and the opening up of railways were urged for the more of the world. Diplomacy, conciliation, and arbitration were set forth as the three great means for the settlement of international disputes. The paper by Dr. Alexander Mackennal, of Bowdon, England, on "The Christian Attitude towards War in the Light of Recent Events," was another eloquent plea for peace, and a valuable contribution to the thought of the Council. Prayer, said Dr. Mackennal, is not now offered in the old land for the success of arms; and though the Conference at The Hague was not all that was desired, its "soul goes marching on."

After adjournment, a reception, provided for by the late Samuel Johnson, was tendered at the Vendome House, and later an excursion was made down Boston Harbour. These two occasions gave the delegates of different lands an opportunity for mutual acquaintance and intercourse, which was much enjoyed. The evening meeting was essentially a missionary one; and the crowd, if possible, was even greater than before. Rev. J. D. Jones, M.A., of Bournemouth, England, was the first speaker, and his presentation of the "Distinctive Characteristics of Christianity" called forth an ovation. The addresses by Rev. C. R. Brown, D.D., of Oakland, California, and Principal Fairbairn, which followed, helped further to magnify the Christian faith, and to impress the audience with the thought that the feast of good things for the evening was more by far than could be rightly received and pondered over.

Prayer for South Africa.

IN your issue of October 5, after touching upon the events now in progress in South Africa, you say:—

A day of humiliation and prayer would be a fitting sequel to the sad story of futile negotiations which seems drawing to its inevitable close.

These words caught my eye after seeking, through the medium of the October number of our paper, the South African Pioneer, to impress on the thousands of friends, who read that paper with no little interest, the necessity for some such united action. I am venturing to quote from it:—

The longer we have the privilege of watching God's dealings and the mission field generally, the more we see that our one great need is more true, real, systematic waiting upon God. Prayer will do, friends, what nothing else can do. We would therefore suggest that we might all, either alone, or in conjunction with others, spend from 9 to 10 on Sunday evening, October 22,

Firstly, in humiliation and prayer for the present state of unrest in South Africa.

Secondly, that each of our workers may receive a very definite visitation from God the Holy Ghost at this time.

Thirdly, that God's stewards may be aroused to see the privilege of sending in what we are much needing at this present time, funds for the general fund.

There are many, very many, Christians who might like to join us on that day—namely, Sunday, October 22—in the way referred to above. We generally find, when sending out a call to prayer, that it is a great help to state a definite hour when all may be bowing before God at about the same time.

Why not let this day be observed as a day of humiliation and prayer all over the country, for South Africa generally, and the missionaries there, not forgetting that wisdom may be given to our Senators at this important crisis? For who can tell, when war has once commenced, where it shall end?

Magic Lantern Work in India.

THE work of the Magic Lantern Mission lies chiefly among soldiers, sailors, policemen, and railway workers. The account of the year's labours, issued from the headquarters at Calcutta, tells of blessing on the varied efforts undertaken for the benefit of each of the classes in question. At a mission at Fort William, several military men confessed Christ. At the close of one meeting a soldier stepped forward, and testified that a particular slide had been the means of his conversion that evening.

The Gospel has been preached in lantern meetings to British and foreign seamen, and every Sunday afternoon the police constables of Calcutta are visited, religious literature being distributed and evangelistic meetings held. A notable instance is reported of the reclamation of a confirmed drunkard.

The superintendent of the Mission, Mr. Richard Fenwick, undertook a mission tour, travelling some thousands of miles, and visiting Asansol, Bandikui, and other places. He was able to get amongst the railway men, and hold meetings, which were largely attended, the people seeming eager to hear the Gospel. Very often for weeks the men get no opportunity of attending a place of worship, so that the Gospel brought to them resulted in much blessing. Large gatherings of railway men and their families were held at the Hourah and Sealdah Institutes, stirring addresses on the evils of drink being delivered, with good results.

Attention has also been devoted to the poor of Calcutta. They flock to the gatherings arranged for them, and some have professed Christianity, testifying with boldness.

Further missions are arranged for various parts of India, and the work is being organized on a permanent basis in several districts. Gospel and temperance slides and two more lanterns are asked for, also tracts for free distribution. Address the Superintendent, Magic Lantern Mission, 23, Chowringhee, Calcutta.

Army Scripture Readers.

THE Committee of this Society is arranging for readers to proceed for duty with the troops in South Africa. Of the force in readiness for embarkation three regiments have their own readers, provided by the Society, but specially supported, and it is desired to send at least three more. Unfortunately, to provide these additional readers entails withdrawing them from the garrisons at home, and the committee feels sure that there are those interested in the spiritual welfare of our soldiers who will, by providing the means, enable it to meet the extra expense necessary, and at the same time to maintain the readers in the home garrisons where their services are so valuable.

It may be that some interested in corps now proceeding to South Africa will take this opportunity of providing regimental readers, as has been done for the regiments before named. For this emergency the committee asks for £500, and will be grateful if you will kindly further this appeal by giving it publication. The Society is interdenominational. Any information will be furnished by the secretary, Colonel Geo. Philips, at the offices, 112, St. Martin's Lane.

The Northfield Extension Work.—From October 1 to 6, a series of meetings were held in Chicago, under the direction of Mr. Moody. The chief speakers were Revs. G. Campbell Morgan, R. A. Torrey, Professors White and Newell, and Dr. Gray. Three sections of the city were simultaneously assailed, meetings being held in large churches on the north, west, and south side of the city.

Openings in Rome.—Miss S. Hadland writes from Miltolino, Combermere Road, St. Leonards-on-Sea:—"I have been asked by Mr. Wall, of Rome, to inquire for two English ladies able and willing, without salaries, to assist this winter in philanthropic and evangelistic work. Knowledge of Italian is desirable, but not essential. Last winter one lady accompanied the Bible women in the tract distribution, another taught sewing, and a third superintended the crêches. In each of the preaching stations there is a harmonium, and some of the converts are anxious to learn English. I shall be pleased to give further information to inquirers, or they may write direct to Mrs. Wall, Piazza in Lucina, Rome."

The Indian Famine.

IN spite of the partial relief gained in some districts by a slight rainfall, it is evident that there is, and will be, great suffering in many parts of India as a result of the protracted drought. Lord Radstock sends to us the following letter from Mr. Frank J. Clark, Chief Engineer's Office, G.I.P.Ry., Bombay, with the suggestion that all contributions should be sent direct:—

You will have read in the newspapers of the sad certainty of famine in the near future in this part of India—of possibly even a severer description than in 1897. Already there is much severe distress. I have had news of cases of the poor people leaving their children on the verandahs of mission houses, being unable to give them food. It is not only a famine of food and fodder, but a water famine also.

If you are thinking of reviving the Christian Succour to India Fund, may I ask you to remember that I should count it a great privilege to be of use in any way that you may need?

One's heart bleeds for these poor people at all times, and when the horrors of famine and pestilence are added their case is indeed sad.

Rev. Albert Norton, 89, Civil Lines, Poona, in a communication just to hand, says:—

During the past twenty-four hours, rain has fallen in various sections of the "famine area;" but while it cools the air and helps growing fodder, yet, when we remember that we are within twenty-two days of the usual close of the rainy season in Bombay Presidency, we cannot expect that it is going to undo the damage of the past three months' drought. And there is very little doubt that India is entering into the throes of another terrible famine, which will be rendered more destructive, because coming so soon after the severe scourge of 1897, and because of a scarcity of water, which I believe has never been known to be as great in any previous famine.

Another correspondent has received a letter from Pundita Ramabai, from which we give the following description of conditions resulting in the same locality:—

The vegetables and fruit trees planted around these wells are dying away. Our girls had scarcely any vegetables during the past six months, and as the grains are growing dearer and dearer, we had to give up eating rice, wheat, and other such nourishing things, and live on the coarsest and cheapest grain we could get, and even that is now at a higher price. Our cows and buffaloes yield very little milk, as they have no green grass. All but thirty very little children have to go without milk and butter. All the people are starving, and flock around Mukti in quest of food and work to sustain their lives. On Wednesday last, nearly 200 starving people came into our compound; and, as I went out, the people literally besieged me, and the women took hold of my hand and began to beg hard to give them some work.

They came again the next day from all directions. Some sixty were employed at once; but others were told to go away and come later, as there was no work for them this week. Some went away very much disappointed; but others sat around the house, as if determined never to leave the premises until they got some work. When I went out again at nine o'clock to look after the work, they besieged me again. Little boys and girls spoke in such a piteous manner that I could but promise to employ them all. But they did not leave the place until all their names were written down on the roll, and got a positive promise of employment the next week. We can help only a few of these starving men and women. The Lord has put it into the generous heart of someone to send us some money for Mukti school-building. The money which was sent for this purpose will be enough to lay the foundation, and this work will last just one month. After that the Lord will know what is best for us all.

We here at Mukti are willing to bear any kind of hardship, if it be the Lord's will to even discipline us by another famine. Pray for us, and especially for these poor people, who are dying without the hope of eternal life.

Mrs. E. V. Baker, who is at present in England on behalf of Ramabai's work, suggests a very sensible way of helping these poor people. The building, for the foundation of which only money is in hand, is badly needed; and if funds are forthcoming for this purpose, it will mean work for the people, and thus the best kind of relief. Two thousand pounds will be required to carry this through. Mrs. E. V. Baker may be addressed—Berachah, 89 Scarisbrick New Road, Southport.

Asking the Way to Zion.

FROM the leader of a community of Jews in a neighbouring country, I have received the following touching communication and appeal:—

Honoured and worthy friend of the Lord, and friend of Israel,—In presenting my respects to you, I must beg you first of all to regard my letter as private, so that no one may know that I have written,* for that might injure my position and bring me into danger. A year and a-half ago I was appointed president of a Brotherly Agricultural Society, our purpose being to find a settlement in some land where we might pursue agriculture. The Society is composed of thirty robust, sensible, educated families, some of whose members have learned trades. They are very poor, however, from want of occupation, and are much to be pitied.

Therefore, I ask you to show them compassion. The thirty families number two hundred souls. Their desire is to get to a land in Asia or Syria, where they could till the ground. Some of the families are from Russia; others are of this country, but have been driven from their villages. They are by no means people who are not willing to work; but persecution and oppression have brought them into distress. Many of the children are now going about idle, without school. I entreat the Father of mercies, of righteousness, and of salvation, to be gracious to these forsaken ones. As I have heard that you are ready to do good, I beg you to make haste in this matter, and bring us to a place of rest. If your congregation will buy land for us on the Island of Cyprus, as it has done for others,† we shall pay our debt in yearly instalments from the produce of the soil.

I beg you to take steps in the matter as soon as possible, for each day is to us longer than a year—yea, than twenty years. Our community is truly in a most deplorable condition. I have confidence in the Almighty that you will do something for our deliverance, for it is the will of God, and of Jesus Christ, to restore the lost, to aid those who are in misery, to heal the sick. The papers you sent me reached me. May blessing come to you, for I was thereby refreshed. I am acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, and with the New Testament, but keep this secretly in my heart. Of the thirty families, there are six that are of the same mind with me in this matter, and I instruct them in the Scriptures. On the first and second days of our New Year, I preached in the synagogue on Isaiah lviii. and Jeremiah xxxi. I was afraid, however, of the Jews. I am Chacham, Cantor, &c., but I have no place for meetings where I might deliver addresses as I would desire. It is also sad to see more than sixty children without proper instruction. We have no means to erect a school, and have not even money for daily bread. I beg you to send me your answer, if possible, in the Hebrew language, as I am not so well acquainted with German, and would be afraid of disclosing the contents of your letter to one understanding German.—I am, &c., —— ——

I shall be glad to receive advice and help on behalf of these children of the dispersion. They are groping after the light, and seeking rest. It is evident, I think, that some of them are, in the true sense, "asking the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward."

Zambesi Industrial Mission.

MR. CALDWELL, writing from Chinde at the mouth of the Zambesi River, mentions the urgent need for a small iron church at Chinde, together with a Sailors' Rest and reading-room. He thinks the total cost would not exceed £400. There is no place of worship at Chinde, and one is very badly needed. He adds, "I am asking God to send in the money, and as it is wholly for his glory and for the good of men, I am persauded the amount will be forthcoming. Will you make this a matter of special expectant prayer until God answers?"

It would greatly cheer the hearts of the few Christians who are at Chinde if any should feel led to help in this matter, and it would provide a place of worship not only for the natives, but for the Europeans who are stationed there in connection with the Government service and the mercantile operations. One lady sends promising to give £25 if eleven others will do the same, and a gentleman has promised £50 if the balance is provided.

London Missionary Society.

THE one hundred and fourth report of this Society has just been issued. It is worthy of much more attention than reports usually receive, not only because of the wide and varied field of the Society's labourers, but as a record of steady progress, often in spite of great difficulties. We have carefully read for many years the Society's annual reports; but we never remember one more full of interesting and encouraging details, especially in relation to the greatest of its spheres of labour, India and China.

Besides these, it has strong mission centres in South and Central Africa, Madagascar, Polynesia, South-East New Guinea, and some kindly interest in the West Indies.

Its entire staff of Europeans consists of 196 male and seventy-six female missionaries. Its native agents are unusually numerous, and, for the most part, carefully selected and trained. Of these, there are 892 ordained ministers, 2,966 evangelists and preachers, 800 Christian teachers, and 226 Bible women.

In its mission stations, there are 52,803 church members and communicants, and 175,588 Christian adherents; whilst, in its 1,037 schools, there are 34,499 boys and 16,104 girls, all receiving an education on a thoroughly Christian basis.

The African missions are impeded by European, racial and national strifes. Those once flourishing in Madagascar have but partially recovered from the effects of the French invasion.

The most marked feature of the New Guinea Mission is that its ten European missionaries are aided by 104 native pastors, mostly drawn from Churches formed in the South Sea Islands by the Society's missionaries in former years.

In some of the Indian and China spheres, opposition is intense and systematic; whilst the indications of progress are full of promise. To avow faith in Christ means persecution and ruin in their most subtle and heartless forms; nevertheless, the Bible is more read, its truths and doctrines more discussed, and Christianity more respected and feared than ever before.

The report affords numerous illustrations of the growing influence of Christianity in these two greatest centres of heathenism.

No field occupied by this Society is more full of promise—more "ripe for the harvest"—than South India, and none would better repay an effective reinforcement of missionaries solely devoted to preaching and evangelizing efforts among the heathen.

Canary Island.

BEING under Spanish Government, the people have been vigorously ruled to know no other religion but that of the Romish faith. The Spanish nation, peculiar among all other civilized nations for the absolute prohibition of God's Book throughout her dominions, has succeeded in her methods in Canary Island. No other religion has reached the ears of the people.

Many are receiving the Word here with joy, and several secret readers are found. In every case, almost without exception, there is heartfelt gratitude in listening to the words, one even requesting to come and live with us that she may learn more. We visited one very distant village and stayed at the inn, and some eight to twelve have gathered to read daily. The post and telegraph master is the secretary of this Society. One convert, Antonio, is most bright and promising, and has the qualifications for an evangelist. He is the first known converted Spaniard in the island.

Bara Bazaar, Calcutta.—An appeal was inserted in these columns some time ago for funds to build a preaching-hall in this populous district. The Committee (C.M.S.) are now offered a capital sit with buildings, but at least £2,000 must be forthcoming immediately. A wealthy Marwari merchant has expressed himself willing to put down £12,000 for an adjoining piece of ground, "in order to prevent the Christians making converts of the Marwaris." Will any servant of the Lord do one-sixth of this for his Master? Communications may be sent to Mrs. Saffery, 71, Crouch Hill, London, N.

Leaving Home.

"OUR Martha is going to London!" Her little brothers and sisters croon the news over among themselves, as they toddle about the lanes or play at ball on the village green. Her father, the old farm hand, mutters it while taking the horses home from ploughing, finding it difficult to realize that his eldest girl is to go to the big City "to fend for herself." As for mother, she has a good cry or two, and has to con some familiar words of comfort from the old, stitched, and worn copy of the Psalms, before she can muster courage

TO PACK MARTHA'S BOX.

Then she sets vigorously to work, putting in, by the way, a neat new Bible, inscribed "Martha, with mother's love. The Lord bless thee and keep thee;' and perhaps, if a scanty income will stand the strain, a silver embossed text-card—"When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?"

The family is up early on the day of departure, and escorts Martha down to the little railway station, where the good-humoured old man—who combines the duties of porter, ticket-collector, and signalman—labels the box with great care, as he is bidden to do with much impatience by Martha's smallest brother, a sturdy youth aged six. Then comes the last good-bye. Martha's eyes are swimming with tears as she bestows farewell kisses. Her father, poor old fellow, draws out a red cotton handkerchief and turns away with a kind of gurgle in his throat that is suspiciously like a sob, while her mother bids her "Be a good gal, and be sure an' belong to a Bible class."

The train comes grinding in, striking sparks from the rails. "Good-bye, Martha!" The warning shriek of a whistle, a puff of feathery smoke wreathing white against the green landscape, and the train curves round the cutting and disappears from view.

Follow Martha, in your mind, to London; picture her alighting in the bustle of a great terminus, in a hurly-burly of clatter and noise, and guess where she will go. "Oh," you say, "of course she will pop her box into the luggage office, jump into a 'bus, and go to her situation, or perhaps to an auntie's, where she will have a cup of tea, and from lots of little cousins. Her mother would arrange all that of course."

Wisely said; but "the poor have few friends," and many a girl, such as Martha, arrives in London depending on the promise of a relative, but doomed to disappointment. In the wilderness of London she is alone. "Oh! it is pitiful: near a whole city full, friend has she none!" But stay, there is a burly porter who looks sympathetically on poor Martha, and directs her attention to a card, which gives some brief information to young women who find themselves homeless.

"Put yer box in this 'ere place," says the porter. "This gent 'ands you a ticket for it, for which you gives him tuppence; or, leastways, havin' girls o' my own, I lends or gives it to you, and off you goes to that address."

Follow Martha yet once again. She comes into worthy hands, and is told: "Well, you must get a place as a dressmaker, as you've a knowledge of the business. You won't get much money at the start, at any rate, but perhaps you can lodge at Mr. Shrimpton's."

"Mr. Shrimpton's?" says Martha.

"Yes, come along; I'll take you round to Lincoln House after you've had some tea, and we'll see if there's room for you."

So they thread the maze of busy streets into a broad thoroughfare near Regent's Park, and call at a fine, lofty-looking building called "Lincoln House." It is a large house, which would easily contain the old home cottage over and over again. Clean and bright, managed in a Christian spirit, the Home shelters many girls who pay a small sum for their food and lodging—less than they could manage on elsewhere.

To many a Martha, this thoughtful plan of Mr. Shrimpton's—which has resulted in the opening of a in convenient parts of London, managed from the centre, at 3, Victoria Street, S.W.—means all the difference between the respectability of a Christian home and the squalid misery of a cubicle in a dirty East End lodging-house. The girls came in, tired from their daily toil in factory or work-room, to find cheer and comfort. A kind doctor attends to them if they chance to be ill; and in missions, and during friendly talks with the matrons, they are led into the Way of Life.

We may easily imagine "Our Martha," after a little time in London, writing letters home full of hope, marked with lots of crosses that mean kisses to one and all, and even enclosing a postal order "to buy mother a winter jacket."

We, who love Jesus, are but pilgrims and strangers, in a world that will not own our King; and one way in which we may prove the reality of our love is by showing forth his gentle spirit, and giving such practical help as we can to those in distress. Let us remember not only the Marthas of our city and country life, but all who are sad and sorrowful, and do good to them; for

The great God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all. H.

"The Christian" Bible-Searcher.

RULES.

Answers to the "Bible Searcher" are acknowledged in two lists:—

(1) Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue.

(2) Those received later, in the one following. But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the Competition appears.

No Concordance may be used or help given with the answers, but the questions may be explained when necessary.

No papers can be re-examined.

It is necessary that letters should be properly stamped, and that names should be written very distinctly. A star (*) is given for neatness and extra care in answering the questions.

A Prize Competition is given the last week of March, June, September, and December. To be eligible, every child must have been correct nine times during the preceding twelve weeks.

Those whose 10th or 13th birthdays occur during the quarter may continue the weekly Searcher in the same division, but must enter for the Prize Competition for their actual age. There is no limit of age for weekly competitors; but no one above 20 years of age can enter for the Quarterly Competition.

All communications must be addressed to "Uncle Tom," the Young People's Editor of "The Christian," 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 197).

1. What class of persons were forbidden to take intoxicating drink? (Leviticus ix.-xii.; Numbers v.-vii.; Jeremiah xxxiv.-xxxvii.)

2. Name any individuals (in Judges, Jeremiah, Daniel) who abstained.

3. Enumerate, with references, as many other water-drinkers as you can find in the Bible.

4. (a) What description of such is given in Lamentations? (b) What is said there of those who had broken their vow? (c) Give description from Proverbs of wine-drinkers.

5. Give instances in David's life of his wanting or valuing water.

6. On what occasions did our Lord make or use wine?

7. Who is mentioned in the New Testament as taking wine for health's sake?

(Children under ten do Nos. 1b and 6; under thirteen, Nos. 1, 4c, and 6; under seventeen, Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 6.)

Personal.

Now and then parents write asking if I cannot give a lithographed specimen of how the papers should be answered. I do not think this is necessary, as out of the thousands of papers I receive during the year there are very few that are not done in the right form.

Herbert Braddon.—I am glad to welcome you back again, and to know that you have had such a splendid time in America.

Emily Bridgewater.—Yes, I have missed your answers week by week, and am glad to know you have quite recovered from your illness.

Mabel and Olive Fleet.—I think it would be much easier for you both if you only did as many questions as are set for your age. Olive.—I am glad to know you are going to try to answer the "Searcher" each week.

Winnie Page.—Thank you for your letter. I am very glad to know you have "joined the Church," and hope to hear the same of others of your elder cousins.

Edith Wheeler.—Thank you for the cleverly-written "acrostic" enclosed with your Searcher.

Fanny Stileman.—I am sorry you have been disappointed. Your paper is tidier this week, but you do not write as nicely as some of your cousins, who are much younger.

Ella Ward.—You may do all the questions if you care to, as you are old enough. Uncle Tom.

Iona Cathedral.—The Duke of Argyll has made the valuable gift of the Iona Cathedral "to trustees to hold it for the Established Church of Scotland." His grace came into possession of the Island of Iona fifty-three years ago, and found himself the proprietor of the ancient architectural remains. In the event of the Church of Scotland being disestablished, the deed of trust provides that the building shall become the property of such church or body of Protestants and Presbyterians as shall be adjudged most nearly representative of the previously Established Church.

Cruelty for Fashion's Sake.—The slaughter of seals is, as a rule, most barbarious, bloody, and hideous. Specially cruel is the task when seal-pikes are used. Only rarely does a seal die from one or two blows of the pike; and, if not dead, it is generally considered "all the better," for it is easier to skin a seal when it is half alive. In the uttermost agony the wretched animal draws its muscles away from the sharp steel which tears away its skin, and thus assists in parting with its own coat. Anything more diabolical it would be difficult to conceive. A dark shadow, indeed, hangs over the fascinating and beautiful seal-skin jacket—a shadow of unutterable cruelty which ought to be cleared away.

Smithfield Martyrs' Memorial.—In commemoration of the martyrs who suffered at Smithfield, there has stood, since 1870, a tablet sunk in the wall of St. Bartholomew's Hospital reminding the passer-by "that within a few feet of this spot James Bradford, John Rogers, John Philpott, and others suffered death by fire for the Faith of Christ in the years 1555-6-7." Time and London dust had long rendered the memorial almost illegible; but, lately, the Protestant Alliance has taken it in hand, and had it thoroughly renovated. The ceremony of unveiling was performed on Saturday week in the presence of a considerable concourse of spectators by Rev. M. E. Farwell, Mr. Nicholson, and other active members of the Protestant Alliance. Madame Antoinette Sterling, who is a lineal descendant of the martyr Bradford, was also present.

Home Missions.

A Long Record.

TWENTY-EIGHT YEARS IN HYDE PARK.

WE have completed another season in this splendid Forum of the people. One's mind runs back to the past. Here Wesley preached in 1750, on the occasion of an earthquake, from the text, "Though the earth be removed." Whitefield also addressed an unprecedented concourse on the day when it was prophesied the world would end; and on other memorable occasions great men of olden times have preached here.

It was in 1872 that we were first privileged to begin aggressive evangelistic efforts; and on a recent Sunday, our closing night of the season, we had the joy of praising God for some who were found asking the question, "What must we do to be saved?" The opposition from infidels at first was remarkable; now we have none. The meetings have grown in interest and in numbers. The work commending itself to the late Lord Congleton, he, till the day of his entrance into heaven, helped us by his presence and his means.

One of the most singular things about these meetings is the fact that a very large number of the converts are foreigners; over twenty nationalities have been represented. One of the first converts was a foreigner, and almost the last two this year are also natives of another land. We rejoice that any success that our God has been pleased to grant has been directly through of reconciliation by the death of Christ, and justification through the risen Saviour; and these truths, set forth in simplest language, apart from any pretence of culture or eloquence, have maintained a crowd of some thousands all these years. To our God be all the glory, as from Him has come all the power.

In early days a persistent infidel was brought to Christ and led out into his service, and was enabled to labour in Northampton—at that time the headquarters of the Secularist party—where his labours were greatly owned. Three very distinct cases of conversion, of those who got their living on the stage, have occurred; one of whom is doing good work to-day as an evangelist in America. The other two both gave up the stage directly after their conversion. All our elder brethren who labour with us date their conversion from the work, and our band of trained singers are men and women who have been blessed by the Gospel. It is a sine qua non that those who sing the Gospel with us must first have been saved by the Gospel.

We trace a good deal of the blessing which we have seen to our

SATURDAY EVENING PRAYER MEETING.

We have been careful to promote this meeting, whereat we are free to praise and pray as God may fire our hearts and touch our lips. The most noticeable feature about the week-night meetings in the Park is the vast majority of men present. Literally by hundreds they have come, and stood from 8 till 9.30; and however straight and faithful has been the message, however awful the denunciations against sin, yet these men have stood the whole meeting out, and scores have followed on to the hall, and every week not a few have confessed Christ.

Our brethren, Pastor Fuller Gooch, Dr. Harry Guinness, Mr. Leonard Weaver, and others who have helped us, have all been struck by the proportional number and close attention of the male part of the audience. Surely it is cause for praise that God has for so long given us the joy of preaching "Jesus" in this favoured spot. I am sure that, as at Corinth, God has "much people in this city."

At no time during all these years have we ever accepted or mentioned money at the meetings. We supply all with a well-printed programme of sacred music, which also contains an invitation to our indoor meeting. Will our friends kindly remember me in their prayers, for the strain of these many services has told upon my strength? Over 3,000 addresses to immense audiences tells upon even a good constitution. But we joyfully raise an Ebenezer and a Hallelujah, and exclaim, "What hath God wrought?"

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS IN THE METROPOLITAN.

On Sunday, October 1, we resumed once more our winter's campaign. Closing the Park on the last Sunday in September, we always begin in the Metropolitan Music Hall the following Lord's Day. We are thankful to be able to report that we have again secured it for the Gospel.

Other people besides the Lord's are going in for a revival. Covent Garden Theatre and the Agricultural Hall, and many other places, have been secured by the Sunday League for the first time this year. The programme for Covent Garden for Sunday, October 8, is all distinctly secular music, as issued by them on their public bills. Not one item, as printed, is professedly sacred.

Hence we need to do all we can to forward God's work among the masses. For twenty-five years we have used this large theatre, now seating 3,000, but it will become more difficult to carry on such work as the enemy opens up fresh fields of Sunday desecration; and I would affectionately ask the Lord's stewards to remember the needs of God's workers, and help us to "hold the fort" still. We are invariably full to the doors; and, though we have but the voices of the singers, and the message of the preacher, to attract the people, yet we trust we have demonstrated that large crowds will still gather where the Gospel is the main attraction.

But though in Hyde Park we pay no rent, and the electric light is not charged for, yet it is not so in our theatre and at Hyde Park Hall. Since the theatre has been rebuilt our rent is much heavier, and our yearly balance-sheet runs to over £1,000.

If those to whom my name and work are known are able to show fellowship with me in this work at this time, I should be grateful and encouraged. Above all, also pray God may bless these services more abundantly than he has hitherto done; and preserve us to his glory and his service. CHAS. COOK.

London Jews' Society.

THE London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews has, in the last ten years, considerably augmented its staff of missionaries, especially in England, Palestine, and Persia. This advance, only consented to under urgent necessity, has led to a considerable deficiency in the accounts, and an appeal has just been issued for further help. The present indebtedness amounts to £8,000. This deficit is a subject of constant and anxious prayer in the committee room.

Thousands are watching the movements, and praying with heart-stirring intensity, for the welfare of Israel; and the committee very earnestly appeal for a large place in these petitions, believing that God will assuredly give the increase. The agents of the Society now number 184, and it is desirable that the deficit shall be extinguished, and the standing income be materially increased. Communications may be addressed to Rev. W. Fleming, 16, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C.

Women's Protestant Union.—Meetings were recently held in connection with the "All Day of Prayer," at Exeter Hall. Praise for an open Bible, for the preservation of the Sabbath, and for the many faithful witnesses to the truth, formed part of the proceedings, whilst at each meeting there was a continuous stream of petitions on behalf of Protestant effort at home and abroad, for the further awakening of God's people to the need of prayer and action, for the abolition of the conventual system, for the revelation of the simple truth as it is in Jesus to the blinded Romanists and Ritualists, and for many kindred subjects. Helpful addresses were given by Madame Rozas, Miss Soltau, and Mr. Arbuthnot, president of the Union.

Mr. Fegan's Work.

THE vicinity of Southwark has long borne an unhappy reputation as the scene of sordid misery, difficult to surpass, in accentuated horror, even amongst the many slums of the Metropolis. Although the ghastly abodes of vice and disease portrayed in the pages of Kingsley have largely ceased to exist, other haunts of degradation have arisen. The lawless characters of the thirties and forties have their lineal descendants in the Hooligans of to-day.

In such a district there is, of necessity, the amplest scope for mission work of a far-reaching and varied character. Such a work is found in the many undertakings connected with Mr. Fegan's Homes. With the Refuges for Lads and the Youths' Institute, most persons, who follow the records of philanthropic work, are familiar. To these are added a number of helpful organizations for the help of factory girls and other toilers, and especially for the benefit of the sick poor. Some interesting particulars of the work were given on Thursday last at a series of gatherings held in the Home Mission Hall in Holland Street, Blackfriars.

In the afternoon, Mr. J. W. C. FEGAN made special reference to the work recently concluded among the HOP-PICKERS ON THE KENTISH FIELDS.

There was much sickness, as the result of damp, bad food, lack of proper clothing, and neglect; and the workers had been enabled, while alleviating suffering, to speak for the Master. The tent gatherings were times of blessing, hundreds of rough characters listening to the speakers with keen attention, and, in a number of instances, subsequently professing faith in Christ. Crowds of pickers made the local public-houses their favourite resort, and the open-air meetings were held in close proximity.

On one occasion, Mr. Fegan and his workers took possession, by permission of a surprised but agreeable publican, of a tap-room, the harmonium and choir drawing a dense crowd. A glorious time resulted, and those unable to obtain admission insisted on a further service being held on their account. The final open-air meetings, continued Mr. Fegan, were productive of many expressions of interest. The Word was with power, and some of the roughest men were in tears. "Guvnor," said a big man, leaning against a tree, and flourishing a pewter pot, but speaking with all sincerity, "might we have 'We shall know each other better when the mists have rolled away?'" Another subsequently pleaded for "Grace, 'tis a charming sound;" and a third, evidently an ex-convict, pleaded for "Jesu, lover of my soul;" while yet another burly man suggested, as a proper conclusion, "God be with you till we meet again." The singing of the choir of boys was very popular with the crowds, and the simple delivery of the Gospel message BROUGHT TEARS TO MANY EYES.

Some of the cases dealt with were hopeful.

Dr. SAVAGE gave some vivid accounts of the medical administration, and said that about 10 per cent. of the pickers in the district had received treatment. Sisters GRACE and ROSE told of varied experiences in their ministrations. The latter spoke of a rough Irishwoman's conversion and of Romanists dealt with. A Sunday morning visit to the huts, to care for a little child, who lay on the straw suffering from pneumonia, was touchingly recited. The people had paused in their cooking and washing to press round and inquire, "Do you fink the little chap's a-goin' to live, sister?" Advantage was taken to speak words of loving counsel to the motley but affected crowd. A dying woman, who was visited, was found to be deeply convicted of sin, crying, "O my sins, my sins!" She was pointed to the Saviour, and died in peace.

Other speakers added instances of encouraging results, and Mr. D. C. APPERLY concluded a helpful and satisfactory meeting with words of thankfulness for the blessing which had attended the mission throughout.

The evening gathering was presided over by Mr. A. BOAKE, and, after the Ramsgate Orphanage boys had sung very sweetly, Mr. Fegan and Mr. RANSOME WALLIS gave interesting reports of the "camping out" at Wisborough Green. In a vigorous speech, Mr. J. Wilson (Wisborough Parish Council) bore witness to the regard in which Mr. Fegan and his boys are held in the whole district, the good conduct of the boys during the four summers they had been there, and the spiritual influence "the Camp" had exercised for miles round. After Mr. Boake had spoken a few words of hearty sympathy, dissolving views were shown, illustrating "Camping Out" and Medical Mission work.

Behind Prison Bars.

THE new rules which have been formulated by the authorities for use in prisons will be received with general satisfaction on account of their humane character.

The report of the Commissioners of Prisons and Directors of Convict Prisons gives the following particulars:—"The period of separate confinement for a person sentenced to penal servitude is reduced from nine months to six. Letters and visits are allowed more frequently. Provision is made for a more frequent from the library. The facilities for elementary education are increased by the admission of a larger number to the privilege, and by setting apart more hours per week for instruction. Well-behaved prisoners are allowed, after serving a certain portion of their sentence, to walk and converse with other prisoners, if in the opinion of the governor such association is not likely to be injurious. This privilege is withheld if the governor has any reason to suspect that it will be abused."

With regard to youthful offenders, the Commissioners consider that two Bills now before Parliament will, if passed, considerably reduce the number of commitments to prison. One extends the alternative of whipping to all offences except homicide, and the other prohibits preliminary sentences of imprisonment in reformatory cases. The object aimed at by these bills is to prevent the stigma of imprisonment from attaching to juveniles except in grave cases.

"The good work being done on behalf of prisoners by the Church Army," the report declares, "deserves more than a passing notice. The that have taken place in a large number of prisons during the year are stated almost universally to have been a success. Taking place as they do with the cordial co-operation of the prison authority, and without interference with the order and discipline of the prison, we do not hesitate to say that, while they can do no harm, they may be productive of much good; and we feel that the thanks of the community are due to Mr. Carlile and his body of earnest workers, who have not been afraid, at a considerable cost of time and money, to enter into these hitherto untrodden ways, with the hope of rescuing some brand from the burning. The Church Army also, through its scheme of labour homes, offers opportunity for the employment of discharged prisoners, which is much appreciated by aid societies."

Further advance has been made in the appointment of lady visitors to the local prisons, the only prisons now remaining unvisited in this respect being Brecon, Canterbury, Northampton, Shrewsbury, and Winchester. There can be no doubt of the valuable work that is being done by these ladies, both in London and in the provinces. It is not too much to say that no case of a female prisoner, furnishing a worthy subject for charitable aid, can pass unnoticed, and much practical good has been done by the rehabilitation of deserving cases.

Lancaster Town Mission.—Seven years of successful undenominational work have been concluded in connection with this organization, and the workers have secured the Palace of Varieties for Sunday services. Mr. G. H. Weekes, hon. secretary, Town Mission Hall, would be glad to know of any qualified evangelist, or other earnest Christian, who would be willing to take Sunday work free of charge.

North London Convention.

ON September 29, the second North London Convention closed, and with feelings of very deep gratitude, we acknowledge it to be better in every sense than the first!

From the very commencement God set his seal upon the gatherings, which were not only largely attended, but increased as the days went on in deep solemnity and expectancy. Prayer has indeed been abundantly answered, each speaker coming directly as a messenger from God and in the power of the Holy Spirit.

After tea (which was held each day in the schoolroom) there were bright, helpful, testimony meetings, at which several told their difficulties and were helped by the answers of others who had gone through the same trials of faith, and so could testify to the way in which they had been delivered. These gatherings were some of the most helpful of the Convention.

Liberty in prayer was especially marked, several who could not attend the meetings writing to say how free they felt when pleading with God for the gatherings. Once more we "have proved God answers prayer," and feel we cannot praise Him enough.

From the very first meeting, there was a deep conviction of sin. This was surely beginning at the right end; and, as one after another yielded to the Spirit's will, He led them on into further light and blessing, till truly, at the close of the Convention, shining faces were to be seen on all sides. The teaching throughout was Scriptural, clear, distinctive, and practical, going down into the every-day details of life, and showing that even for the smallest duty (such as carrying up coals from the coal-cellar) God can be glorified; and the power of the Holy Spirit is needed for these very things.

From all sides, testimonies are coming in of blessing received, and we trust many lives will testify afresh, in their homes and spheres of work, of the power of a living Christ.

Irish Notes.

THE Irish Church Conference, which was held in Dublin last week, passed off, on the whole, successfully. It was well attended, and witnessed a new and very proper departure in Irish ecclesiastical affairs, by receiving an address and deputation from the Presbytery of Dublin. Amongst others, a paper was read by Dr. Crozier, Bishop of Ossory, on the "Attitude of the Church towards other Religious Bodies;" but he had no better suggestion to offer than that they should co-operate with members of other denominations in such matters as temperance. A paper was read on "Gambling;" and it is noticeable that the Bishop of Derry said, in reference to this matter, that he did not believe that all drawings for prizes at an art union or at a bazaar were culpable. The Conference was conducted upon Evangelical lines, and on the whole was instructive and useful.

In the new District Councils it is regrettable to find that the sectarian spirit is coming very prominently to the front. For instance, in the Clonmel Lunatic Asylum Board, a resolution has been passed to the effect that, whenever a second doctor has to be called in, he must be a Roman Catholic; and in the Maryborough Infirmary the doctor has got notice to leave, ostensibly on the ground that he has not been properly appointed, but really on the authority of the Roman Catholic parish priest of the town, Monsignor Phelan, because he is a Protestant. These cases speak for themselves.

A valedictory service has been held in the Metropolitan Hall, Dublin, to take leave of seventeen Irish missionaries who are going out to the foreign field in connection with the C.M.S. or the C. of E. Zenana Missionary Society. The Dean of St. Patrick's presided, and short addresses were delivered by missionaries. The valedictory address was delivered by the Archdeacon of Ferns.

Work in Somers Town.—In an interesting letter to his friends and neighbours, Rev. Z. B. Woffendale, of Somers Town Presbyterian Church, recalls pleasant memories of the commencement of the mission work thirty years since. Mr. Woffendale describes the development of the undertaking and the erection of the church, in which the pastor still has the joy of preaching the Gospel. The arrangements for forthcoming church and institute gatherings promise well for a winter session of blessing.

Christian Endeavour.

Topic for October 15.

"Lost opportunities."—Jer. viii. 20, Matt. xxiii. 37-39, Heb. xii. 17.

EVERYONE has an opportunity. There is often no symptom of its approach, no sign of its departure. It comes as the dawn, and departs as the light of the dying day. There is no voice nor language; its voice is not heard, but it is as all-important and momentous as though angels had looked out of heaven, and had announced it with sound of trumpet. When once the opportunity is missed it rarely comes again.

It is said that her Majesty once gave a comparatively unknown painter the opportunity of a private sitting. A certain hour and moment were arranged. She came into the corridor at the exact time, but he was five minutes late, and she never gave him another opportunity. So the Greeks represented opportunity as bald, with no lock of hair by which she could be laid hold of as she turned her back and fled. It is an old proverb that time and tide wait for no man. The life-boat is borne by the breaker to the level of the sinking vessel; whoso steps on board at that precise moment is saved, but the chance never recurs.

Esau—his hungry appetite stimulated by the savory smell of Jacob's preparation—barters his birthright. What recks he of the spiritual prerogative of the first-born to act as the priest of the clan, and stand in the possible lineal descent of the Messiah. He craves what will satisfy and please his sense. But when he has sold his birthright, he is held to the transaction. "He found no place of repentance," which does not mean that he wished to and could not, but that the die was cast, the decision was deemed final; he was taken at his word. And it is within the range of every one to do an act, to make a choice, to barter away the spiritual for the material, so absolutely, that the decision is held irrevocable. It is countersigned by Divine Providence, and becomes law. Let us take care lest we be betrayed by passion into an act which will affect our entire destiny.

Similarly, when Jesus went in and out of Jerusalem, it was her day. Its dawn was when, as a babe, he was borne into the temple; its meridian was the period of his marvellous ministry; its sunset was when the priests and populace hounded Him to the Cross. Woe worth the day! The outstretched wing of God's love would have sheltered the holy city from its impending fate, but she refused Him in his servants and his Son, and there was no screen from the fury of Rome. Her prayers and protestations could not avail.

Even so, salvation waits for us all. Sometimes it advances very near, and knocks at our doors. It stands and waits. We are almost persuaded. We are on the point of yielding. Summer is there with its genial warmth and bewitching beauty, but we allow it to fade before the autumnal decay and the winter frost. The harvest comes with its reapers and binders. The heavy wains bear home the sheaves, but we elude them, and remain out on the bare fields. The last of the fruit-gatherers leaves the orchard, and we still remain on our bough unplucked. Ah, there is small chance now of being saved! But there is hope as long as the day of grace is not closed, and God has not said: "Let him alone!" But, as McCheyne said, Christ gives last knocks.

There are now about 9,000 Christian Endeavour Societies in Congregational Churches in all the world, or nearly, if not quite, as many societies as there are living, active Congregational Churches. Not that every Congregational Church has a C.E. Society, but in many churches there are two and even three.

* * *

Mr. William E. Pennell, who died September 13, was the first signer of the first constitution of the first C.E. Society. Since then, a vast procession of young people, nearly five million strong, has followed his lead. His favourite and constant expression was, How good God is!

* * *

The best society in Illinois has a speaking committee, whose duty it is to appoint and prepare as many speakers on the topic as are necessary, to ensure against waste of time.

The Tenth Legion now numbers on its rolls 15,161.

It will make many hearts yearn towards Palestine, to glance at the programme of the 1900 pilgrimage to the Holy Land and Egypt, organized by John Willis Baer, and other leaders of the C.E. They have secured the magnificent steamer Prince Bismarck, and sail direct for the Mediterranean.

Which is it to be?

Advance or Retrenchment?

134 MISSIONARY AGENTS IN 1890
184 „ „ „ 1899

This advance has naturally increased the expenditure; so much so, that on March the 31st last the Committee were left to face a deficit on the General Fund of £11,037—now reduced to about £8,050. The expenditure for 1898-9 was the highest in the history of the Society.

The Committee are reluctantly compelled to contemplate retrenchment. This practically means curtailment of the Mission. They have decided, however, first to make this General Appeal, in the hope that they may have the prayers and the generous and liberal assistance of God's people in this immediate and most anxious matter.

London Tent Campaign.

NOTWITHSTANDING the heavy weather of the past week, the Tents have been well filled, both at Clapham, Battersea, and Peckham Rye.

The scene at Clapham during the week has been an impressive one; many sought the Lord. Christians were so stirred up that they were crying out for the salvation of their relatives.

An interesting case was that of a lady who spoke to Mr. Weaver after the preaching, telling him her story, which was to the following effect:—Her father was an infidel who would never allow the name of Christ to be mentioned in the household. After years she married a Jew, who blasphemed the name of Jesus from day to day. The lady, although now perhaps between forty and fifty years of age, said she had never had the Bible in her hand until one month ago at the Tent. "Then," said she, "I felt that I had the Word of God in my hand," and from that moment she became anxious about her soul. Her great difficulty was the Divinity of Christ, and, on Sunday morning, she retired to her room and prayed earnestly, "'O God, is Jesus Divine?'" On coming to the service in the afternoon and evening of the same day, both speakers took as their theme "The Deity of Christ." During the evening service reference was made to the unbelief of Thomas, who, however, when he saw the Lord, exclaimed, "My Lord and my God!"

That moment the lady made these words the expression of her faith; her burden of sin rolled away, she confessed Jesus, and realized that she was saved. Her joy was unspeakable as she exclaimed "Jesus is Divine, Jesus is Divine."

On Saturday Mr. Van de Venter held his first Children's Service at Nine Elms. About 1,000 very poor children were present, many of whom were deeply interested, and we trust won for Christ. Numbers of adults have entered the inquiry rooms at the evening meetings.

Mr. Holness reports a glorious time at Peckham Rye on Sunday. The Tent was filled and Mr. Leonard Weaver spoke. The service was most impressive, and until a late hour the workers were busily dealing with the anxious. A. G.

Dr. Grattan Guinness at Canning Town.

AN encouraging mission has just been conducted in the Public Hall, Canning Town, by Dr. Harry Grattan Guinness, under the auspices of the N.E. Metropolitan District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s and some of the local churches. Instead of closing at the end of ten days, as arranged, it was decided to go on for thirteen days. The attendance throughout probably averaged 1,000 at each meeting. At one of the meetings for men some 1,500 were packed in the hall, the police stating that as many more were turned away. Valuable help was rendered by the Harley House students in canvassing the district, nearly 100,000 invitation cards being distributed.

Open-air services were held every night at various points, together with special demonstrations in the lowest quarters. Two dinner-hour services, for working men, were also held; one in the Thames Ironworks, and the other in the Victoria Dock, alongside the new battleship, Albion, whose launch, last year, resulted in a loss of thirty-four lives. At the latter service some 600 men were present, the scene being a most remarkable one.

A large number of cases were dealt with in the inquiry rooms. On the closing night, nearly fifty young men boldly confessed Jesus Christ, for the first time, in front of 1,000 of their companions. The expense of the mission was about £100, towards which the people themselves gave £40, as a thankoffering for blessing received. Upwards of 100 young men have expressed their desire for a Y.M.C.A. to be formed; and a Sunday Afternoon Bible Class for Men was started on Sunday last, under the leadership of Mr. Andrew Mann, the hardworking and enthusiastic city missionary for the district. Mr. F. L. Porter, Y.M.C.A., Hackney, organized the Mission.

Blessing has attended meetings conducted by Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Alexander in connection with the Peckham Rye tent. Several persons professed conversion.

In connection with the mission at Milton Street Baptist Church, Chester, conducted by Mr. James Sprunt, cheering results are reported. The mission continues during the current week.

Great blessing attended Gipsy Smith's mission at Mansfield. The ministers and laity of the various Churches of the town threw themselves most heartily into the mission; the power of the Holy Ghost was manifestly present at every service. Some hundreds of persons of all ages passed through the inquiry rooms. Many others expressed their determination to lead a new and better life. Arrangements are now being made with a view to receiving these into the membership of the different Churches.

Rev. J. Jameson, Yorkshire "county evangelist," of the Congregational body, has conducted a mission at Cannon Street Church, Middlesbrough. Rev. D. Kerr writes: "Mr. Jameson worked wisely and earnestly for ten days. 'The power of the Lord was present to heal' all the time. And now we are praising God for a rare harvest of souls, such as we never reaped in all our previous Church life. Our experiences and feelings are best expressed in the grateful cry of the olden time: 'The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad.'"

Mrs. Baeyertz has just concluded a sixteen days' mission at Kinning Park Free Church, Glasgow, and the results have been such as to call for deep thankfulness. From the outset the meetings were largely attended, and as they proceeded the numbers increased, till, toward the close, the large church was insufficient to accommodate the crowds The after meetings were taken advantage of by many inquirers. These meetings, also, were conducted by Mrs. Baeyertz, as is her wont; and at the close of the mission it was ascertained that, apart from the effect of the truth proclaimed in other hearts, known only to God, some hundreds of persons had either for the first time come to decision as to their relation to Christ, or had had the haziness and uncertainty of their spiritual state removed. In addition, God's people have been stirred up and quickened in the Divine life. At Mrs. Baeyertz' farewell, numbers waited her going, and, surrounding the conveyance, sang together, "God be with you till we meet again." This Mission, coming, as it has done, immediately before the Evangelistic Campaign, is a most encouraging and hopeful augury of the blessing that God may be pleased to give to our great City.

Bacheler Russell, Oct. 14-24, St. Peter's, Cricklewood. Rev. James Stephens, Oct. 28-Nov. 10, Rawtenstall. Rev. A. G. Whaley, Oct. 28-Nov. 6, Old Radford, Nottingham.

London Tent Evangelization Committee's Arrangements.—The Great American Tent, close to Clapham Road Station, week-nights, 7.30; Sundays, 3 and 7.30 p.m. Oct. 12-14, Mr. Chas. Inglis; 15-30, Mr. Leonard Weaver. The Great Victory Tent, Troy Town, Peckham Rye, closes Sunday, Oct. 15, speaker Rev. John T. Vine. The Tent, Nine Elms, in grounds opposite St. George's Church, Battersea Park Road, services, week-nights at 8 p.m.; Sundays, 3 and 7.45 p.m.

Mr. Charles J. Butler, Evangelist, of Philadelphia, at present conducting a series of Missions to Young Men in Ireland, hopes to spend the winter in the United Kingdom; and is open to engagements for evangelistic work. Communications may be addressed care of Mr. W. A. Boyd, Gen. Sec., Y.M.C.A., 43, Upper Sackville Street, Dublin.

 Will Mr. Matherson, evangelist, of (or near) Dublin, oblige us with his address?

Requests for Prayer.

The Brothers Weaver, now at Hartlepool, desire prayer for abundant blessing upon their evangelistic work.

For blessing on the Ipswich Monthly Meetings for the Deepening of Spiritual Life, October 19, when Mrs. Penn-Lewis is the speaker.

For a mission to young men now being conducted by Mr. Charles J. Butler, of Philadelphia, in the City Y.M.C.A., 43, Upper Sackville Street, Dublin.

On behalf of a series of evangelistic services at the new Soldiers' Home, Spital Tongues, Newcastle-on-Tyne, conducted by Mr. A. Clark, October 15-31.

Praise.

For blessing on the open-air work of Stratford Mizpah Band during the last six months.

Grateful thanks are offered by a Christian worker for great blessing during recent illness.

Miss Mason's House of Rest.—The Pillar Room at the House of Rest, Finchley Road, was filled on Friday last, when the monthly meetings were resumed after the summer holidays. Miss Mason praised God for travelling and other mercies. At the instance of Colonel Oldham, who presided, prayer was offered on the Transvaal crisis. Rev. F. B. Meyer gave, in the afternoon, a characteristic address, taking St. John xiii. as a foundation.

A Missionary Convention is to be held at Mildmay Conference Hall (Room 6), November 6-10. The following societies propose to be represented:—Christian Literature Society for India, Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, Ceylon and Indian General Mission, Kurkee and Central Indian Hill Mission, Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society. The meetings will be held daily at 3.30 p.m., and on November 6 and 10 at 7 p.m. also. On the opening day Rev. J. Wilkinson is to give a Bible reading, and on the concluding evening Rev. H. B. Macartney gives the address.

Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road.—This is increasingly a centre of earnest, aggressive enterprise. The pastor, Rev. F. B. Meyer, has just sent out a circular, calling attention to the centenary of the Sunday-school work in Southwark. He says: "It was founded by Rev. Rowland Hill, at Surrey Chapel, in the year 1799, and the committee desire to signalize the centenary by rebuilding two of the oldest schools, which are in a very dilapidated condition. The network of schools and agencies is very extensive. We have nine Sunday schools, and six Sunday evening ragged schools, in which an aggregate of 5,000 children receive instruction—not only on Sunday, but also throughout the week—by means of sewing classes, libraries, &c. Donations to the rebuilding of the schools, or the maintenance of the work, can be sent to me here, or to the treasurer of the Centenary Fund, Mr. T. Atley, Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, and will be thankfully acknowledged."

About Books.

The forthcoming Life of Mary Reed, mentioned in a recent issue, will, we understand, be published by Marshall Bros.

Sunday Chimes is a new weekly, issued by Cassell & Co. The first number, dated October 7, was filled with interesting matter, fully illustrated.

A readable allegory is Sir Constant: Knight of the Great King, by W. E. Cule. (3s. 6d. Andrew Melrose). The pages describe a journey to the city of the Great King, and the experiences of the way afford many a spiritual lesson.

Messrs. Marshall Brothers have issued The Keswick Week, 1899, edited by Rev. Evan H. Hopkins. The addresses delivered at the Twenty-fifth Convention make a goodly volume, which many will read with pleasure and profit.

Rev. E. C. Dawson, the biographer of Bishop Hannington, has written a volume of "Straight Talks with Boys," entitled Comrades. (2s. 6d. Andrew Melrose). The twenty chapters include several on topics that are too generally overlooked in relation to behaviour and moral attitude.

Messrs. Cassell & Co. are issuing a cheap edition, in forty-five weekly parts (price 6d.), of their excellent Gazetteer of Great Britain and Ireland. The first part is already out; the second will appear on Oct. 18. With numerous illustrations and sixty maps, this work forms a very complete topographical dictionary of the United Kingdom.

The New Biblical Guide is an up-to-date theological library for the people, edited by Rev. John Urquhart. It is now being issued in 6d. monthly parts. Each volume will be completed in seven parts. This serial is designed to meet the questions of the day, and show how extending research, and the recent advances of science, are steadily confirming the Bible. (S. W. Partridge & Co.)

Langland's Vision of Piers the Plowman, as done into modern English by Kate M. Warren, has been issued in a second edition, revised and corrected. (3s. 6d. T. Fisher Unwin.) In this very readable form, many will doubtless be glad to make the acquaintance of the well-known fourteenth-century poem. Besides an introduction, there are explanatory notes, that will prove helpful to many.

Those who are specially interested in the evangelization of North Africa will hear with satisfaction that Mr. Budgett Meakin has brought out the first volume of the three in which he is to deal with Morocco and its people and affairs. The title of the book is The Moorish Empire: A Historical Epitome. There are 115 illustrations. We hope to give a full account of the work in an early issue. (15s. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

Bubbles, Dr. Barnardo's brightly written and gaily illustrated magazine, is now in its eleventh volume. It may be regarded, therefore, as an established favourite in English households. The October monthly part shows that it is well worthy of the position it has attained. Within the compass of its pages one finds sixteen full-page pictures, printed in half a dozen colours. The literary contents are fully up to the usual standard. (6d. Office: Aldersgate Street, E.C.)

Bishop Ryle has addressed all ages and classes in his time. His latest audience is worth all his effort, and there will be no two opinions as to the force and timeliness of his advice. We wish well to Thoughts for Young Men, from Many Points of View (Titus ii. 6). The venerable Bishop amply justifies his course in addressing special exhortations to young men, and while treating of dangers to be guarded against, he presents many good counsels and rules of conduct. 1s. and 1s. 6d. Drummond's Tract Depôt.)

The Bible student finds peculiar difficulties, as well as special features of interest, in the last book of the Pentateuch. He should therefore welcome with particular satisfaction such a work as Canon R. B. Girdlestone has recently issued through Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode, entitled The Student's Deuteronomy: A Corrected Translation, with Notes and with References in full to the Preceding and Later Books. (3s. 6d.) There is some valuable introductory matter, and the work as a whole is sure to prove of service to many.

Mr. E. Kaufmann, 5 and 6, Paternoster Square, E.C., has issued some new verse cards in intaglio, with silver lettering. (3d. each.) A pair giving morning and evening prayers in verse from the pen of Charlotte Murray, will be welcome to many. Two others, "God heareth Thee," by Miss Murray, and "Show Me now thy Way," by Mercedes Rivolta, will be precious in their suggestion to tried and sorrowing souls.

Just 50,000 of the Twelve Musical Leaflets, published by Miss Ada Rose (Mrs. W. J. Gibbs) have been sold during the past eleven months. The leaflets include: Channels Only, The Potter and the Clay, The Way of the Cross, and The Master's Touch. They have been sung by Miss Rose at gatherings all over the country, and are specially suitable as solos. (Packets of twenty-four (two of each) post free for 1s. Mrs. W. J. Gibbs, "Melrose," Bromley, Kent.)

Personalia.

Mr. A. W. Frodsham, who has recently returned from the Cape, where he has been engaged in mission and Y.M.C.A. work for the last four years, is giving lectures on South Africa. They are fully illustrated with high-class lantern views, and, in addition to giving interesting particulars of the country, life among the Boers, Africanders, and the native tribes is fully described. Mr. Frodsham's address is George Street Hotel, Croydon.

Rev. C. A. Fox recently underwent a painful surgical operation. He was prostrate from the time; but, by latest accounts, is recovering strength. A friend writes to us:—"To see how Mr. and Mrs. Fox met the ordeal was a blessed lesson of trust and entire confidence, just what he has always so strongly taught and urged. The prayers of the children of God are greatly valued by both. There is much need still of all the help of prayer which can be given."

Professor Handley Moule has joined the council of St. John's Hall, Highbury. His deep interest in young men who are preparing for ministerial life knows no abatement. It is gratifying to find him writing: "Though my beloved work at Ridley Hall has now closed, I hope to be much in contact still with younger University men. Directly or indirectly, I will gladly, as before, do what I can for any who may be introduced to me, or may themselves care to know me."

Religious Tract Society. — Rev. Richard Lovett, M.A., who has for some years been book editor of the R.T.S., has succeeded Rev. Dr. Green as editorial secretary, and thus becomes the official colleague of Dr. L. Borrett White. Mr. Lovett combines with the duties of secretaryship those of book editor. Mr. James Bowden, as lay secretary, has become general manager of the business side of the Society's operations.

The Late Miss McLean.—Miss M. McLean writes to us regarding the memoir of her lamented sister: "I am now prepared to forward copies of "God My Exceeding Joy," to friends who have waited so long for them. So far, only the paper cover edition is ready (1s. 6d. nett; 1s. 10d. post free), but the book is thicker by a hundred pages than originally expected. By Christmas I hope to have a supply of bound copies. The publishers are Messrs. Passmore & Alabaster, Paternoster Buildings. Miss McLean's address is Japanese Christian Institute, Tilbury Dock, Essex."

Obituary.

REV. JOHN DUNLOP, D.D.

MANY will hear with sorrow of the death of Rev. Dr. Dunlop, for about twenty years secretary of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews. He passed away peacefully, after a month's illness, on Monday evening, the 2nd inst., at Seabrook, where he had been spending his holiday. Before associating himself with Jewish mission work, Dr. Dunlop held pastorates of the Baptist denomination, in Scotland and England. He was educated at Glasgow University, and was the author of many small publications, besides the jubilee volume of his society, entitled "Gospel Triumphs among the Jews during the Victorian Era."

DR. A. W. DOUTHWAITE.

We regret to announce the death of Dr. A. W. Douthwaite, of the China Inland Mission, Chefoo, North China. This sad event occurred on Friday last from dysentery.

Dr. Douthwaite first went to China in 1874, and for eight years worked with conspicuous success in the Province of Cheh Kiang. First stationed in Shao-Hing, he helped to lay the foundations of what has since proved a most prosperous work. Later, he moved to Kiachaw, where again his ministry was signally blessed, for when, in 1880, failing health necessitated his removal to the more healthy climate of Wun-chaw, he was able to record that over 70 Chinese had been received into the fellowship of the church.

At Wun-chaw he engaged largely in medical work with very gratifying results. During his first year of residence there, he treated 4,075 patients. In July, 1882, he was compelled once more to change his station on account of physical weakness; and, therefore, accepted the invitation to join Mr. Pruen in Chefoo, and helped in the organization of a medical school for the instruction of Christian natives in the healing art. With that station and work he was associated until his lamented death. He came to England on furlough in 1884, and returned to Chefoo in December, 1886, having, during the interval, qualified as a medical man in America. Of his helpful healing ministry at Chefoo it would be difficult to speak too highly. His unexpected death has created a great blank in the little missionary community there.

Cowper Memorial.—April 25th next will be the centenary of poet Cowper's death. In connection therewith, it was suggested that the poet's home at Olney should be purchased by public subscription and converted into a Cowper Museum. Since then, through the generosity of Mr. W. H. Collingridge, of the City Press, any necessity for appeal to the people of Olney or to the public at large has been obviated. Mr. Collingridge, now of Enfield, was born in the poet's house at Olney, and is owner of the house and garden and of houses and premises adjoining. All these he has most magnanimously given to the town and people of Olney, on condition that Cowper's house and parlour, garden and summer-house, shall be preserved as a museum. Rental of the adjoining property will be sufficient to defray maintenance and expenses. Trustees will include the vicar and two churchwardens, and the Congregational and Baptist ministers.

Bethel Santhal Mission.—There are five stations in full working order in this Mission, and during the last ten years 721 believers have been baptized in these stations, which brings the total number of Christians in the Mission to somewhat above 1,500. At the last Conference over 1,000 Christians were present. Each station has a school and orphanage attached to it, where the boys and girls get their food, clothes, lodging, and education free of charge. They are not only taught in these schools to prepare themselves for the Government and other examinations, and fit themselves to fight the battle of life against unscrupulous money-lenders and zemindars (land owners), but they are also taught how to give medicines to the sick, as also to fight the devil and his agents, and thus prepare themselves for time and eternity. During the last ten years the medical staff have attended and given medicines to 30,000 patients in five hospitals and other dispensaries. Besides five hospitals, there are Christians in over fifty villages giving medicines to the poor free of charge. The pastor is Rev. A. J. Meik, Bethany, via Dumka, India.

Y.M.C.A. Notes.

MR. R. C. MILLS, general secretary of the Gloucester Y.M.C.A., has been appointed to a similar position at Stafford.

Mr. Will G. Sprigg, general secretary of the Cape Town Y.M.C.A., is now in this country, soliciting the help of friends interested in South Africa towards a fund for the enlargement of the Cape Town Association building.

Rev. Dr. Stalker has kindly promised to deliver a course of Biblical lectures at the Conference of Y.M.C.A. General Secretaries next year.

The City of Dublin Association opened its winter session this month with a special mission to young men, conducted by Mr. Charles J. Butler, evangelist, of Philadelphia, U.S.A. The power of the Holy Spirit has been manifest, not a few being led to a saving knowledge of the truth.

The prospectuses of a large number of the principal associations in the country give evidence of unusually complete arrangements for the work of the forthcoming winter. Successful meetings, to inaugurate the work of the new session, have been addressed by Mr. W. Hind Smith at Nottingham and Leicester; and an encouraging meeting of young men was also held at Bedford.

The proposed student building in Bombay, for which Mr. Anderson has been asking the help of English friends and associations, involves an outlay, including furnishing and five years' maintenance, of over £8,000. There is a trust fund in Bombay, known as the Bowen Memorial, amounting to £900, which has been voted towards the scheme, and the receipts and promises at home amount to about £3,200, so that, approximately, £4,000 is still required.

Mr. Frank Anderson, M.A., hopes to sail from Trieste, on December 3, for India, in time to be present at the Fifth National Convention of Indian Y.M.C.A.'s, which will take place in Bombay, December 28-31. Mr. Anderson will probably sail in company with Mr. Robert P. Wilder and Dr. J. Rutter Williamson, the former of whom is returning to an enlarged sphere in the Association work of India; while the latter—well known as a student worker in this country—will concentrate upon Poona. Both are under the auspices of the American Executive.

The Soldiers' Christian Association is doing its utmost to provide for the spiritual and social needs of the men moving to South Africa. Sir George White, the Commander-in-Chief, heartily endorses the work, and will doubtless give every facility for its operations. Speaking of the work in India, he recently said, "I must tell you how glad I have been to find, throughout the commands, that those on whom commanding officers can place most reliance are the men who meet in the prayer-rooms, and who are banded together in the Association of which the prayer-rooms are the recognized centres." The headquarters of the Association are at Exeter Hall, Strand, W.C.

Mr. W. M. Oatts, for many years general secretary of the Glasgow United Y.M.C.A., has accepted the call of the English National Council to undertake, as from December next, a special mission to the Y.M.C.A.'s of the British colonies. These associations have recently been more closely drawn to those of the mother country by the formation of a British and Colonial Federation; and the purpose of Mr. Oatts's visit will be to strengthen the work at centres where it is weak, to form associations in important towns where special effort for young men is urgently called for, and to promote, where possible, the appointment of travelling secretaries. He will be accompanied on the tour by Mrs. Oatts. Both have done invaluable work, not in Glasgow only, but throughout the greater part of Scotland, where they are held in the highest esteem.

JUBILEE AT BIRMINGHAM.

Last week the annual meeting of the Birmingham Y.M.C.A, was held in the Town Hall, at which Rev. F. B. Meyer, Mr. Hind-Smith, and others gave addresses.

Advantage was taken of the occasion to bring forward the important scheme for new Association premises, those which have been occupied for twenty-four years being hopelessly inadequate to the growth of the work. During that period Birmingham has doubled its population, and it is estimated that the city and vicinity now includes over 70,000 young men between eighteen and thirty years of age.

It is now fifty years since the Birmingham branch was founded, and it employs forty different agencies (spiritual, social, intellectual and physical) for the well-being of young men. A splendid central freehold site is now obtainable, and it is proposed to erect a building of proportionate capacity to the need felt, containing large and small halls for meetings, and the usual features of Y.M.C.A. premises, together with nearly fifty bedrooms for members lodging in the town.

Nearly £45,000 will be required, of which about one third is already assured. Further particulars may be had from the energetic secretary, Mr. Henry Whitwell, Y.M.C.A., Needless Alley, Birmingham.

The Churches.

* The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

A new mission hall has been opened in the parish of St. Benedict, Everton, of which Rev. H. M. Braithwaite is Vicar.

Bishop Royston, the Assistant Bishop of Liverpool, is to take all the confirmation services in the diocese up to the end of the year, in the absence of Bishop Ryle.

Labour and lodging homes established by the Church Army have been opened in Leeds. The Bishop of Richmond presided at the opening ceremony, and addresses were delivered by Mr. Arnold Forster, the Dean of Ripon, and others.

Rev. Dr. Wright, of the Protestant Reformation Society, has given a series of important lectures in Exeter on "Church Principles." The course was preceded by sermons at St. Thomas's in the morning, and St. Leonard's in the evening. The lectures were initiated and organized by a committee o lay Churchmen.

Rev. Professor Moule recommenced his evening sermons in Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge, on Sunday last, October 8, and will continue throughout the term. In a recent letter, Dr. Moule said—"Though my beloved work at Ridley Hall has now closed, I hope to be much in contact still with younger university men. Directly or indirectly, I will gladly, as before, do what I can for any who may be introduced to me or may themselves care to know me."

Congregational.

The Congregational Union of Ireland has appointed Rev. W. Newman Hall, of Dublin, as its representative to the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

Rev. R. Mackay, formerly of Kingston, Ontario, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of the Golborne Road Church, North Kensington, and will enter upon his labours on the second Sunday in November.

Mr. Rutherford, secretary of the Congregational Twentieth Century Fund, observes that the enterprise is meeting with a marked response on all hands, and he expects that the proposed sum of £500,000 will be more than realized. One church near London of less than a hundred members has already promised £800, the whole of which is to be devoted to the Central Fund. The churches in Birmingham have promised to raise £20,000.

The meetings of the second International Congregational Council, at Boston, have been impressive and stimulating. At the gatherings open to the public, the Tremont Temple has been full to overflowing. The Council was lifted to a high pitch of enthusiasm by the address of Dr. Forsyth, of Cambridge. When he had finished speaking on "The seat of authority in religion," no further business could be transacted; the audience rose spontaneously and sang a hymn. It was a scene of great enthusiasm.

Addressing the district meeting of ministers and delegates of the Lancashire Congregational Union at Manchester, Rev. S. Pearson spoke on the question, "Are our Churches ready for a revival of religion?" The chief difficulty, he said, is that we find it hard to persuade ourselves that religion is our chief concern; hence there is not sufficient earnestness, or what Christ called "violence," to carry forward the kingdom to victory. In our own churches we do not have enough emotionalism; we are too well satisfied if all our services are properly conducted, if everything is prim and proper, and if no great mistakes are made in our views of truth.

Baptist.

Rev. Leo. Humby, late of Shefford (Beds.), has accepted the pastorate of the Church at Melton Mowbray, and commences his ministry on October 15.

Rev. E. Palgrave Davy, who has accepted the position of organising secretary for the "Regions Beyond Missionary Union," has closed his ministry at Swansea. Mr. Davy was formerly a missionary in India.

At the recent district meeting of the London Baptist Association at Shepherd's Bush Road, Mr. W. Olney of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, delivered an address on "A True Revival: What it is, and how to Promote it."

The friends of Northcote Road Church, Wandsworth Common, are putting forth exertions to extinguish the debt on their place of worship. An exhibition and sale of work held last week yielded nearly £500 towards this object.

The new church in Great Clowes Street, Brighton, has been opened for public worship. The church has been erected, along with lecture-room and vestries, close to the existing schoolroom, the cost of the work having been over £3,000. In the evening Rev. Dr. McLaren preached to a crowded congregation.

Recognition services at Bognor, in connection with the settlement of the Pastor, Rev. C. Pittman, late of South Africa, were held on 3rd inst., in the Assembly Rooms. Rev. Charles Spurgeon, of Greenwich, preached to large congregations in the afternoon and evening. At a public meeting, subsequently held, Mr. W. Willett, of Brighton, presided. Addresses were delivered by a number of ministers. An effort is being made to purchase a convenient site on which to build a chapel.

On Thursday last, the opening services of the Baptist cause in Epsom were held in the Gymnasium. Rev. G. Hay Morgan preached in the afternoon, and Mr. Arthur H. Stockwell took the chair at the evening meeting. Mr. Stockwell stated that two friends had offered £50 each within twelve months, provided another £250 could be raised by that time, towards the church they were hoping soon to build. Revs. John Wilson (of Woolwich), J. O. Stalberg (of Kingston), and W. J. Potter (of Cheam), also delivered addresses.

The report of Dunoon College, N.B., which has just been published, is of an encouraging character. The mode of entrance into the college is not by scholastic examination, but by examination as to ability, consecration to the Lord's service, and real spirituality. It is expected that every student will contribute to his board, which costs about 12s. a week. Those who cannot give this sum are met as the case demands. The report adds, however, "We do not allow the right men to be kept from us by their lack of money."

The Baptists who for the past two and a half years have been worshipping in the Assembly Hall, St. Andrew Street, Hertford, have opened a new building, which is intended to serve the combined purpose of a Sunday school and chapel until the members of the church feel justified in commencing Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

OUR next issue will contain as a supplement a copy of The Christian Sheet Almanac, displaying an engraving, entitled "A Carpenter's Shop at Damascus," and giving a Scripture portion for every day in the year, with the usual postal information. The price of the issue will be Twopence.

Will our American readers and friends kindly see that any communications they may send us are sufficiently stamped? We have frequently had to pay from ten to sixteen cents on an understamped communication.

We are sure our kind correspondents will sympathize and co-operate with us under the following circumstances. We have from week to week twenty, thirty, or more columns of matter standing in type, for which we have no space. We are obliged to abbreviate many communications; but it often happens that the part omitted, which may have seemed to us the least important, is not so regarded by the writer. But the insertion of a lengthy article or report may necessitate the omission of several shorter ones. This is a day of haste, because so many things have to be attended to. Consequently, a short article or paragraph or letter will be read, while longer ones are remitted to a more convenient season, which never comes.

For these and other reasons, we urgently request our correspondents to be so kind and considerate as to write as concisely as possible. It will conduce to brevity if they remember that our paper extends to the ends of the earth, and that local and temporary matters, though of great interest to the writers, are not of the same interest to the great proportion of our widely scattered readers.

After long and painful uncertainty, during which the issue of war or peace was hanging in the balance, President Kruger's ultimatum has forced on a struggle whose end no man can foresee. As the last British despatch was couched in the most conciliatory terms, the final responsibility must rest with the Transvaal Government. However the blame may be divided, the fact remains that within a couple of months of the close of the Peace Conference, we, one of the most conspicuous nations in those deliberations, are engaged in a deadly struggle with a nation that is near akin in blood and religion and interests.

Since war has now been declared, the present duty of all true patriots and Christians is to urge a swift issue to the struggle, and use their influence in keeping down the passions of war to the lowest possible point. Civilized warfare is savagely cruel at the best; and, if report is to be trusted, the Boers threaten severe handling to such Englishmen as shall fall into their hands. A short struggle and a magnanimous ending—for this our earnest prayers should rise to Him who is still Lord of hosts.

Hubert Hervey, youngest son of Lord Alfred Hervey, was a student and an imperialist; who, after some singular experiences, found himself in South Africa, aiding in extending the British Empire. In the second Matabele war he received a fatal wound, and, as he lay dying, he said to a friend: "Well, it is a grand thing to die for the expansion of the empire." One of his favourite sayings was this:

> Only believe in your idea, and it will carry you through every difficulty. If you live, you will do great things; if you die—well! how can you die better? And your idea will not die.

There is a greater Kingdom than that of Britain—that of Heaven—to live and die for, which is the greatest honour which any man can attain. Proud as Britain may be of her sons who will even die for her, yet is there a nobler fame for those who, for the Saviour's sake, will lay down their lives to save men of other lands from the thrall of sin.

Three hundred years ago, three sincere and noble Christian men were martyred for affirming their belief in the New Testament conception of a Christian Church, as against the Roman and Anglican view. They formulated that belief in these words:

> The Church of Christ is composed of every company, congregation, or assembly of men ordinarily joined together in the worship of God, and this title is improperly attributed to any other convocations, synods, societies, combinations, or assemblies whatever.

For this faith they suffered; but their principle remained, and grew, and conquered. Theoretically the Church of England still affirms that the Church is the nation in its religious aspect. Practically, the New Testament ideal is winning its way into the very heart of even the National Church. What else is meant by the Bishop of London's remark at the Albert Hall—a remark which called forth ringing cheers—when he asked, "What, then, is the Church?" and answered, "All the people who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and try to please Him."

If this remark is to be considered in any more serious light than as a rhetorical outburst, it amounts to little less than a radical revolution in the ideas of the leaders of the Church of England. For it affirms the principle of separation from the world, which was the very essence of the message of Barrow, Greenwood, and Penry, to the men of their generation, and which has created the Nonconformist "sects" of Great Britain and of the world. We heartily endorse the dictum of the Bishop of London; but we doubt whether he, or those churchmen who applauded it, realized how far it reaches. (1 Peter ii. 8-10.)

Not less than three times was the great theme of a revival of religion treated of in a public way last week. Rev. Samuel Pearson, chairman of the Manchester District of the Lancashire Congregational Union, took for the subject of his address, "Are our Churches ready for a revival of religion?" No answer, he said, could be given to the question, because no one knows the heart and the true desire of the churches. At the Church Congress, Sir Edward Clarke remarked that we had heard more than enough of the Catholic revival—a statement which was greeted with storms of "Noes"—and inquired whether it was not time we had a Christian Revival, an inquiry which was greeted with loud applause, showing that he had struck a sympathetic chord. The British Weekly devoted its leading article to "The Next Revival of Religion," and gave its characteristics as (1) a revival that will make Christ and Him crucified to shine before the souls of men; (2) that will concern itself much more than some others with the perfecting of the saints; (3) that will be an ethical revival, in which the claims of the intellect will be recognised, the claims of duty acknowledged, and the claims of justice yielded to. Do not these utterances, spoken without pre-arrangement, mean that Revival is in the hearts of Christian men?

A memorial to a great and successful trader, a good citizen, and an exemplary Christian, has been opened at Manchester by Mrs. Rylands. The memorial is to her late husband, although she herself has devoted herself to its completion with painstaking energy. John Rylands, from very humble beginnings, rose to the position of a Manchester millionaire. The library opened last week will perpetuate his memory amongst his fellow-citizens, who still hold him in the highest esteem. The building is a fitting home for literature, science, and theology, and would adorn Oxford or Cambridge, or any European centre of learning. Dr. Maclaren expressed, in suitable phrase, the sentiments that thrill many hearts in the accomplishment of this happy memorial: "They must all feel that this magnificent structure became still more rare and precious when they thought of it as the outgrowth of a woman's heart, the memorial of a life-long treasure and a life-long sorrow." We are delighted to learn that he took more interest in the Bible than in business, though he was the most successful merchant in Manchester.

That Mrs. Humphry Ward, and others of her school of thought, should object to the declaration and acceptance of clear definitions of religious belief is, perhaps, not to be wondered at; but it is surprising to find Rev. Dr. Horton associating himself with their propaganda, and reported in the Press as having given his opinion that modern rationalism is less dangerous than dogma. To travel with the age is one thing, to be led by it is quite another, and all attempts to soften and explain away the declarations of the Gospel, so as to make them inoffensive to the delicate susceptibilities of modern intellectual pride, can have but one end. The history of the Churches proves unmistakably that the disintegrating power has invariably come from within, and that a vaporous creed has always resulted in weak and invertebrate spiritual life.

A recent Note and Comment on the limits of Nature's revelation of the character of God, and the need of a higher testimony concerning his attributes, receives confirmation from an unexpected source. Edison, the great scientist who some years ago confessed himself a pure agnostic, stated in a recent interview that his scientific researches have profoundly convinced him of the existence of a Supreme Intelligence behind the order of nature; but beyond this witness to the existence of an over-ruling Mind, nature appears to have no further word to speak about the Divine Being. This is growingly the attitude of scientific thinkers, which is a distinct step in advance from the bald agnosticism of Huxley and Tyndall. For any further knowledge of God, however, we have to go to Jesus Christ. "No man knoweth the Son save the Father, neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him" (Matt. xi. 27).

The revision of historical judgments is one of the most marked results of modern research. Many popular heroes have been stripped of their reputations, and not a few characters banned by historians have been triumphantly rehabilitated. An interesting instance of the latter process is just published in Mr. Glass's account of the first Parliament of the Commonwealth, nick-named by its traducers "The Barebones Parliament," from the supposed name of its leader (whose real name, however, was Praise Barbon). The book is a triumphant vindication of Cromwell's first national assembly, as regards the character both of its members and of its measures. It shows that we owe to-day the first suggestion of many social and political as well as religious reforms to this greatly traduced and ridiculed body of men, and if they failed to translate many of their ideas into practical form, and came to an ignominious end as a Parliament, they gave a first suggestion to many measures that are now on the statute-book, and to some others which have still to be made law. They were simply "before their times," and their temporary failure was an honourable one.

We saw recently in a magazine—read, we believe, almost entirely by ministers—an excellent article on "The Decline of the Pew;" and while we followed its observations, the question would keep recurring—"But how is 'the Pew' to be made aware of its shortcomings?" "The Pew" does not put itself in the way of seeing its sins as they are—at least not that portion of "the Pew" which is the sinning portion. How can you reach an absentee "hearer?" You may reason, admonish, persuade, exhort, but he hears nothing of what you say. This is the puzzle all round. How are worldly pew-holders, possibly Church members, to be reached and aroused? If they would come to the prayer-meeting, a change for the better might take place in their whole life; but the prayer-meeting is the very place they avoid. How are non-church-goers to be reached? They might be converted if they heard the Word; but they don't want to hear the Word. What is there for the difficulties named but prayer?

We may particularize some of the signs of decline in the pew, rather with the hope of preventing some readers of this journal from declining than of restoring any who have declined. There is less faith, and with that a growth of the critical spirit, in the sanctuary; there is a failure of co-operation on the part of church members, the Lord's Day is secularized, and some of the most questionable literature is eagerly devoured by persons who ought to put it far from their homes. And another serious sign of decay in godliness is the neglect of family worship. The principal of a college, who sees many homes, remarks upon this feature of them, and so does a minister who has similar opportunities of observing. The spirit of religion wants help in every form and at every available opportunity; and God should be honoured everywhere.

It is a very sad feature of the illustrated comic papers that so many of their points and illustrations are found in the ludicrous aspects of drunkenness, which provide too ready a material for caricature. These cheap, thin, and threadbare jokes cannot but have some influence on the minds of young and impressible minds. They tend to take away from the vile habit of drinking one of its worst horrors—the fact that it reduces them to a condition in which their reason only appears in the form of an inverted humour and a jumble of topsy-turvy ideas. When the laugh has been taken out of drunkenness, it will lose its last fascination. One way will be for serious-minded people resolutely to refuse to be amused by any so-called joke made at the expense, or assigned to the credit, of a drunken man.

It is said that the number of educated women who are earning their own living in London, but not in the way of trade, is nearly half a million. Of these a large proportion are not living at home, and therefore require lodgings. Their salaries range from 14s. a week, offered by the Local Government Board, with an annual rise of 1s. 6d., and 15s. and 16s., paid by the War Office and Whitehall, to 25s., and, in rare cases, 35s. The War Office prefers the daughters of colonels as typists. Problem: How are these genteel women—these ladies—to live on such wages in London? They are worse paid than charwomen. By the side of this sad social fact we may place another, viz.: 2,293 accidents, some of them fatal, which automatic couplings would have prevented, have occurred in a year. In our social economy there is endless scope for the reformer.

A lady, who is a manager of a London School Board school, makes a suggestion which appears to us to be full of promise of good. It is that there should be a crèche connected with each school, where mothers could leave their babies during the day, or during a portion of it, to be nursed by some of the girls. It is pointed out that girls learn almost everything save those acquirements which every wife and mother absolutely needs, if she is to make her home a delight and train a family well. Too often children in poor homes are most foolishly fed, clothed, and attended to; and the school might do much to alter this state of things. It is quite certain that a crèche would be a popular branch of education, and would do good to every mother who brought her child to it, as well as to the child, and to the girls taught in it. Each girl would also carry to her own home the useful lessons she had learnt. Our feeble children, our untrained children, our incorrigible children, are often the inevitable results of parental ignorance and incapacity.

There is a very wide gulf fixed between that serene faith which, in a recent reference to the Marquis of Lorne's address at the Health Congress, we urged to be a religious duty in the face of the contingencies and infections of life; and the objectionable teachings of the school of so-called Christian Scientists, with their deceptions and delusions, and claims to Divine revelation. That there have been cases of, apparently, mental healing, perhaps cannot be denied; but even in the present state of our knowledge, the part played in such cases by mesmerism and hypnotism can be recognized in some cases as the causative influence behind the thought-power of the "mind-cure."

The history of the development of the movement in the United States has recently been defined in a thoughtful American monthly review, The Arena, as that of "the rise of one of the most amazing religious delusions of which history has record," a delusion which, by the way, now has a "Mother Church" in Boston, with a roll of 12,000 members from all over the States. However the teachings of the leaders of the movement may be disguised in metaphysical mists, there can be no doubt whatever as to the source and tendency of a philosophy based to a great extent upon the dogma that "there is no evil, there is no matter, there is no sin, no sickness, no death."

It would be very interesting to have Cardinal Vaughan's commentary upon the peculiar ethics of some of the contents of a "new edition, revised," of a brochure for "children and young persons," issued with the imprimatur of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, under the title of "What every Christian must know and do." In a publication from such a source, we expect to find the usual warnings against going to sermons or prayers in Protestant churches, and reading Protestant books or tracts, and a statement that "penance is a sacrament which forgives the sins we commit after baptism;" but it is surprising to find, in this summary of Christian knowledge and duty, sin toned down and explained away, as in the following extracts:—

It is a mortal sin to get drunk so as to lose your senses.

It is a mortal sin to strike your parents, or in their presence to put out your tongue at them. . . . or in their hearing to curse them. . . . These things are a less sin if they do not see or hear you.

Then the young Romanist is assured that after the confession, "especially of the great sins," has been made, "then if the priest sees that you are fit, he will give you the pardon of your sins." Strange to say, however, there is a further direction, to "those who have only venial sins to confess," to "confess over again some great sin of their past life."

Old-fashioned hospitality, it is often said, is fast dying out of modern town life. This is partly inevitable; and there are many causes to explain it. There is, however, one direction in which Christian people should strive to keep it alive. It is a perpetual trouble to young people who have "come up to town" that they have no homes to go to after business hours, nor anyone on whom they may occasionally call, as an escape from the temptations of the streets and the amusements of the theatre and the music hall. Those who, knowing of such young folk, extend a hearty welcome to them, are in the way of doing immeasurable good. Without any appreciable sacrifice, an "At Home" may be held for their benefit occasionally, which would call forth their close friendship, and make them gladly sensitive to the best influences. If this were oftener done in our churches, there would be fewer young men drifting out of their reach and lost in the world.

Few reports could be more pathetic reading than that recently published, by certain Boards of Guardians, as to deaths among the poor of London from starvation. The returns embrace a whole year, and give the number of these sorry deaths at forty-eight. Most of those who have succumbed to the cravings of hunger have been aged people, the larger proportion of whom were women. In some cases no particulars can be given of them. They are entered as "unknown," or "no known occupation or address," or "found dying in a cellar!" We are sincerely troubled about these cases of poverty-smitten castaways. If such things had happened in some heathen country, we should regard them as inevitable, belonging to a false system. But here, in Christian England, women and men dying of hunger, at the rate of nearly one every week, is a shame to our Christianity. What remedy can be found for this inhuman neglect of those who are made in the image of God?

Church Congress Notes.

THE candid and cordial recognition by the Church Congress of the work and progress in England of the Free Churches is a new and ratifying feature in the discussion of Church questions. There are, no doubt, many members of the Established Church who really appreciate the spiritual power of the Nonconformist Churches. Dr. Wace said:—

Why might Churchmen not hope that the union now established among the Free Churches would ultimately prove a step toward further union, in which the Church of England would hold the place that was her due, and in which, while co-operating with those Dissenting communities, she would still hold to her own principles and her own order?

Dr. Wace said that in 1700 the Dissenters of this country were one in twenty of the population, and are now one in three, and that throughout the world the Free Churches number 17,000,000 of communicants. It is not a question of one church gaining from another, but of all churches gaining from the world. Nominally all Englishmen are members of the Church of England; but actually the immense majority belong to no church, and have never been born again. Here is the work to be done; here is the material out of which churches are to be formed. The Established Church and the Free Churches have an equal opportunity, and it is in this sphere that they should provoke one another to love and good works.

Disorder in public religious gatherings is to be deplored, but there are times when it is useful as a symptom of public opinion. From this point of view the proceedings during the discussions on ritual, and on the relation of Anglicanism towards Nonconformity, were full of significance. The coldness with which every reference to Protestantism was received; the thunders of applause which greeted Lord Halifax as the exponent of "Catholicism" in the Church; the disgraceful interruptions to which Mr. Webb-Peploe's fearless and weighty speech, calling for loyal obedience to the Prayer Book, was subjected—all these involuntary outbursts of feeling on the part of the audience were a very clear indication of the extent to which Romanism has captured the Congress.

Nothing but sympathy will be felt for the aged Archbishop of Canterbury in his present weak state of health, and there will be sincere desires and prayers for his recovery. His sermon before the Church Congress, delivered in spite of many discouragements, was worthy of his unfailing courage and good sense. He ought to have been in bed or in his house; but he was in the pulpit, where he spoke wisely and opportunely when he said:

Christ died to save men's souls, and the Church's duty was to preach the Gospel at home and abroad; and it was the saddest spectacle before men and angels to see the Church rent asunder by disputes when she had so much work to do. The great need of the Church at this moment was peace within her own borders, the first step to reunion.

One only regrets that Dr. Temple, when he was Bishop of London, should have given so much encouragement to that ritualism which is so disturbing the peace of the Church, and giving all in authority so much trouble.

The Church Review has made itself notorious by an article, addressed to Churchmen attending the Congress, drawing up a list of theatrical performances worthy of a visit during their stay in town. The idea of a recognized Church paper descending to such an act is enough, even in such an age as this, to make simple-hearted Christian people stand aghast, especially when we note that several of the music halls figure on the list. The principle of selection is a hidden secret, and the drawing of the line between such places of amusement as are legitimate, and such as are not, is altogether haphazard and fallacious. We are glad to see that one or two of the secular papers pour a fine scorn on the whole thing. One can imagine the amusement it must have called forth in theatrical circles. True friends of the Church can only feel shame and indignation at it.

Resurrection and Priesthood:

The Priest and the Bible.

(Concluded.)

By Mr. HENRY VARLEY.

THE subtlety and danger of this form of spiritual error lie mainly at this point, viz., its power, in an attractive and fascinating guise, to caricature the truth. It leads away from God, and puts confidence in man. How imperatively is needed the word, "Cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord!" The "god of this world" is a great ecclesiastical religionist, and an adept in fashioning himself so as to yield the garb and appearance of an angel of light. He is "the father of lies," and the springhead of deceit. He knows that, as of old, his success was the consequence of his subtle deception; so it must always be.

Satan works "with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved." Lest undue severity should appear to attach to these words, let it be borne in mind that when that degraded King Ahab, with his fascinating and corrupt consort, Jezebel, sought to demoralize Israel, and lead the nation from the worship of Jehovah to the idolatry of Baal and the queen of heaven, it was eight hundred and fifty false priests who were chosen by the devil as his executive to compass Israel's overthrow. Nor let it be forgotten that Elijah, the prophet of Jehovah, represented the truth of the living God, as against those eight hundred and fifty priests of Baal. Account for it as you may, directly the position of the priest is either recognised or taken,

THE MAN REPRESENTS FALSEHOOD.

But we take a more recent example. I have recently read that remarkable volume, "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement." I do not ever remember receiving a greater shock to the moral sense than that occasioned by certain of the leaders of the Tractarian and High Church Party referred to. The extracts—taken from their own letters, which prove that, whilst professedly connected with the Church of England, and retaining her ecclesiastical positions, as also her social and monetary advantages, they were in heart Romanists, and were constantly working behind the scenes for the interests of the Roman Catholic Church—are simply appalling. Truth, conscience, and moral rectitude were sacrificed to such an extent that it is difficult to retain the slightest respect for the men referred to.

I regret to write that any confidence once held in three or four of these men, who entered the Church of Rome and became prominent dignitaries therein, has been utterly destroyed by the timely, but terrible revelations of "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement." The remarkable writings of these men have henceforth lost their charm, force, and quality. They remind me of the solemn words written by the Holy Ghost concerning King Saul: "Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs like a sharp razor, working deceitfully." Even if he be a true man, compromises him in every direction. His relation to public services, such as preaching, teaching, the Lord's Table, and baptism, is false. He cannot live out Christ's command: "He that will be greatest among you, let him be your servant; and he that will be chiefest among you, let him be your minister." His dress, his titles, his mimic altar, his railed-off position in the building called the church, all mislead. They belong to the priestly idea—to the priestly system which the New Testament knows not, and Christ's resurrection says does not and cannot exist.

A PRIEST'S POSITION

How different is the joyous testimony of the believer: "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;" and again, "Wherein He hath made us accepted in the Beloved"; and "that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love!" Oh, the contrast presented by the position and testimony of the Lord's beloved servant, Paul: "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; it is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth." Or of Peter, the servant and apostle (not the priest), "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Or of the beloved John: "To as many as received Him, to them gave He power (right) to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name, which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."

What a contrast between the utter poverty of the whole priestly and sacramentarian system and "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God," the Divine "liberty wherewith Christ makes free"! To hear these men affirm that Christ Jesus, who describes Himself as "the light of the world," and again, "the light that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world," has made them the privileged and only love, and light—priests, observe, in the line of the Apostolic succession! If that were so, or could be proved, then Christ has not died, neither has He risen from the dead. Christ's resurrection utterly denies the theory of priestly Apostolic succession. The Apostles were not priests. A succession of priests from the Apostolic times, therefore, was utterly impossible. Priestly succession may suit the foolish pretensions of the Roman Catholics, or the English Church Union; but the futility of this sacerdotal system is clearly seen directly the New Testament is consulted, and the doctrine of Christ's resurrection intelligently understood.

Imagine "the light of the world" committed to a company of priests. These men the custodians of light! In order to the diffusion of light, they must be sought unto! There is no light or salvation save in and through their priestly persons, fingers and sacraments! In the name of the risen Christ we protest against this. Know ye not that the Sun of Righteousness is risen, and that He is mounting higher and yet higher in the ever-widening sphere of his divine glory? How should these men attempt to hide his light inside their dim and dark ritualistic pretensions and buildings? The ignorance which pertains to these modern priests, their mimic altars, lighted candles, and powdered incense! It was well said by the Archbishop of Canterbury this latter might be used for sanitary purposes, for fumigating the building; but in no sense was incense to be identified with worship.

The fact is before us that the entire system of priestly position, function, or office is utterly unscriptural, and in direct opposition to the great truth of Christ's resurrection from the dead. Nor let it be forgotten, it had no existence in the first and second centuries of the Christian Era.

The Lord's Prayer.

By Rev. J. R. MILLER, D.D.

IV.—Thy Will be Done.

MANY people always say "Thy will be done" with quivering lips, as if it meant something hard—a sore loss, a bitter disappointment, the giving up of something precious. They do not say the words songfully, but tearfully. There are times when God's will does indeed cut into our heart, when it is not easy to submit to it. But it is not always thus. It is the will of our Father, and He is loving and good, and it cannot be that it is always painful to obey Him. We know well by experience that the sorrowful and bitter things of life are few in comparison with the glad and joyful things.

This is a prayer that men may learn to obey God's commandments, to do what He would have them do. It covers all the life of every day—in the shop and store and school, in the home and the social life, in drudgery and care, in temptation and in sorrow. It is not a prayer that we be taken up to heaven to do God's will perfectly there, but that in our common life in this world we may learn to live as they do in heaven.

The words "on earth" suggest also that all men are to be included in our request. Again, we are reminded that we are not to narrow our prayers to ourselves. Even in our most urgent personal need we are to think of

ALL OUR FATHER'S FAMILY.

We should be concerned for the saving of all men, and should seek the hallowing of God's name in every life.

Yet in praying that the will of God may be done "on earth," by everyone, we must not fail to include our own heart and life. That is the portion of the earth for which we are specially and personally responsible. It is possible that a man may give much thought and care to other lives, and neglect his own. We need to guard against this danger. Each man's life is his own in a peculiar sense. In the matter of the will no one can act for any other. The mother cannot surrender her child's will. She may bring influences to bear upon it—reasons, motives, persuasions; but, meanwhile, the child holds in its own hand the sceptre of its life, and alone can yield up the will in which are folded the destinies of the life.

It is right we should pray that God's will may be done in others, that all men may be inclined to yield their will to God's; also, that we should do all we can to lead those about us to make this surrender. But is for the bringing of our own will into subjection to God. This no other one can do for us. In the citadel of our life each one of us is sovereign. Even God, with his omnipotence, will never compel us to love and obey Him. We alone can make the surrender, and it must be voluntary.

> Our wills are ours, we know not how;
> Our wills are ours to make them thine.

We should notice here, also, that until we have made a surrender of our will to God we cannot acceptably serve Him. It is not enough to devote one-seventh of our time and one-tenth of our income to the Lord. It is not enough to engage in the service of Christ and to give our life to ministries of love in behalf of the poor and the troubled. It is possible to do all this and yet have in us an unsurrendered will. It is not our work, our money, our ministrations, that God wants, but our heart. When the will is truly surrendered, all else will follow; but until this consecration has been made nothing else will count. While, therefore, we pray earnestly that God's will may be done in others, it should be our first concern to make our own will God's. Until we have done this, we are not truly in the kingdom of God, which is, first of all, a kingdom of surrendered wills.

To our human nature the Divine will seems a severe and rigorous rule of life. It demands holiness and righteousness. It checks self-dulgence, putting a rein upon the appetites and passions, and bringing all wayward impulses and tendencies into subjection to Christ. "Take my yoke upon you" is our Lord's first demand of those who would follow Him. Our own way must be given up for our Master's way. Whatever duty is presented must be accepted

PROMPTLY, CHEERFULLY, UNQUESTIONINGLY.

Whatever is not in accord with the Divine will must be put away without reluctance, without reserve.

The natural heart resents such intrusion upon its sovereignty, claiming a right to its own way. It regards as unreasonable, in its demands and restraints, the life of holiness and obedience to which it is called. Men imagine that a life of self-will, self-indulgence, earthly pleasure, will bring more happiness than a life surrendered to God. But really the will of God calls us to the happiest and most beautiful life possible in this world. It is not unreasonable in its demands, for we were made to be God's children, and the true life of a child is love and obedience to the father. The indulgences which the Divine Will calls us to give up, though for the present they give a kind of pleasure, in the end bring sorrow and bitterness. The duties to which it invites us, though now they demand self-denial, in the end yield the sweetest joy and the truest good.

The doing of the will of God leads to blessedness. The life of Jesus from beginning to end was in accord with this will. He did always the things that pleased his Father. His obedience was costly; how costly we never can understand, for no human heart can ever comprehend the mystery of the Redeemer's sorrows. Yet never in any other heart was there such joy as He experienced, and was infinite and eternal blessedness. Just in the measure in which we follow Christ in doing the will of God shall we share his joy and his blessedness. Disobedience always works hurt and marring; but he who does the will of God is gathering into his life "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honourable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely."

God has a thought for every life He sends into this world. In every case it is something beautiful, for every thought of God is beautiful. If only we could be just the being God had in his vision when He made us, how radiant, how lovely, how glorious we would be! If we do God's will faithfully, patiently, continuously, all our life, we shall work out in ourselves the divine thought for us and realize his purpose for us.

Not all doing of God's will is active; sometimes it is passive. We are called to give up our own way; to do without things we longed to have; to yield up to God the treasures of our love. Still, it is always the right way in which this holy will leads us, the way, too, to blessedness. Some day we shall know that many of the best things in our life are the fruits of pain. One of the most wonderful words in the Bible tells us that Jesus was made perfect through suffering. Even in his sinless human nature there were qualities whose beauty could be brought out in perfection only in pain. How much more true it is of our sinful natures that only in furnace fires can they be perfected!

We may be sure, therefore, that whenever the will of God leads us into any way of suffering, it is because it is the way of blessing. We need never be afraid to accept God's will, however it may and take from us our dearest joys. We may follow our Master confidently, and He will bring us out into the light and the glory.

The standard set in this petition for the doing of God's will on earth is remarkable—"as it is done in heaven." We know that there is no disobedience, even in thought or feeling, in heaven. The will of God is done perfectly. It is also done cheerfully, without repining, though it be hard. It is done unquestioningly, without any doubt of its goodness and its wisdom. It is done without regard to the quality of the service, as gladly when it is the lowliest task that is assigned as when it is the highest. Our prayer teaches us that the obedience of heaven is the divine ideal for the earthly doing of God's will.

Far above us seems this rule of life. We say we never can reach it. The song is too sweet for us ever to sing with our discordant voice. The life is too holy for us, with our sin-hurt nature, ever to live. Yet we should never think of it as a visionary or an impracticable rule of life. Some day we shall attain it, and we should never cease to strive toward it. God would never ask anything impossible or unreasonable of his children. He would not set for us a rule of life which we cannot follow.

WHEN HE GIVES A DUTY,

He is ready also to give the grace needed for the doing of it. The Holy Spirit dwells in the heart of every believer, and He will help us to do the will of God.

"Thy will be done" is a prayer to our Father. To offer this petition continually without having made a surrender of our will is to pray insincerely. As fast as the Divine will is revealed to us, we should seek to obey it or submit to it. Then our prayer is that God, by his Spirit, would incline us to submission; would bring us more and more fully into accord with his way; would make us willing to be made willing; and would help us, whether in active obedience or in patient submission, to do our Father's will on earth as it is done in heaven.

> Father, I do not ask
> That Thou wouldst choose some other task
> And make it mine. I pray
> But this: Let every day
> Be moulded still
> By thine own hand; my will
> Be only thine, however deep
> I have to bend thy hand to keep.
> Let me not simply do, but be content,
> Sure that the little crosses each are sent;
> And no mistake can ever be
> With thine own hand to choose for me.

"Preparation for the Lord's Return."

A THREE days' Conference on the above subject was held last week, October 10th to 12th, in Bramblebury Hall, Wandsworth. The brethren who took part in the Conference were Revs. E. W. Evans, and S. Wilkinson, Pastor F. E. Marsh, and Messrs. E. Matthews, F. W. Pitt, and C. R. Hurditch.

As with the speakers, so with the hearers, Christians of many denominations were present at the meetings. Surely this is one of the indications of the Lord's near return, when believers forget their distinctions, and gather around the one and only centre—Christ.

There were two special features of the addresses given. First, thought was directed, not so much to the coming of the Lord as a truth, as to the Lord who is coming; and second, the aim of each speaker seemed to be to press home the practical bearing the subject should have upon the hearts and lives of God's children. As one speaker aptly put it, "Our thoughts in this Conference have not been directed to the beast and his number, but they have clustered around Christ and his claims." Such being the case, there was accord in the testimony given, and concord among the brethren ministering.

Mr. Evans urged Christians to count upon the Spirit's power, in order to have trimmed lamps and girded loins for the coming Christ. Mr. Matthews referred to the readiness which should characterize God's children, as suggested by the parables in Matt. xxiv., xxv. Pastor Marsh dwelt upon the purifying effect of "The Blessed Hope," as stated in 1 John iii. 3, and the practical results which must follow the remembrance that we have to stand before the Judgment Seat of Christ (Rom. xiv., 1 Cor. iii. and iv., 2 Cor. v.). Colonel Roberts emphasized the importance of the grace of patience in relation to Christ's return (James v. 7). Mr. Wilkinson called attention to Israel's place and prospect, in the light of the Lord's return; Mr. Pitt exhorted to an attitude of constant waiting for Christ; and Mr. Hurditch closed the Conference with an address to young believers.

The Conference was hearty, healthful, helpful and happy. We are not surprised at this, for when speakers seek the Spirit's art and heart, there is sure to be practical result.

Prisoners of Hope.

ZECHARIAH IX.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

IT is a remarkable promise that is alluded to in the heading of this chapter. As for thee also, because of the blood of thy Covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water. Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope; even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee.

In eastern lands, liable to long spells of drought, it is customary to hew cisterns out of the living rock for the storage of water, that provision maybe made against the failure of the rains. These abound in Palestine. "They hewed out for themselves cisterns." When these were empty, they might be used for other purposes, and at all times provided a useful retreat, or hiding-place, from the Philistines or other hostile neighbours, who periodically poured up through the valleys, carrying fire and sword to the peaceful pastoral and agricultural hamlets. Such use of the rock-hewn cisterns is referred to in these words. It seemed to the prophet, as though Israel might be compared to a terrified peasantry, sheltering in some dark, dry, mountain cistern, far up from the valleys, dreading every day lest their hiding-place might be discovered, and themselves dragged forth to dye with their blood the green sward.

THUS, IN EVERY AGE GOD'S PEOPLE HAVE BEEN IMPRISONED. You have been caught in the wiles of this world's evil, as the Master was. You have no sympathy with it, yet somehow you have become involved in the snares and toils of malign combinations. As the wild thing of the forest, bounding carelessly down the glade, suddenly finds itself at the bottom of the dark pit prepared and hidden by the hunter; so you, who began life so guilelessly, and passed your early days so blithely, have awoke to discover yourself involved with people and things, from which you cannot disassociate yourself. You have no desire for them, they chafe and try you; but you cannot get off. It seems as though some not indeed in your soul, but in your home and circumstances.

Or, perhaps, you have been led captive by the devil at his will. There is no doubt about your sonship; in your better moments, God's spirit witnesses clearly with yours, that you have been born again; you have strong yearnings after the souls of others, and at times are marvellously used for their awakening and comfort; and yet, during long and sad periods of experience, you seem the bound slave of the great enemy of souls. Swept before strong gusts of passion; careening in the dock; waterlogged until progress in the divine life seems impossible, and you can only drift helplessly to and fro on the tides.

Or, perhaps, you have fallen into deep despondency, partly as the result of ill-health, and partly because you have looked off the face of Christ to the winds and waves. The clear-shining of his love is obscured, and at times it is difficult to believe in anything but the pressure of your own dark thoughts. Some of God's children seem to choose the valley of the shadow of death as the site of their dwelling, and then employ doubt, dread, and despondency, to design and build the house, which is sadly like a gaol. They affect the sombre tint, and the despairful tone; and, strange anomaly! appear happiest when abandoned to the profoundest melancholy.

All such are prisoners, but they are prisoners of hope. There is a sure and certain hope of their deliverance. Out of their prisons they shall ultimately emerge, as Peter, angel-led, from his. The clouds might more easily succeed in imprisoning the sun than any of these dark conditions permanently hold one of God's children. They belong to the light and day; and, though they see it not, Hope, as God's angel, is standing near, only waiting his signal to open the prison door. The prisoner, on whom the sentence of capital punishment has passed, and who has no strong, wise friends to interfere on his behalf, may well abandon hope as he passes within the massive walls of the fortress, and hears the heavy gates, one after another, slammed and locked behind him. But where justice and truth are on his side, when he has been the victim of craft and guile, if there be a good wife and strong friends to espouse his cause, though he be incarcerated, bound with chains on the Devil's Island, and though the weary years pass over him, yet he is a prisoner of hope, and shall come forth again into the light of day. All God's children are prisoners of hope.

Their hope rests on the Blood of the Covenant. "Because of the blood of thy covenant, I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit." When God entered into covenant-relationship with Abraham, the sacred compact was ratified by the mingled blood of an heifer of three years old, a she-goat of three years old, a ram of three years old, a turtle dove, and young pigeon. And, in after years, when, beneath the beetling cliffs of Sinai, Moses acted as mediator between God and the children of Israel, he sent young men, because the order of priesthood was not established, which offered burnt-offerings and sacrificed peace-offerings of oxen unto the Lord. Then Moses took the blood and sprinkled part on the altar, and part on the people, saying, "Behold which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." (Gen. xv. 9; Ex. xxiv. 7, 8.)

Similarly, when the new covenant, the provisions of which are enumerated in Heb. viii., was ratified, it was in the blood of Jesus. As He took the cup, He said: "This is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many unto the remission of sins." "And for this cause He is the Mediator of a new covenant." The shedding of the blood of the Lamb of God indicates that God has entered into covenant-relationship with Him, and all whom He represents, who are, by faith, members of his mystical body, the Church. On his side, He promises to be a God to us, and to take us to be his people; on our side, Christ promises, on our behalf, that we shall be a people for his own possession, zealous of good works. This covenant embraces all who have believed, shall believe, and do believe in Jesus. It embraces thee, if thou dost at this moment simply believe in Him as thine, and art willing to be evermore his. And in placing the cup to thy lips, at the Holy Supper, thou dost visibly and solemnly attest thy belief that there is a special relationship between God and thee, not in virtue of thy worthiness, but for the sake of his Son, that great Shepherd, who, through the blood of the everlasting Covenant, was brought again from the dead.

Because of the Blood of the Covenant, God will send forth each of his imprisoned ones out of the pit. That Blood binds Him to interpose on their behalf. Wherever they are, and however thick-ribbed the walls of their prison, God must deliver them. That they might have strong consolation, He has confirmed his word by an oath. He will bow the heavens and come down, will ride upon a cherub and fly, will certainly rescue from the entanglements and complications of evil.

Suppose two men were bound in the closest, tenderest friendship, not needing to exchange blood from each other's veins, as the manner of some is, because heart had already exchanged with heart; and suppose one of these, travelling in Calabria or Anatolia, was captured by brigands and carried into some mountain fastness, threatened with death unless ransomed by an immense sum of money; can you imagine his friend at home, in the enjoyment of opulence and liberty, settling down in circumstances of ease, and allowing his brother to meet his miserable fate, with no effort for his deliverance? It is impossible to imagine such a thing. So it is with God. Whatever be the sad combination of disaster which has overtaken us, He is sealed by the blood of Jesus, to spare no effort till our soul is escaped as a bird from the snare of the fowler, until the snare is broken, and we are escaped.

There is a remarkable illustration of this in the story of the conquest of Canaan. By guile, the men of Ai betrayed Israel into making a covenant with them. Three days after, their lie was exposed; but the princes said, "We have sworn unto them by the Lord, the God of Israel; now, therefore, we will not touch them." And when Ai was besieged by neighbouring kings, out of pure revenge, and an appeal was made for help, it was at once furnished, because of Israel's troth. So, child of God, if you have made Jesus your king, He is sure to succour you. Behold! thy King cometh, O prisoner of hope; He is just, and therefore He has salvation.

Is not this the reason why some of us are not delivered? We should be glad enough to accept deliverance, but are not prepared to pay the price. We have not observed the divine order and crowned Jesus King of our hearts and lives. We are wishful that He should be our Saviour, but not altogether prepared to accept Him as King.

THIS IS OUR MISTAKE:

God hath exalted Him to be a Prince and a Saviour: He is first King of Righteousness, before He is Priest after the order of Melchizedek: and it is only when we confess with our mouths Jesus as Lord, that we shall be saved.

But do not fear Him. His footfall is very soft. He is lowly, and rides upon a colt, the foal of an ass. No prancing steed, no banner flaunting in the breeze, no long train of warriors. Soft as the summer breeze: irresistible as the summer sunshine, before which great tubular bridges bend. Lowly as a child—thy King, thy King is here. And before his advent the bars are broken, as though ice were thawing drop by drop in spring, and letting the imprisoned ship through the close-set floes.

The King speaks peace, but He uses his emancipated ones as weapons in the great fight. I have bent Judah for me (as a man might bend his bow), I have filled my bow with Ephraim (as with an arrow). This, in the first instance, refers to the struggle of the Maccabbees against Alexander's successor—Antiochus—as appears in the following words: "I will stir up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and will make thee as the sword of a mighty man." But there is a deeper meaning, which applies to us all. Jesus first saves us, and then we become as arrows in the hand of a mighty man.

O, prisoners of hope! lift up your heads, your salvation is come out of Zion. Turn you to the stronghold. The enemy has been driven from his position. There is no more fear of his attack. Take up your abode in the stronghold of God's care and love, in the fortress of his Righteousness, in the keep of his Covenant.

SUNDAY, October 22. 1 Chron. xxvi.

THERE were 4,000 porters, or door-keepers (xxiii. 6), all taken from the families of the Kohathites and Merarites (v. 14). They were divided into twenty-four courses, as were the priests and musicians. Evidently the organization of these various classes was very minute and careful. It is well to organize God's work, that no one may overrun the province of another, and that each may find a suitable sphere; but we need to be very careful lest our machinery be too great for our driving power. The late Dr. Gordon, of Boston, once told the writer, that in his early manhood, the machinery of his church organization was so heavy as to threaten to undermine his health, and that God seemed to say, that his business was not to care for the running of the spindles, but for the maintenance of a sufficiency of water supply. Where there is plenty of water, the spindles will revolve of themselves, and where there is plenty of Holy Ghost power, the machinery of a church will follow as a matter of course.

The porters needed to be mighty men of valour, to open and close the heavy gates, and act as a military guard in times of turbulence and attack. Their gates were assigned by lot, and there would be no rivalry, though some were stationed at the rubbish gate (16), and some at the royal gate (comp. 16, and 2 Chron. ix. 4).

What a solemn and blessed office was that delegated to Ahijah and others, to be the superintendents of the treasures of God's House, spoils won in battle! We are reminded of those whose special work it is to be stewards of the unsearchable riches of Christ, also won in war.

MONDAY, October 23. 1 Chron. xxvii.

The military division of the people regularly placed 24,000 soldiers at David's disposal, course succeeding course, each for a month in the year. They were stationed at Jerusalem, or wherever they might be required, and were amply sufficient for sudden emergencies; but in the time of war the whole army of 288,000 was easily available. On the expiry of his month's service, the soldier returned to the duties of private life for the remaining eleven months of the year. We, too, are under arms, called to be soldiers; and, as of old no soldier needlessly encumbered himself with household goods whilst on military service, so we must be on the alert to serve our Master, Christ, at his least beck (2 Tim. ii. 4).

So great was the number of Israel that it would have been impossible to number the vast hosts, so exactly was the ancient promise fulfilled (Gen. xv. 5). David probably quieted his conscience in taking this census by limiting the age to twenty and upwards; but he fell under the divine condemnation, which judges by our motives as much as by our actions.

What a dignity was Hushai's! The mind is almost bewildered as we read of all the treasures and wealth, the vineyards and olives, the herds and the camels, with their superintendent officers, that now belonged to the once shepherd boy. But as we near the close of the elaborate enumeration, we are told that Hushai was the king's friend. That was dignity enough. And in having his friendship, Hushai owned also all that belonged to him. But what must it not be to be the special friend of Jesus! While others are busy with his possessions, let us choose, like Mary, Himself.

TUESDAY, October 24. 1 Chron. xxviii.

The longer we live, the more absolutely we believe in God's eternal choice. It is the grey-haired monarch who speaks of God's choice: first of Judah, then of the house of Jesse, then of himself, and lastly of Solomon. We are equally conscious that it is only by the grace of God that we are as we are. We trace his purpose back to the eternal ages before the worlds were made, and gratefully reiterate the Apostle's words, "elect according to the foreknowledge of God unto obedience, and sprinkling of blood of Jesus Christ." Nothing gives such stability, such singleness of purpose, such indifference to the praise or blame of man, such freedom from heart-burning and jealousy, as the confidence that our personal salvation, our lot in life, and the works we are called to achieve, once lay in the thought of God as the forest in an acorn; and it is for us to accomplish that which eternal forethought has designed, obediently, patiently, and in faith.

Our part is obedience. We must seek out and observe all the commandments of the Lord our God; so only can we possess the land of promise. It was this knowledge that led David to turn so impressively to the stripling by his side, exhorting him to obey with a perfect heart and willing mind.

To us also, as to him, the pattern of our temple-building is given. By and in the Spirit, God will make known to us his will. If not all at once, as though we could see the entire temple in its complete beauty, yet in separate details, as it becomes necessary to add them. There is nothing in life, from the treasures of the dedicated things to the golden chariot of cherubim wings, spread out as a throne for Jehovah—nothing from your commercial life to your most soaring aspirations which is not the subject of Divine interest, and may not become an object of loyal obedience.

WEDNESDAY, October 25. 1 Chron. xxix.

With all your might, my friend, because the palace of your life is not for man, but for the Lord God. Set your heart's affection on Him, and then you will find it easy to give over and above what you have prepared, and the very walls of your life will become overlaid as with gold of Ophir. This spirit also will be contagious. You will be able to speak with authority, in appealing to others, to offer willingly and to consecrate themselves to the Lord.

How full this chapter is of willing offerings! The princes, captains, and rulers offered willingly; the people offered willingly. Their willing offering was the theme of David's thankful prayers (14, 17). Such offering is only a legitimate return to God. We have nothing that He does not give, and He gives that we may give Him again. Oh that men would look on riches, and power, and might, and honour, and strength, as having come from God, to be laid out in his service! Nothing makes us so glad as this. The people rejoiced, because they offered willingly. It is more blessed to give than to receive! Of many a bachelor relative, hoarding his fortune selfishly, it has been told that a new joy has entered his life when he was called upon to provide for a family of orphans. May God ever keep this in the imagination of the thoughts of our hearts, and prepare our hearts so to consider—so to give!

THURSDAY, October 26. 2 Chron. i.

When God is with men they are strong and gracious. It is quite useless for such to magnify themselves. God will see to it that the candle is put on the bushel, and the city set on the top of the hill. Only let us be sure that our one thought and purpose is to use our glory for the true welfare of those around us.

How difficult it is to go out and come in before men! It is easy to preach, or give generously, or even to work amongst the masses; but to order our conversation aright, as we sally forth into the market-place and forum, or return to the intimacies of home and friends, this needs the wisdom and knowledge which only God can afford.

Those that seek their lives lose them. If Solomon had asked at that supreme moment for the wealth, honour, victory, which are naturally so dear to men, he would never have reached the pinnacle of magnificence to which God afterwards raised him. But those who lose their lives win them. Because Solomon thought only of the qualities needed to administer his realm, and for the good of his people, God gave him the other things, as the shopman adds paper and string to the goods you purchase. Those who seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness find all other things will be added to them. "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart."

To all of us seductive voices float, pleading that we should "spare ourselves," that we should "mind the main chance," accumulate "our pile," add field to field—advice which is sure, sooner or later, to land us in unutterable regret. Oh, happy they, whose one thought in life is the people whom they can influence, and for whose sake they seek such endowments as their position demands!

FRIDAY, October 27. 2 Chron. ii.

God is great. Remember that, when you pray to Him. He is greatly to be praised, greatly to be feared. The greatest men—those who, like Solomon, have had the largest intellects—have realized that God is as much above them as heaven above the loftiest alp. Indeed, when the distance between the surface of our earth and the sun is under review, the difference made by the elevation of the Himalaya above the plain at their foot is perfectly inconsiderable. Galileo, Kepler, Newton, Milton, Johnson, Webster have all confessed their absolute nothingness before the greatness of God, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain.

A photographer seeking to represent the immensity of the temples and pyramids of ancient Egypt, of Baalbec, of Thebes, will often station some natives at their base, that the eye may be enabled to compare their size by contrast with the stature of an ordinary man. So let us put Solomon the wisest; Isaiah, with his power of soaring thought; and Paul, with all the genius and grace of which he was possessed; yea, let us even put the unsinning angels, the loftiest spirits of the universe, in comparison with the greatness of God, and it is as though you compared a drop with the ocean, a grain of sand with the mass of the central sun. Mind to prepare his house on a worthy scale. It should be "wonderful great" (v. 9). Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised, loved, and served.

How noble that Hiram was not jealous! It was simply a matter of thanksgiving to him that so wise a son had come to David's throne. May we not address to our Lord the words he penned on the receipt of Solomon's message: "Because the Lord loveth his people, He hath made thee king." Because the Father hath appointed Christ to the kingship of his people, and ultimately of the world, we are assured of his love. He knew that life could be only happy in obedience to such a despot.

SATURDAY, October 28. 2 Chron. iii.

From all the splendour and proportions of this magnificent temple, we turn to the concluding words, and seek to imagine these lofty pillars, the names of which are so full of spiritual teaching. Jachin, He shall establish; Boaz, In it is strength. In each life these two are needed.

Jachin should be part of your soul structure. You should be an established Christian, not whimsical and fickle; not drifting here and there, on the tides of inclination; not saying Yea to-day and Nay to-morrow; not the creature of circumstance or caprice; but established. Do not make your plans without due thought, prayer, and seeking Divine guidance; and, when they are formed, do not deflect from them to the right hand or the left. Does this seem impossible? Are you naturally so yielding and impressionable? Then recall the words of the Apostle: "He that establisheth us with you unto Christ, is God." (2 Cor. i. 21.) The establishing of the soul needs a Divine hand. It is a work not done once and for all, but needing always the present tense of interposition and salvation. As Peter prays, "May God Almighty, stablish, strengthen, settle you" (1 Pet. v. 10).

Boaz also must play its part in the structure of your soul. You need strength, not only to do, but to suffer; not only to run and fly, but to stand still, or lie down. Your own strength will fail. In the day of battles, of mortal sorrow, of the throes and agonies of death, your only hope is to derive strength from Him who is stronger than the strong man. By faith absorb the strength of his nature, until you wax valiant in fight, are strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man, and can do all things by Christ strengthening you.

Home Missions.

Children's Special Services.

HOLIDAY-MAKERS, as a class, whether at the sea-side or in the country, are, it is to be feared, more inclined to seek their own benefit and enjoyment, than the good of others. Happily there are exceptions—persons who make it a point, nay, more than that, their bounden duty, to devote the few short days or weeks of their summer vacation to the best interests of, especially, the younger people, with whom, during that time, they are brought into contact. Striking examples of a summer holiday well spent at various places round our coast are given each year at the autumnal meetings of that now widely extended and useful organisation, known as the Children's Special Service Mission.

At such favourite resorts as Eastbourne, Llandudno, Cromer, Bridlington, and others too numerous to mention, members of this mission, principally young men and women, well educated and of high Christian character, may be seen daily, and nightly too, conducting bright, interesting, and in every way suitable services for the spiritual good of the thousands of children—from the tiny dot of three years to the more staid schoolboy and schoolgirl of fifteen or sixteen—who are to be found at the seaside during the holiday season. The great object of the workers is to people to Christ, that they may be a blessing to their fellows.

The services partake, as is most important that they should, of a varied character. The sea-beach is utilised as much as possible, for here it is that an audience of young people can be gathered together with comparatively little difficulty; and it is a most pleasing and encouraging sight to witness 100 to even 1,000 people, children and parents, attentively listening to some speaker who is telling forth, in an earnest yet bright and interesting way, the simple story of Jesus and his love. As several speakers usually take part on each occasion, the addresses are necessarily short, and they are interspersed with such hymns and music as will be most likely to attract and keep together a youthful audience. The meetings also include, at some of the coasting-places, in favourable weather, lantern or even magic-lantern services, and, in either, case it is earnestly sought to make the occasion one of both

INTEREST AND SPIRITUAL PROFIT.

At these gatherings in the open air, the speakers in most cases are provided by willing hands with a pulpit or platform of sand, thereby being enabled the better to address their audiences. Besides these general meetings, others are held respectively for boys and for girls, according to age, in some suitable room or hall that can be secured for the purpose. Individual dealing is made a special feature at these services, and has resulted in blessing to, or the conversion of, not a few of the young people who have attended them. Then there are always at least one or two missionary meetings held outside or under cover, just as circumstances permit, and by this means the interest evoked has led, in several instances, to a decision on the part of young men and women to give themselves for service in the foreign field. Of course, where there are boys and girls, there must be provided for them suitable outdoor exercise, and this is furnished in the form of cricket, gymnastics, rounders, races, and other healthful and innocent sports. These pastimes have, naturally, the effect of bringing the conductors of the mission services and the young people together in happy fellowship, thereby creating in the minds of the latter an interest in the services themselves.

At the anniversary gatherings of the mission, held the other day, in St. Martin's Town Hall, the speakers, quite a dozen in all—those who had conducted services at various seaside places during the past summer—gave most interesting and encouraging accounts of the work they had been enabled, under God, to do amongst the children. Those who gave addresses at the afternoon meeting, which was presided over by Rev. E. A. Stuart, M.A. (President), included Mr. Bernard Herklots, who has just recently returned from India after two years of labour there in connection with the Children's Scripture Union, an organization which is affiliated with the Children's Special Service Mission. Mr. T. B. Bishop, hon. sec., dwelt on the pressing need for more workers in the mission. Colonel J. F. Morton presided at the evening meeting, which, like that in the afternoon, was densely crowded.

In Bird Fair.

OCTOBER 8 was a bright, sunny autumn morning. Our first detachment was ready to start before eleven, preceded by four young workers with our small trolly, on which were the two harmoniums, which were placed under one of the arches of the Great Eastern Railway, which crosses Brick Lane. On the wall opposite was a large painted text, "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." It is there to encourage and strengthen the faith of the preacher, as much as to arrest the eye of the weary, sin-stricken Sabbath-breaker.

All around, the narrow streets were crowded with men, women, and children, both Jews and Gentiles, buying and selling—some with their barrows, others at the shop doors. The Britisher yelling at the highest pitch of his voice, whilst swarms of foreign Jews, offering their wares quietly, knowing not only how to sell, but how to keep and take care of their money.

It is joy to hear the lady workers tell how the Jews listen to the story of the Nazarene and his redeeming love. A Jewess asked for a tract, saying, "I know I am a sinner, and would like to be of your religion, as you have a sacrifice for sin, and we have none."

Come with us through the street, crowded with men and women of every nation, one moving mass (the police say about 10,000 from the hours of eleven to three o'clock) to the other preaching station, the young men uplifting the large banner, with "Flee from the wrath to come." Here is a lady who has for years chosen to be a tract distributor. She gently threads her way, prayerfully presenting her precious messages; never insulted, always thanked, if not aloud, with a nod or grateful look. The coster ceases shouting, and asks not to be forgotten, as he would miss his

BIT OF READING AFTER DINNER.

The servants of the devil are around in the open street, as well as the servants of Christ. How varied are the ways in which they seek to ensnare and to influence both old and young, luring them on to destruction! Sometimes it is a man with face painted black, uttering a few witticisms, or the stylish agitator haranguing the crowds on some socialistic subject. Here is a gambler, in the midst of a circle of men, offering his "tips," and tempting the young to risk their hardly-earned wages in "backing horses," &c., whilst another, with his fine carriage and pair of grey horses, is busily handing out twopenny packets of medicine, and the halfpence are flowing in to enrich his coffers, by the easily deceived multitude.

We arrive at the preaching, praying group. To the worldly eye they seem a number of insignificant fanatics; but they are filled with the love of Jesus. Rapidly one speaker follows another—men who have been saved whilst listening to the Gospel story in a similar crowd. Some of them, not long since, were themselves ringleaders in the gambling, fighting crowds around.

As we listen, a bright and happy-faced man whispers, "Do you know me? I just came to see the old faces once more. It is thirty-three years since I first decided for Christ; and I am looking forward to spend a glorious eternity with you all soon." A. McP.

Blackgang Mission, I.W.

THE anniversary of the Blackgang Mission was celebrated a few days ago, in combination with the harvest festival. Great heartiness characterized the proceedings. The meeting not only commemorated the opening of the new Mission Hall twelve months ago, but also the formation of the Mission, twenty-six years since.

The public meeting was presided over by Mr. James Newman, of Sandown, and on the platform were Revs. H. J. Crouch, M. Lister Gaunt, Dr. Young, and Mrs. Christopher Smith, the superintendent of the Mission. In the course of some hearty words, the last-named alluded to the blessing that had attended the work during the past year, and the peace and happy fellowship which obtained among the members.

The chairman referred to the fact that not only did the plentiful harvest afford ground for thankfulness, but the remembrance of our Heavenly Father's mercies and gracious dealings during the past year also called for special praise.

Dr. Young followed with much fervour, pointing out the possibility of having, spiritually, a wasted harvest. Some four or five testimonies were then given, after which Rev. M. L. Gaunt delivered an able, earnest, and practical address on the power of a saved and sanctified life. This was followed, again, by various testimonies and addresses from the body of the hall.

Mr. Crouch gave the concluding address on gratitude, which he illustrated by many incidents and figures. He also referred to the work of the Mission in the past, and the joy it had been to him to have fellowship in the work.

A Minstrel in a Coal Mine.

MR. BOB JOHNSON, the converted nigger minstrel, writes to thank the friends who have helped him in his work. The story of his activities is very interesting. He says:

"Since the day that I was urged to change masters by Mr. Josiah Nix, in the mission tent on Epsom Downs, Derby Day, 1893, I have never known such a blessed time of service as that which opened for me on Easter Morn, and has continued right through the spring and summer. The power of the Holy Spirit has been manifested in a remarkable manner, at tent missions, fairs, market-places, at the races, river regattas, on the sands at the seashore, and even down a coal mine—where, with the accompaniment of my grand old consecrated banjo, a service of song was held at the pit-bottom, and literature distributed at the (coal-face) workings. This entailed a tramp and a crawl of a mile and a half, 500 yards below the surface. Dressed in collier fashion, with my safety lamp and my old banjo, I trudged along the gloomy track, and great was my joy when at last I found myself at the Montague workings, face to face with the hewers and fillers.

"I sang of John v. 24, and told the half-naked collier lads of the Christ I had found on the Epsom racecourse. Though well blackened with coal-dust, and bathed in perspiration, I felt as happy as a schoolboy on a village green. For why? Because, this was the 'shift' that I saw most of at the open-air meetings held outside the large public-house at evenings. They would come up out of the pit with me at 2 p.m.; many that day would go home instead of going to the big drink shop. Last evening they were dodging my personal appeals at the open-air services by rushing into the public-house. Here they were caught in a trap and could not run away from God's Word. Well might they exclaim, 'We neer seed owt like this!' 'Thou's bro't a noo kind o' religion to Denaby, when thou can coom deawn pit 'n' play an' sing, 'n' speak loike one o' oursen's. O'm bound to believe in aw' thou's said, its reet, 'n' o'm bound to believe it; 'n' God bless thee, lad.'"

Brother Johnson's address is 84, Osnaburgh Street, Regent's Park, London, N.W.

School for Bible Study.

ON Wednesday last week, in Exeter Hall, a course of ten lectures on Bible Study was begun by Rev. Hubert Brooke. Organized in connection with the Central Y.M.C.A., the course is designed to stimulate interest in God's Word, and perseverance in study of the same. By arranging for the lectures, the Y.M.C.A. Committee wished to assist young men; but they have seen their way to minister important help to a still larger public. Accordingly, while opening his studies to young men every Wednesday evening during the progress of the school, Mr. Brooke will also, on the afternoons of the same day, lecture to general audiences, regardless of age or sex.

Mr. W. H. Seagram presided at the opening meeting, which was, of necessity, introductory in character. Those who attended were greatly assisted in following the lecture by copies of a synopsis which were distributed throughout the room. In some opening remarks, Mr. Brooke made it clear that his intention was to address Christian people for practical rather than intellectual purposes. Having spoken of the Bible as a library of two parts—66 volumes by about forty writers—he passed on to deal with the claims of the Book under three heads.

I. Claims expressed in its pages: that it is (a) The Word of God (Prov. xxx. 5; Jno. x. 35; 1 Thess. ii. 13; Heb. i. 1, 2). (b) The Scriptures from God (Jno. v. 39; 2 Tim. iii. 15; Dan. x. 21). (c) Inspired of God (2 Tim. iii. 16—avoid the reading of R.V.); written by men moved by the Holy Ghost; (1 Pet. i. 11; 2 Pet. i. 21); infallible (Lu. xvi. 17); irresistible (Lu. xxiv. 44); irrefragable (Jno. x. 35); necessarily fulfilled (Jno. xiii. 18, xv. 25, xvii. 12, xix. 28, 36, 37). (d) Sealed with Authority by Christ: the Old Testament in its three divisions (Mat. v. 18; Lu. xviii. 31, xxiv. 44; Mark xii. 36; and the New Testament in prospect, Jno. xv. 26, 27, xvi. 13-15; 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16). Therefore refuse all partial acceptance, all idea of accommodation to Jewish theories, all thought of limitation in Christ's knowledge (2 Pet. i. 21; Lu. xviii. 31, xxii. 37, xxiv. 26; Jno. xii. 48-50; Heb. i. 2).

II. Claims as to its power—what it is able to do:—(a) To guide the soul (Ps. cxix, 24, 105; Prov. vi. 20-23; Is. viii. 20; Mark xii. 24). (b) To nourish the soul (Job xxiii. 12; Jer. xv. 16; Mat. iv. 4; (Jno. vii. 51). (c) To perfect the soul, bring it to full growth (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17) through four stages of development, resulting in complete equipment. It follows, that omission of any part results in one sided character; that every part has something to contribute to full growth; that every part must be used if full equipment is to be attained. All scripture has a meaning and a purpose; there is no waste and no needless obscurity. Beware of any system which forbids or ignores the Bible.

III. Claims as to how it should be used: (a) By searching its contents (Jno. v. 39); meditating on its substance (Ps. i. 2: 1 Tim. iv. 15); comparing its different parts (1 Cor. ii. 13.) (b) By seeking for the spirit, not the letter only (Jno. vi. 63); with prayer for enlightenment, faith in the authority, obedience to the commands of the Bible (Psa. cxix. 18; 2 Tim. iii. 15; Jno. vii. 17; xiii. 17). It was suggested that the present order of books, not the chronological, is primarily the best for study; and that their order will be found correspond with the normal needs of the soul and with its growth. There was a goodly assemblage of men and women in the afternoon, and the attention was well sustained throughout.

The London Lock Hospital.—This institution, which has been partly closed for about three months on account of drainage and structural alterations, is being reopened this month. The expenditure will amount to fully £3,000, towards which £1,200 will be required before December 31. It is hardly necessary to say much in support of a charity which has been instrumental in doing so much good for 153 years, and is more than ever wanted to take its place among the great hospitals of the metropolis. Happily, there is a home belonging to the hospital that receives some at least of those who desire to amend their lives. The treasurers are Lord Kinnaird, 1, Pall Mall East, and Mr. J. F. W. Deacon, 20, Birchin Lane.

Oxford Letter.

OXFORD has assumed its normal aspect. The Freshmen's term has begun, and has special interest other than for those who came up for the first time. We all seem conscious of the presence of new faces, and of the influx of new life to the city, and, in some sense, share the responsibility of those who are directly responsible for meeting their spiritual needs. A first term brings special temptations, and many are the formative influences at work. May the good prevail over the evil, and may many a young life be consecrated to God during the next few weeks!

The Diocesan Conference held on Wednesday and Thursday was awaited with eager interest by both parties in the Church. Resolutions were to be moved which, it was felt, would lead to some heated discussion. The expectations were realized, and we thank God that there was a distinct triumph for Evangelical truth. Earl Jersey's paper, welcoming the Archbishops' judgment "as affording a practical method of appeal in the first instance," was well received, and a resolution to this effect was passed. His lordship stated, amid cheers, that the laymen of this country would never consent to matters which concerned them so deeply being submitted entirely to the arbitrament of a so-called spiritual court.

There was a somewhat dramatic scene in the midst of the Conference. A paper had been read advocating disestablishment as the only means of obtaining complete self-government for the Church. It seemed likely that the paper would lack a seconder, when Rev. V. S. S. Coles, Principal of Pusey House, ascended the platform, and, in an impassioned speech, declared that there might be worse things than disestablishment. There was a large and increasing party in England claiming to be members of the Church, while they denied the doctrine of the Incarnation. This, the Principal urged, was an issue greater that any question of mere ritual or that of disestablishment; it was a doctrine on which the faith and life of the Church, its very existence, depended. The Principal seemed to overlook, for the moment, that questions of ritual involve questions of doctrine. No one dreams of "contending for a grain of incense" as such; the protest is against the whole sacerdotal system, of which it is a mark and visible sign.

South African Troops.

A NUMBER of organizations are undertaking good work on behalf of the soldiery who are engaged in the South African war.

Mr. Arthur Wheeler, of the Soldiers' Christian Association, Exeter Hall, writes that literature for distribution among the men on board the transports going to South Africa is being distributed at the principal embarkation stations—Southampton, Liverpool, and the Albert Docks. Mr. Wheeler is in communication with friends on the spot, and trust soon to have information which will enable him to forward tents for reading and writing purposes, with qualified workers in charge of the same.

Mr. George Holmes, Mission Evangelist, Gibraltar, asks for Gospel literature for distribution among the troops, who are shortly leaving for the Transvaal. Mr. Holmes pleads specially for the Guards. Other regiments have, or are supposed to have, a Bible per man, but as this regulation does not apply to the Guards, the need is great.

Mr. Bramwell Booth, writing from 101, Queen Victoria Street, remarks: "Little has been heard of any efforts for the spiritual welfare of the troops. We are sending out some people for this next week. We are rather fortunately placed in this matter in one respect. We have halls and people in nearly all the towns within the area of conflict, and there is no doubt that much good work can be done."

Personalia.

Mr. W. R. Lane's three months' evangelistic campaign at the Cape, which had been arranged in response to a united call from ministers and churches, is postponed on account of the war.

Mr. Caldwell, of the Zambesi Industrial Mission has arrived safely at Chinde. He writes that there is no place of worship there, and points out the urgent need for a small iron church, together with a Sailors' Rest and reading room.

Rev. J. Manton Smith.—In a recent letter thi well-known worker says: "I am making steady progress. It is now twelve months since the accident happened which has entailed the loss of a leg. I have booked a mission for December 31 to January 8 at Borough Road, London, S.E. Please ask prayer that I may be fit for the Master's use."

Christian Endeavour.

Topic for October 22.

An Old Time Missionary.—Jonah iii, 1-10.

IT is not always that God's call comes to us a second time. But it is blessed, when He arouses us from our lethargy, saying once more, Arise. Be sure to arise, and go, take the message of the King.

Are you quite sure that that summons has not been sent to you. Now, as of old, Christ is passing through the centres of busy, thronging life, calling men from their nets and boats, from the counting-house and market-place, and saying, with his own inimitable and irresistible charm, "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." May it not be that He has already come to you, casting over you the mantle of his service, as Elijah over the young ploughman whilst following his team. Sister, He says, Arise, go unto India, China, or the Congo, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee. Will you not arise and go? Oh, beware of going down to Joppa and taking passage to Tarshish! You know what comes of that!

You are startled at the suggestion! But probably every one of the mighty band of young men and maidens, which has gone out at his call, was similarly startled when first it broke gently or mightily on his ear. Samuel was startled when the Divine voice rang out in the night. Gideon was startled. "Behold my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house." David was startled, as the golden oil trickled down his flowing locks. Jeremiah was startled as he said, "Ah, Lord God! Behold, I cannot speak, for I am a child." But the unexpectedness of the call is not a proof that it has not come from God.

God's call oftenest comes to the young, to Henry Martyn amid his books; to David Livingstone at his loom; to Mackay in the engineering shed; to John Paton plodding amid Glasgow slums; to Charles Studd preparing for the bar; to Stanley Smith fresh from the University crew. And what is better than to consecrate to his service, who Himself died in early manhood, the whole of life—from early dawn to golden sunset.

You are not yet deeply rooted. It is easy to transplant a young tree. When metal is yet molten, it will assume any shape. The young furnish our soldiers, sailors, pioneers, because it is comparatively easy for them to cut themselves loose, and volunteer for service anywhere.

You can adapt yourself to any circumstances. The young have a marvellous power of acquiring any language, living in any climate, mastering any difficulties of county, race, or condition. What other young men are doing for name, position, and wealth, surely you can do for Jesus.

You are the blood-bought slave of Jesus, and surely He has the right to say Come, Go, Do this. The blood of the Cross, with 1,000 voices, appeals to you to render Him all He asks.

You have the power of God behind you. All power is given to your Master, in heaven and on earth. There is no inch of the world which is not his, no town, no shore. Do not look at circumstances, or count your five loaves and two small fishes, and wonder whether the waves will bear you. Keep your eye on his hand, your ear open to his voice; and when once sure of his leading, onward in his name. The Jordan will divide, the walls of Jericho fall down.

There are four signs of a true call. (1) An inward prompting; (2) the concurrence of circumstances; (3) the counsel of judicious friends; (4) the equipment of necessary gift. These, combining with a strong faith in God and a burning love for souls, are first essentials. Now, listen to the appeal of Christ on behalf of the 1,500 millions of souls, for whom He died, and to some of whom He wants to send you. Yield yourself to Him, and let Him infuse into you his mighty passion for their salvation. Let this be your consecration vow: "Here am I; send me wheresoever, to whomsoever, whensoever. Only make me to know thy will beyond possibility of mistake; and work through me to accomplish all thy good pleasure.

In the case of Nineveh, probably the main thing, which, under the Providence of God, wrought to the conviction and salvation of the city, was the fame of Jonah's miraculous resurrection from his briny grave. Looking on him, they saw a proof of the reality of God's power. Let us always live and speak as risen men and women. One Holy-Ghost filled man may bring a whole city to God. F. B. M.

American Revivals.

Nettleton and Finney.

[Continuing the series of interesting articles upon historical revivals, the United Presbyterian Magazine for the current month has a contribution (from which we append some extracts) from the pen of Rev. R. Gordon Balfour, D.D.]

IT is an undoubted fact that revivals have been a marked feature in the religious life of the United States. Nowhere else have these movements been so frequent, so powerful, so epidemic in their sweep and range. From the time when the sober and stately Edwards gave to the world his "Narrative of Surprising Conversion," down to the present hour, it may be said that America has been the source and centre, the home and habitat, of revivals. At one time this created in the minds of many a prejudice against the whole thing, which led them to shun revival meetings, and to disparage their results. The fact that this prejudice has to a large extent been overcome, is due to the wisdom and sobriety of Mr. Moody, the prince of modern revivalists, and to the large amount of good and abiding fruit which his successive visits to this country have left behind.

Asahel Nettleton was born in North Killingworth, Connecticut, in 1783. While still a child he was occasionally the subject of which, however, always passed away like the morning cloud and the early dew. It was in the year 1800, during a period of revival, that his conversion seems to have taken place.

Soon after his conversion he resolved to study for the ministry. At Yale College he made the acquaintance of several fellow-students who had passed through an experience somewhat similar to his own; and, influenced partly by fellowship with them, and partly by the he felt strongly drawn to the foreign field as the scene of his future labours. Nor did he ever relinquish the hope of entering upon that field until his health utterly broke down. But what hindered him at first was his remarkable gift for evangelistic work, and the extraordinary success that attended his labours.

His services in this capacity were so continually in request that, with the exception of a visit paid to England in 1831, his whole time and attention were given to his native country. His doctrine was Calvinistic, but not that hyper-Calvinism with which Andrew Fuller had to contend, which restricted the offers of the Gospel and the command to believe to those who were convinced of sin—"sensible sinners," as they were sometimes called. It is difficult to see how any widespread revival of religion could ever be associated with such a doctrine as that. Though Nettleton had himself passed through a lengthened period of conviction of sin before entering into peace and joy, he was too wise and broad-minded, and too well instructed in Scripture, to insist on others passing through a like experience. But he laid great emphasis upon the doctrines of grace, the sovereignty of God, the helplessness of man, the necessity for the Holy Spirit's work—doctrines which humble the pride of man and ascribe salvation to the Lord alone.

Nettleton's preaching was much more doctrinal, and even severely logical, than what is called evangelistic preaching at the present day. If modern revivalists were to follow his example their work might be more permanent, and they might reach a class who are impatient of religious platitudes, however earnestly enforced. Perhaps, however, the leading feature of his preaching was not so much its intellectual power as its deep and awful solemnity. Without any of the artifices of the orator, he impressed his hearers with the conviction that he was speaking what he believed to be the very truth of God—truth which he felt bound in duty to proclaim, and which it was of infinite importance for them to believe. In keeping with this, he endeavoured to secure the most perfect quiet before the services began, and did everything in his power to repress mere physical excitement. Possessed of strong common-sense and a rare insight into character, he showed great tact in meeting objections, removing difficulties, and speaking the word that was needed in each particular case. He disapproved of some of the methods adopted by Finney and others as being too sensational, and appealed to the reason and conscience rather than to the emotions of his hearers. Hence the solid and satisfactory character of all his work, the permanence of its results, and the eagerness with which ministers who had once enjoyed his help were ready to welcome his return. The other great American evangelist, whose work we are to consider, is a remarkable man, contemporary with Dr. Nettleton.

One point of contrast between him and Nettleton was that, while the one was a strong, though not an extreme, Calvinist the other became, not perhaps a positive Arminian, but a Calvinist of a very moderate type indeed. In regard to the nature and extent of the Atonement, the doctrine of imputation, and the sinfulness of human nature, his views were very different from those of Edwards, or Nettleton, or the Westminster Confession. He was very candid and outspoken, making no secret of the opinions which he held, but embodying them in his public addresses as the ground on which he felt that he could offer to sinners indiscriminately a free forgiveness. Another point of difference between Finney and Nettleton was that the one adopted, while the other vehemently opposed, certain arrangements in connection with revival meetings characteristic of Methodism, such as bringing inquirers forward to the anxious seat, asking individuals to stand up in presence of the congregation to be prayed for, and the like.

Nettleton and Finney were both thorough believers in the power of prayer. They abounded in that exercise themselves, and urged it upon their hearers as the indispensable pre-requisite to spiritual blessing. They both insisted on the duty of immediate repentance, and strongly disapproved of a style of teaching which was then pretty widely prevalent, and which consisted in exhorting men to continue using the means of grace, instead of commanding them at once to close with the offers of the Gospel. Both made "Christ and Him crucified" the great theme of their preaching. Both were intensely earnest in seeking the salvation of their hearers. But the one aimed at this end, like Edwards, by solemn and awful and danger, by urging the immediate duty of faith and repentance, and at the same time reminding them of their absolute dependence on the grace of God. The other was more impetuous and enthusiastic, versatile in his methods, prone to act on impulses which he believed to be from the Spirit of God, but which may have had a much more earthly origin.

His addresses were perfectly unconventional, sometimes very searching and severe, so that it was only his obvious sincerity and disinterested desire to do them good that prevented some of his ungodly hearers from handling him roughly when he denounced their favourite sins. The great line along which all his teaching ran was the freedom of the human will, the moral responsibility of man. This led him to dwell upon the voluntary nature of sin apart from the doctrine of original depravity—apart, that is, from heredity as underlying character, and character as underlying acts of will.

From the foregoing brief review of American revivals, one thing is very obvious, that these great spiritual movements often baffle human forecast as to the time of their occurrence, the agency employed in their production, and the methods by which they are promoted. No doubt we must be on our guard against a false Gospel, a spurious excitement, and methods that are unwarrantable. But, on the other hand, we must take care not to limit the Spirit of God, or to denounce everything that is not according to the pattern which we prefer, and to which we have been accustomed. We are to remember that 'the wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit.' The range of doctrine which God is pleased to bless to the salvation of souls may be very narrow. The harp of the evangelist may not have many strings. But whatever it wants, the great central truths must not be wanting—sin and salvation, Christ crucified and risen, a free Gospel to be received by faith, and to be followed by a holy life.

Above all, there must be the presence and power of the Spirit in the preacher, if he is to convince and to convert his hearers. And when there is any symptom that a work of grace has actually begun, there must be the greatest care not to grieve the Spirit of God by angry controversy, bitter and uncharitable feelings, censorious judgments of the brethren, the keen pursuit of worldly gain or pleasure, the neglect of the Word of God and prayer. These are things by which many a hopeful spiritual movement has been strangled in its very birth.

Lamps Without Oil.

MATTHEW XXV.

THERE are distinctly two classes of persons described in the parable for our admonition. We can see the same kind of persons in our offices and in our homes any day. Our Lord does not teach us anything far-fetched. We have, in his teaching, the greatest plainness of speech and homeliness of illustration, so that no one will have any excuse for neglecting his teaching by saying they did not understand it.

The ten virgins all slumbered and slept. There was no sin, perhaps, in this; but it showed a reprehensible want of watchfulness. They awoke to time—in good time, as to five of them. These five were in absolute readiness. Had they remained awake, they could not have been more so; though to have been awake might have been more to their credit. There were, we may assume, no heavy sleepers among the ten, for they all heard the cry. Doubtless it was a loud one. It awoke them all. When our Lord shall come the second time, He will come, we are told, with a great noise in the heavens, and we shall be summoned to his presence by the sound of the Archangel's trumpet. It will be an unmistakable announcement, the like of which we never heard before—not even the loudest thunder which made us afraid as to

WHAT MIGHT COME NEXT!

The characteristics of the ten virgins were wholly unlike each other. As unlike as two men we have in our offices to-day, namely, "wise" and "foolish." Such wise and foolish persons are similarly described by our Lord in his closing words of the Sermon on the Mount. The five foolish men there built up their lives on a wrong foundation: they walked by sight, and not by faith. They only believed in what they could see, and left for the future their eternal warfare, in the hope that something would turn up, and all would come out right in the end. Truly, this may be said to be "a fool's paradise."

The foolish virgins professed a desire to meet the Bridegroom. They even provided themselves with lamps—that was something! Some foolish virgins of the present day wrap themselves up in creeds and sacraments. They say to themselves: "I belong to the Church. I have been baptized and confirmed; and the priest and Prayer-book have told me that when I was baptized I became a child of God." Truly a goodly lamp. But what about the oil? Or, perhaps, their father and mother were members of a chapel, and they themselves, having lived irreproachable lives, were admitted to the same membership, although unconverted. The lamp was of the most correct pattern—beautiful to look at; but it lacked vitality: it had no illuminating power or grace. They had no oil in their lamps! We want in these days another Wesley and another Whitefield: we want preachers who will arouse the apathy of the multitudes.

But, perhaps, it will be said that the foolish virgins were not of the multitude. Quite so. That would be a much too vulgar description of them. They are the respectable professing Christians who can go to the theatre on Saturday night, and to Holy Communion on the Sunday. With the sound of the fiddles in one ear, they hear the words of the Holy Spirit with the other, saying, "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." J. J. D.

Temperance Consistency.—Several thousands of pounds are reported to have been refused from a prominent Boston brewer by a college in Massachusetts, on the ground that to accept it would close its mouth on the subject of temperance.

Training for Service.

It may interest friends of missionary work to know that, of the forty students in the Liverpool Deaconess House and Foreign Missionary Training Institute, one is an Armenian, whose father, a doctor, died from horrible torture in prison in Constantinople. She herself was only rescued from a similar fate by some Americans, who helped her to escape to the United States. Now she is preparing herself, in the hope of being able to return, probably next year, with the glad message of Christ's love, to those at whose hands she has suffered so cruelly. The story of God's wonderful care for her and her brothers and sister—of their deliverance from Turkey, and the way friends in this country and America have been raised up to care for them—is a marvellous testimony to God's faithfulness and love.

Another of our students belongs to that remarkable body, the Moravians, whose warm missionary zeal she seems to have inherited, and in connection with which church she hopes to labour abroad, as soon as she is fully equipped for this important work. Amongst others of our household are a Spanish worker and two German deaconesses.

During the last eight years about 120 Liverpool deaconesses have gone forth, under most of our leading missionary societies, to various parts of the world. Last year, for the first time, we became linked with through two of our members being accepted by the South American Missionary Society, and sent out to Alberdi (Rosario); whilst this year Miss Nora Worthington goes out under the C.M.S. to Japan, and Miss Brighty (C.M.S.), who spent two years at Deaconess House, to Yezd (Persia), to work with Dr. and Mrs. White. These give us links with two new countries, and thus widen our range of missionary interest. Many of our ladies have gone out under the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, the China Inland Mission, and the Presbyterian Church, both of Scotland and England.

Every Saturday evening, at our prayer meeting (8 to 9 p.m.), each of our missionary deaconesses abroad is mentioned individually by name; and thus those now in our Institute become familiar with those who, "for his Name's sake," have already "gone forth" to the regions beyond; and when (as is often the case in India and China) they meet, this close bond of prayer gives the happy realization of being not only one in Christ, but also united as "deaconess sisters."

About forty deaconesses, unable, from different causes, to go abroad, are working in various home spheres, as parochial or congregational mission workers. The experience gained in work in the great slums of Liverpool is valuable training for evangelistic work, and to be used of God in the winning of the lost and sinful at home is the true credential of a worker abroad.

A large open-air meeting every Sunday night is mainly sustained by our deaconesses, and very touching it is to hear the testimonies of men, who, two, three, or four years ago, were as deeply sunk in sin as those who now gather there, but who on those very flags were laid hold of by the Spirit of God, and lifted out of the horrible pit and the miry clay. One such is now filling a responsible sphere as a missionary in China under the China Inland Mission, and others have been accepted by the Church Army. Whilst the first place in the is given to the Word of God, studied experimentally and critically — and considerable experience is gained in every branch of mission work—the course also includes six months' training in two of our largest hospitals, and (if desired) an obstetrical course for the L.O.S. diploma. Greek or German is also taken by each student as a test of ability to acquire a foreign language. The theological course in one of our deaconess houses included St. John's Gospel, Doctrine, and Greek New Testament. The examination was kindly undertaken by Rev. Clark Hudson, M.A., vicar of All Saints'. Out of four prizes recently awarded by the Christian Evidence Society in their examination on Dr. Monro Gibson's book, "Rock versus Sand," Liverpool deaconesses took three—the first, second, and fourth—whilst they received eight first-class certificates out of seventeen awarded, and seven second-class certificates out of ten awarded.

About ten or twelve deaconesses have gone or are going abroad this year; this leaves a few vacancies yet unfilled. The Institute is interdenominational; this gives scope for the exercise of that Christlike forbearance and sympathy with all who love the Lord Jesus, which is so essential in a worker whether at home or abroad. At the same time we work (as at Mildmay) on parochial lines, always entering a parish at the invitation of the incumbent, and seeking to work in harmonious relationship with him. We now work in twelve parishes, and often have to refuse requests for our deaconesses.

For the sake of reaching a wider field, we have two centres, each with its own deaconesses' house, accommodating a very happy household of twenty-five, under two able and cultured superintendents, greatly beloved by all who during the last five or six years have been under their care. The usual weekly contribution made by candidates is from 10s. to 21s. weekly. I shall gladly give further information to any young worker desiring to equip herself for the Lord's service.

"One by One."

LESSONS I HAVE LEARNED.

I HAVE prayed, more or less, ever since I could remember. In childhood, prayer was a duty, always irksome, except in time of emergency or fear. In early youth, after my conversion, I realized expansion of ideas upon the subject of prayer. I had periods of earnest desire for real communion with God, and a faint desire for the salvation of others. Later, my views became yet clearer. In the busy streets, in church, in mission services, prayer, in one phase of it, became habitual—much asking for myself, intermittent asking for others. I also used a little personal effort, taking care not to appear eccentric, and God used what He could of my meagre service, so kind is He.

I see now that my love for souls (if such it could be called) was a sentiment rather than a living force. Self came first—self for self's sake—and I could not arouse myself to

An even strong desire,
A calmly fervent zeal,
To save poor souls out of the fire.

My desire was a feeble flicker—my zeal a passing impulse. And yet I was well spoken of in Christian circles, and did much so-called Christian work. I knew something was wrong—what, I could not define.

So the years went on. At length, in 1896, two events marked an epoch in my spiritual life. The one was a fuller realization of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit; the other my introduction to the "One by One Working Band." I have no liking for "rules and regulations" in spiritual matters, and badges do not commend themselves to me; although, to quiet those who indulge in them or think them a help, I have worn them. I took the little book (now somewhat familiar in most of the countries known to civilization), in which names are entered for intercession, and began by saying to myself: "Rule 2 needs modification. Why ask God for persons for whom your commonsense tells you to pray?" Sanctified commonsense was a phrase I often heard, and I put what I thought common-sense in a prominent place.

God was very gracious. He did answer a few of my prayers. I think his very mercifulness made me see my own unteachableness. I went and confessed it to Him, and had another book and a revised list, and He gave me more answers from that list, and souls outside the list as well. He also gave me much temporal blessing, every prayer for daily needs being wonderfully answered. So I learned the joy and rest which arise from wholly depending upon Him. Then He taught me the lesson of definiteness, an invaluable factor in successful prayer-life. He quickened my love to "dying souls of men," and Himself gave me just the messages I needed, and let me reap as well as sow. He showed me how very little room He allows for self-pleasing in the prayer-life, for one loses one's self in intercession for others; and, losing self, finds both oneself and Him too in a communion heretofore unknown.

Finally, He taught me the most difficult lesson for a soul-seeker to learn, especially if he be of a certain temperament—that of patient waiting—not only waiting, but patient waiting—putting cases earnestly, lovingly, before Him, and then saying to one's soul, "Wait thou the Lord's pleasure."

I am taking in his important teaching, and am longing to be an apt scholar in

THE SCHOOL OF PRAYER.

Each day new light arises upon God's will concerning my prayer life, and I cannot but rejoice that ever I became one of the Band.

I am conscious that I have yet much to learn, but am trusting Him to teach me this and every day

To live more nearly as I pray.

The "One by One Working Band" is becoming a blessing to many, and all who desire a revival of God's work should follow such a method. Rev. H. B. Macartney, of the British and Foreign Bible Society, writes to Mr. Hogben, the founder of the Band: "You have my deepest, truest sympathy in this special, admirable, Scriptural endeavour to set more jewels in the Saviour's diadem." Full particulars may be had on receipt of two penny stamps from Mr. Thomas Hogben, "Welcome Mission," Portsmouth. SISTER VERA.

Afterwards.

AFTER the scathing fire,
The peace that is worth the pain;
After the lost desire,
Endless, eternal gain.

After the famine of soul,
After the hideous strife,
The victor's shout at the goal,
And life, more abundant "Life."

After the tempter's snare,
And the subtle bait of sin,
The angel-ministrants fair,
And the rest that conquerors win.

After the heart-sob deep,
Out of the dark alone,
The home where they never weep—
The presence of Christ with his own.

Protestant Sunday.—Rev. Alexander Roger, hon. sec. of the National Protestant Federation, writes thanking the numerous ministers who have responded to the invitation to preach Protestant sermons on Sunday, November 5. He adds: "We are very anxious that the list shall be as complete as possible, and shall be glad to receive a card giving full particulars from those who have, until now, been unable to make arrangements so far in advance. The movement has been very warmly taken up by leading ministers in every denomination, and we are confidently looking forward to a strong Protestant national testimony." Communications to Mr. Roger should be addressed: 50, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate Circus, E.C.

Prevention of Cruelty to Children.—In a circular letter, Rev. Benjamin Waugh appeals for increased support for work on behalf of the nation's needlessly suffering and helpless children. Though the income of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has steadily increased, the magnitude of the work increases too; and there are still large areas of the country in which the Society have, as yet, been unable to station "Children's Men." The deplorable fact (says Mr. Waugh) that in the last twelve months we have had to plead with, to warn, and, in many cases, to invoke the aid of the law on behalf of 76,000 children in wilfully-inflicted pains and miseries, cannot fail to appeal to the pity of humanity, and cannot appeal in vain. During our whole existence we have saved from their evil lot over 450,000 of the children of the land. The Hon. Evelyn Hubbard, M.P., is treasurer of the Society; and the offices are at 7, Harpur Street, London, W.C.

A Remarkable Incident.

The God that answereth by fire, let Him be God."—1 Kings xviii. 24.

QUITE recently a story of more than ordinary interest was recounted by one of our inquirers, a man named Shang-teh, who has, within the last year or two, taken a very bold stand for the truth. A man of ready speech and keen sense of humour, of a most original turn of mind and wonderful gift of illustration, he can speak with such convincing power, that those of the "contrary part" find it difficult to gainsay or resist him.

In the course of general conversation Shang-teh casually mentioned the following incident, which was fully corroborated by our evangelist, Mr. Jang, who was present and heard the story related.

Shang-teh had come to invite us to go to a village, four miles from his own home, and preach and teach the Gospel to his uncle, who had made up his mind to destroy his idols, his faith in their power to save him having been completely overthrown. This led us into a conversation respecting this man, and how he first became interested in the truth. Among the first impressions made on the uncle's mind, and which led him from that time never again to burn incense or offer sacrifice to idols, was the wonderful way in which God manifested his pleasure in, and gave a definite and immediate answer to, Shang-teh's prayers.

It appears that some time ago Shang-teh's uncle visited him in great distress about his sheep, many of which had died suddenly of a malady which the natives attribute to the direct influence of evil spirits. On hearing this, Shang-teh told his uncle that the only right and successful way was to pray to the God of heaven, the only true God. He went with his uncle to the village, and found the flock in a great state of unrest, the sheep crying out as though frightened and in pain. Occasionally one and another, without any premonitory symptoms, would leap up in the air several times, and

SUDDENLY FALL DOWN DEAD.

The heathen custom, at such times, is to try and exorcise the evil spirits with offerings of incense and paper-money. In the darkness of night, the head and several members of the household, after reverently worshipping the household gods, proceed with lighted rush-lights, carrying incense and paper-money, to a "lucky spot" outside the village. There, incense and paper-money are burnt as a propitiatory and parting offering to the evil spirits, with the prayer that they might be pleased to leave the village, and no longer bring death and disaster to the sheepfold.

Shang-teh did his utmost to persuade his uncle not to attempt to exorcise the evil spirits in the usual heathen manner, but simply and in faith to join him in prayer to God. But all his persuasions were in vain. Seeing the uselessness of further talk, he said, "Very well, you may go on with your exorcisms, which are all unavailing; as for me, I am going to pray to my God to deliver these sheep, and drive away the evil influences." The family thereupon set to work with their ceremonies, and, after finishing in the house, they proceeded to the lucky spot outside the village, where the final ceremony of sending away the evil spirits was to take place. Meanwhile, Shang-teh had chosen a quiet spot in the fields, not very far away from the place where his uncle and friends were about to perform their sacrifice.

Here he knelt down, and poured out his heart in prayer to God. His friends, arrived at their destination, were about to set fire to their incense and money offerings, when suddenly a storm of wind arose and blew out their lights. Simultaneously rain fell in heavy showers, drenching the paper-money and the incense, making it impossible to ignite them, and soon they themselves were WET THROUGH TO THE SKIN.

Meantime Shang-teh was kneeling in prayer, and pleading with the Almighty to be merciful to him, and to manifest his glory in delivering his uncle's sheep from the evil spirits and from death. He, too, was wet through with the heavy rain; but, believing that the showers had been sent by God to hinder his uncle from burning his sacrifice to the demons, he felt impelled to continue in importunate prayer to God for a definite answer. Just then, his baffled friends turned their thoughts to Shang-teh and his prayer-offering, which neither rain nor fire could damp or destroy.

It was night, and the darkness was intensified by a starless, cloudy sky. There was neither thunder nor lightning. But suddenly a flame of fire enveloped Shang-teh, where he was kneeling, revealing his whereabouts and his posture. The flame was but of momentary duration, and all was darkness again. Scared by this strange sight, his friends stumbled as fast as they could in the darkness to where Shang-teh was kneeling, expecting to find him burnt, or otherwise injured. But there was no sign of fire found upon him. But, strange to tell, his clothes, though formerly drenched with the rain, had become perfectly dry, while theirs were still wet. Inquiring of Shang-teh what he had experienced, he calmly told them that, though wet with the rain, he had felt that he must continue praying, when suddenly the darkness dispersed, and for a moment a bright light shone round about him. He was not the least afraid, and his clothes, to his surprise, had BECOME SUDDENLY DRY.

Talking over what had happened, they returned together to the home, and, to their delight, found that the God who had appeared by fire had answered the prayer of his servant, and had brought rest and quietness to the flock. Silence reigned in the fold where recently there had been continuous bleating and unrest and death. A reverent and grateful offering of praise went up from that home to the God of heaven "who only doeth wondrous things." "No more incense shall I offer to these false gods," said Shang-teh's uncle; and, so far as we know, he has kept firm in this resolve, and we are hoping that he will soon have the courage publicly to destroy his idols and confess God as his God for ever and ever.

Whatever might be the cause—natural or supernatural—of the phenomenon, the result secured was most satisfactory. On the one hand, the bold faith of a native catechumen was greatly encouraged by the—to him, at least—miraculous and immediate answer to his importunate prayer. On the other hand, the heathen and idolatrous worshippers, who were actors in the affair, and who were witnesses of the strange occurrence, were so convinced of the superior authority of the Christian's God, and of the utter helplessness of human or devilish efforts to avert disaster, that they were at once convicted of the truth, and decided never again to sacrifice to their demon gods.

King's Cross Mission.—The record of this enterprising Mission has just been published in pamphlet form. The story of the transformation of King's Cross from a suburb of villas to a slum like unto Whitechapel, with its attendant influences on the Charlotte Street Methodist Free Church, the appointment ten years ago of Rev. G. H. Turner as pastor, and the record of the heroic work accomplished since, is told in most interesting manner. Mr. Turner's work is all worthy of support. Its headquarters are at Charlotte Street, Caledonian Road, N

A Chinese Convention.

IT has been thought by some, that it would be of interest to your readers to have a brief account of our second Kuling Convention, which was held from July 30 to August 6. A number of friends had been praying that the Lord would grant us his presence and blessing; and it is needless to say that they did not seek in vain, but proved God's readiness to hear his people's cry, even from a mountain top in a heathen land.

On the opening day of the Convention, Rev. S. Woodbridge preached a most helpful sermon on the fundamental truths of the Gospel, taking for his text, Rom. v. 1. Is it not well that we have foundation truths brought before us, and impressed upon our hearts in these days when error is so rampant on all sides? An early morning prayer meeting was held each day at seven, and it was well sustained throughout, proving a time of refreshing to those present. The Convention gatherings were between the hours of ten and twelve o'clock, and two of the days were given to the ladies.

The addresses, on the whole, were not much along the line of holiness and consecration; but some of the messages were stirring exhortations to duty, while others touched upon the knowledge of the excellency of Christ as our power for sacrifice, and the fulness of Christ to satisfy the heart, and overflow the life of his people. The evening meetings were devoted to various subjects. One evening, interesting addresses were delivered by Messrs. Lewis and Brockman upon the Inter-collegiate Y.M.C.A. and the Student Volunteer Movement. Opium and Missions, the Training and Discipline of the Church, and Preaching to the Heathen, formed the topics on other evenings, and were followed by discussion. The testimony meeting, which had been arranged for Friday, had to be abandoned on account of one of the severe storms which are of frequent occurrence in these mountain regions.

Dr. Griffith John preached the closing sermon in the forenoon of August 6. His message to us was one of solemn import, laying great stress upon the fact that if we, as missionaries, follow our Lord, people should be able to say of us, as they said of our Master, "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." It is a cause for praise that from 250 to 300 persons, largely missionaries from various countries, and representing many denominations, met together, recognizing their unity in Christ, and manifesting devotion to his service.

May I, in closing, request prayer on behalf of our Kuling Convention, that, if we are permitted again to assemble, the Lord may grant us even a fuller manifestation of his presence, and perhaps send us a messenger from the homeland, who shall be his channel of blessing to those who, after a time of rest and change on the mountain, return to the real warfare with the powers of darkness in the plains below.

Mr. C. E. Faithfull,

AND HIS GOSPEL WORK IN MADRID.

A SURVEY of the foreign mission field, equally with a review of home operations, affords ample proof and illustration of the Apostolic word about "diversities of gifts and differences of administrations." If, on the one hand, we find men of great erudition; on the other, there are those with large technical resource and practical knowledge engaged in Christian work. There is room for the artificer, as well as the prophet, in the service of God. "Dividing to every man severally as He will," the self-same Spirit equips and qualifies the worker having organizing ability as well as the powerful preacher. The discerner of spirits, the man having the gift of tongues, and the practitioner of the healing art—all find place and sphere in the Gospel ministry and the service of Jesus Christ.

We introduce to notice to-day a worker who has preached in several languages, but not confined himself to preaching. Mr. Faithfull has laboured in every department of a many-sided mission, and seems to combine with the ordinary work of the preacher and pastor the responsibilities of organizer and general administrator. His story is one of noble purpose and persistent diligence, and may well have the influence of a spur and an encouragement to young people burdened with a desire to serve the Lord in the midst of the spiritually dark and needy populations of the world.

As a lad, and even before he was converted, Charles E. Faithfull had a desire to be a minister of Christ. When sixteen years of age he was brought to the Lord, and without delay he began to testify for Him in his native city of Winchester. At length, in 1866, the young man came to London, and there, as he has often been heard to say, he "took his degree" in Christian service. He survived the gibes and persecutions of his fellow clerks, and continued to labour quietly as opportunity offered. The manner or sphere in which God would use him more fully was yet a mystery, and ill-health supervened, making the future still more problematical. Just at this juncture, in 1868, after the revolution in Spain, his way was directed to the sunny Peninsula. Some six months were spent there in search of health and strength, but with no thought of mission work. The stay, however, disclosed an important fact—that the young man had a natural gift of acquiring languages with ease. Moreover, his heart was stirred as to the spiritual needs of the people; and, in the end, he was led to offer himself for Gospel work as the Lord might open the way.

In 1869, Mr. Faithfull returned to England, and married. In a few months he was back in Spain, this time bent on mission work. His first station was Cordova, and from that centre he moved to others, labouring for upwards of ten years in Cordova, Madrid, Vitoria, and Valladolid, with frequent tours of evangelization in different parts of the land. After ten years the Guiding Hand directed the worker to France, where he laboured for sixteen years. Many remember with interest and gratitude the prayerful toils of our friend in connection with the Seamen's Rest at Marseilles.

Returning at length to Madrid, Mr. Faithfull resumed ministry in his old sphere. The call back to Spain (in 1895) arose out of failure of the health of the late Mr. A. R. Fenn, whose long and devoted labour bears fruit to-day. The various agencies of his Chamberi Mission were taken in hand vigorously, and, as the years have passed, they have prospered in themselves and increased in number. Mr. Faithfull's work has been mainly pastoral; he has also managed the mission schools, in which there are to-day about 400 children. It is an interesting fact that yield nearly £300 a year, money given from deep poverty; the same amount is required from friends of the work to support the schools.

In concerns definitely spiritual, the mission has also prospered. The converts and their workers are banded in church fellowship, and there is now a membership of about 120. God be praised that there has never been a year without conversions and additions to the church. During recent years something has been done to develop the native gift for preaching, and there are several who promise well in this respect. By God's blessing upon prayerful direction of study and effort, it is hoped that a body of workers will arise who will go forth with the Gospel into parts of the country hitherto unreached by Christian missionaries and evangelists. There are at present some nine teachers in the schools, and several of them have been in the service for long periods—twenty-six, twenty-five, and fifteen years. Some of the Spanish workers are making encouraging progress, and among the voluntary helpers is an English convert, who has given great joy to the pastor and his friends. Among the members of the church are also a German, an Italian, a French-Swiss, and a Jap.

After twenty-one years of successful work in hired premises, the land, with the three separate buildings of one storey each represented in the woodcut on page 21, was secured by purchase, and is held in trust by the Continental Lands Company, in conformity with the provisions of English and Spanish laws. The money wherewith these premises were purchased was largely subscribed in small sums. Last year additions were made, completing the buildings, and making them still more serviceable for school purposes. One thing, however, yet remains to be done—namely, to acquire land lying behind the premises for use as a playground for the children. Like other youngsters, the Spanish boys and girls need exercise, and enjoy innocent sports between school hours; and for £500 this very suitable plot of land may be secured.

The mission schools have not only been a great blessing to the people, but they have been so owned of God as to assist very materially in the advancement of Gospel work in Madrid. Since the commencement, nearly nine thousand children have passed through them, and no one can tell the influence of Christian education upon their lives. Many are known to have been converted, several are church members, and a large proportion of those in fellowship to-day trace their Christian life to the direct, or indirect, influence of the school. In Spain, as elsewhere, the children are used of God to take into the home truths that are inculcated in the school.

Work in Spain has its own difficulties, and one of these relates to the following up of school training and discipline. A serious disability under which young people labour in Spain arises from the long hours of labour; hence, when boys and girls leave school, they are out of the reach of friends and teachers to a degree quite unknown in England. Much wisdom and patience are required to conserve in some measure the fruit of years of teaching.

Mr. Faithfull has laboured in Spain under varied conditions. After the revolution, there was a fulness of liberty that is no longer enjoyed. The doors were wide open in a sense not known to-day. With the return of the monarchy came restrictions of one kind or another; but there is yet liberty to preach the Gospel within four walls on due notice to the authorities, and likewise complete freedom in instructing the children in day and Sunday schools, and to preach on the occasion of interments in the open cemetery. Moreover, with discretion, a large amount of work may be done by itinerant effort, as is obvious from the operations of the colporteurs and agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Religious Tract Society. The years have witnessed a striking multiplication of evangelical workers in the country. From a mere handful in 1870, there is now a little army of men and women preachers and teachers in various parts.

In 1876, Mr. Faithfull issued an evangelical hymn-book, in which many of the familiar pieces in "Sacred Songs and Solos" appear in a Spanish dress. This book is about to appear in its sixth edition, involving an outlay of £100. It has not only served the majority of the evangelical congregations in Spain, but it has gone to South America and Mexico, and has proved of wide-spread blessing.

Our friend has had true and loyal helpers in his work. Miss Gieser has for sixteen years rendered grand service in evangelistic efforts amongst the women. He hopes, in the near future, to have the co-operation of more brethren and sisters from the home land; and, among other agencies which he would like soon to add to the mission, is that which has been so serviceable elsewhere—a medical dispensary.

The need of the sick poor of Madrid lies as a heavy burden upon the pastor's heart. It has long exercised him. There is an opening for a small cottage-hospital, combined with a medical mission. Were the means forthcoming to found this, a fully qualified practitioner, acquainted with Spanish, and having an intimate knowledge of mission work, is prepared to go forth and assume direction of the much-needed medical agency.

The greatness of present opportunity emphasizes the importance of this offer. Spain is a land of opportunity to-day; and, in the course of a recent conversation, Mr. Faithfull expressed himself as decidedly hopeful with regard to the immediate future. He believes that there are in Spain many true believers who are not connected with the churches. But for the restricted liberty, these would more generally declare themselves. In 1873, when freedom was greater, Mr. Faithfull preached for several consecutive Sundays in the Royal Gardens; to-day open-air preaching is not allowed. Should there be an extension of liberty in this direction, there would certainly be greater boldness on the part of the people, and doubtless Gospel workers would witness a wave of blessing that would astonish many, though it would be the proper and reasonable result of the faithful and widespread proclamation of God's Word among the people.

Mr. Faithfull has been in England telling the deeply interesting story of his mission, but has now returned to Madrid. We trust many more years of testimony lie before him. Communications may be addressed to Mr. Faithfull, at Pasco de Areneros 6 prol, Madrid.

"Unspeakable!"

IN 2 Cor. xii. 4, Paul tells us that he knew a man in Christ, doubtless himself, who was caught up into Paradise and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter. The word translated "lawful," appears to waver between the A.V. and the marginal reading, "possible." Whatever that experience of the Apostle's may have been, there is the suggestion that it was beyond his powers of expression.

Very seldom can we express our deepest feelings. Our words fall short when we try to tell our greatest experiences, whether of joy or sorrow. We use many adjectives, but we fail to utter the unutterable. Paul could talk and write; his letters show us how convincingly. His pen was tipped with fire, and his words were as light; but even he reached a point beyond which he could not pass. He might see wondrous sights, but he could not paint the picture for other eyes: he could listen to unutterable words, but could not repeat them.

If we meet a man who can tell all he has heard, we think he has not heard very much. And if we sometimes find one who is not willing that even Paul should outstrip him, and almost claims to have been caught up—not into the third heaven, perhaps, but the second—and then comes to tell all about it, as though it were the veriest commonplace, his testimony is received with caution. It is with bated breath that men speak of these deep things; if the height of our speech be the measure of the depth of our experience, then our experience must be shallow indeed.

So, too, is it in sorrow. It would appear as though the Lord Jesus Himself was once unable to tell, even to his Father, all that was passing within his own heart. He had entered upon the last stage of the struggle, and the Cross stood outlined for Him in all its horror. "'Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say—Father, save Me from this hour'? Oh, I may not, I cannot say that! 'For this cause came I unto this hour.'" What shall I say? What shall I say? And the agony that throbs in that broken-hearted sentence is resolved into the trust of the one which follows, "Father, glorify thy Name."

Are any of us ever in such a case with trouble so heavy that it strangles utterance? "What shall I say?" Say? It were well if we could exclaim, "Father, glorify thy Name." No need to search for words in such a time as this. We need not stay to put our prayer together. God will piece our longings and our tears and our sobs together, and they shall be more expressive than any words can be. He waits not till the prayer rises to our lips, but He sees it as it struggles for utterance in our bursting heart. There is ofttimes more eloquence in a groan than in a long-drawn speech.

The Christian's experience is not to be translated so much by words as by life. If one says he has been to heaven, time will prove it: he will have brought a little of heaven back with him. Something of the light that flashes from the throne will light up his countenance, as the face of Moses was aglow with a light not of earth, when he came down from the mount of communion.

How has God expressed Himself? In words? In a sense, yes. But there was more in his heart than could be told in words. "God, having of old spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son." It is in an act that the heart of God has been revealed—viz., the gift of his Son, the Word of God (John i. 1). God's love was not capable of an adequate expression, except in sacrifice.

How much did God love? Calvary's Cross, standing there in all its awful grandeur, is the eloquent answer. How much do we love? Is there a mound anywhere in our own life upon which we have erected an altar of sacrifice? If so, it is there that the proof of our devotion shall be found. In proportion as we appropriate God's "unspeakable gift" (2 Cor. ix. 15) will our souls be filled with "unspeakable joy" (1 Pet. i. 8).

Movement in Austria.

A LETTER from Styria describes the "Los von Rom" movement. In opposition to the view propagated by the Roman Catholic press, that the movement is principally national and political, we are told that nine-tenths of the German population have unquestionably broken with the Roman Catholic Church. The behaviour of the Romish clergy estranges many, and the ways of Protestant citizens and their pastors appear more and more in a light worthy of imitation. Here and there, too, people have met with a Bible. Also it has not been forgotten that the country once was principally Protestant, and that their ancestors were made Roman Catholics by force.

The real origin of this movement is the pressure which was brought to bear upon the people last year by the Roman clergy when they made a treaty with the Slovenes. The enmity to which those are exposed, who have declared their conversion to Protestanism, is the most distinct proof of the religious earnestness of such as have been caught up by this movement. This is how the work has gone on. A man of note in Stainz, a little town entirely Roman Catholic, along with his wife and five children, made up their minds, to join the Protestants, and announced this intention to the Romish Church. The man afterwards asked the clergyman of the nearest Protestant parish to give a lecture in his house on the difference between the Roman and Protestant Churches, and many townspeople and peasants came,

SOME BEING TOUCHED TO TEARS.

At the end of the lecture, another family, composed of three people and a single young man, also declared themselves willing to leave Rome. In the afternoon of the same day, at a special service, these people were solemnly received into the Protestant Church. As a consequence of this, the head of the family just mentioned, a shopkeeper, received an anonymous letter, in which he was requested to give immediate notice to his landlord, or the ruin of his business would follow.

Nevertheless, a second Protestant service soon took place, at which more than seventy persons, among them many peasants, were present, although their priests, speaking from the pulpit, had threatened them with excommunication, because this was "a meeting of the anti-Christ!" A threatening letter was also sent to the landlord; and, in abusive language, the demolishing of his house and ruin of his business were predicted. The religious service, however, was uninterrupted, and, at the end, two other persons declared themselves convinced.

All attempts to hire a hall for regular services have, up to now, been fruitless; consequently, the little band of newly-converted Protestants, intend to build a chapel of their own. In a similar manner the power of the Gospel is showing itself in other parts of Styria, but that the "ancient prince of hell," of whom Luther sang, is still busy in endeavours to suppress the truth, is proved by the fact that, between four and eight in the morning, the police entered the houses of those peasants on whom suspicion had been cast by the priests, and searched for Protestant books and papers.

How thankful we ought to be that we live in a country where all enjoy religious liberty, and how we ought to watch that the enemy does not deprive us of it. History teaches us that even the Protestant Church may become and a persecutor of the true disciples of Jesus. Not far from here, at the beginning of the year, such an attack was made from the pulpit on a small band of earnest Christians (at O'Tura), who met a few times a week in a private house for reading the Scriptures and prayer. A rough mob thought to gain favour by smashing their windows. In another village, not far from the last-named, you may be shown the wall of a room damaged by a stone, which passed the head of a child which was present, when Bible-loving Christians were gathered together.

Thus we have much cause not only to watch, but also to pray that the Lord may establish his kingdom, and may fill with his Holy Spirit us and those brethren in Styria who are battling for the truth which maketh free. He, too, will surely create in the hearts of believers the desire to assist brethren who want to build halls and chapels in a land where, after an interruption of 300 years, they may again worship God with regularity, as did their Protestant forefathers. Sorrows of Moorish Prisoners.

WRITING from Rabat, Dr. Robert Kerr, of the Central Morocco Medical Mission, says:—

In close proximity to the Mission House we have some 150 huts, or semi-tents, in which the wives and children of the poor prisoners live. We have been able to do a good deal for them, and also to bring health and gladness to their husbands and sons, who are in prison. Of 1,000 prisoners which were brought to Rabat, over 500 have died from the insanitary condition of the prisons, and from ill-treatment and want of proper food and clothing. In fact, it has been one continual wail and lament since they came.

I wish my readers saw these poor mothers and their children. One day, as I went past this temporary village, I sat down by the side of a poor woman, who was crying and tearing the skin off her face. I asked her why she was crying. "I have buried my father, my brother, my husband; and now

MY ONLY SON HAS DIED.

That is why I weep." Being overcome with grief, she began to cry, "My son, my son, my only son, what have you done that you should have died in a prison? You were always a good boy. You never cut the way (not a highwayman). You were the son of the mosque. You listened to the instruction of your teacher. You were a son of the tents, O my boy, the light of my eyes, the idol of my heart, the hope of my old age; but now you are gone! Oh, how cruel the destinies of fate, which prevented me from giving you one last embrace (the prisoners' friends are not permitted to see them when dying)! I have nothing now to live for! Oh, when shall we meet again?" Then, again tearing her face, and beating her head with a stone, "Allah, Allah, let me die! Curse them, curse them, O Lord, and their children, who have brought this calamity on us!"

I have often shed tears with them. How sad their lot is. Mohammedans have no physicians and tender-hearted nurses to care for their suffering and dying, and no messenger of peace to point the poor dying prisoners to Jesus, a Saviour and Friend. The winter will soon be upon us, and the mothers and children of the prisoners are almost naked, and any remnants of cotton or prints, to make garments, would be most gratefully received by our Hon. Secretary, 191, Meadow Park Street, Dennistoun, Glasgow.

Work in Paris.—The Paris City Mission this year celebrates its nineteenth anniversary. The Mission is independent and interdenominational, is founded on the model of the London City Mission, but adapted to the wants of Paris. The society now employs twelve missionaries, and is seeking an agent for the McCall Mission and the Paris Exposition of 1900, when special arrangements will be made for the preaching of the Gospel. The society has succeeded in obtaining the services of a converted Roman Catholic priest, and this is a great help to the work, as he has more influence over the people than a Protestant pastor or teacher. Many encouraging testimonies are given of the changed lives and characters of the people visited and the gratitude evinced; but not until the secrets of all hearts are revealed will the blessing accruing from this work be fully known. More support is needed to enable the society to carry on and to enlarge the scope of its usefulness. Reports and further information will be gladly given by Mr. W. J. Lockie, of 21, Ballater Road, Brixton.

In Turkish Prisons.

I HAVE received a letter from the remote east of Asia Minor, which in transit has evidently fallen into water, as some lines are quite washed out. A portion of it pleads for ten of the Lord's prisoners in the following doleful narrative. None of the proper names dare be given, but our correspondent is absolutely reliable:—

"We can in these days feel sure of nothing in these parts, save only evil, and that continually. Those arrested in connection with the complaint against me are still in prison; there are eight of them, and we are spending some 500 pias per month on their food and dress, and service in getting their food to them, washing and mending their clothes, &c. This makes a drain on us, and we do not know how much longer it may continue, as the local authorities have received orders to delay the investigation of all political offences. This means indefinite imprisonment, with no opportunity to prove innocence of the charges brought against these poor unoffending brethren.

"Our hearts and hands are burdened with their sad imprisonment, and all our efforts for the completion of their case in the Court of Appeal at Constantinople, whither the papers of their case have been sent, have so far been without result. There are two other excellent brethren from the —— church, in prison at —— as suspects in connection with revolutionary plots, according to the statement of the Vali sent to Constantinople; but really only because they were house-fathers in the —— orphanage at ——, the director of which the Vali has been pleased to brand as a plotter and an unsafe man! 'We are perplexed, but not in despair; cast down, but not destroyed.'"

In Turkish prisons, innocent and guilty alike have to depend on their friends for the necessaries of life. Any help to relieve the long wintry gloom of their harsh and unjust imprisonment will be gladly forwarded to these ten poor prisoners, our brethren in Christ.

British Syrian Mission.

A COMPANY of sympathizing friends gathered in the Parlour, Exeter Hall, a few days ago, to bid God-speed to five ladies returning to their sphere of labour in the Holy Land. The chair was occupied by Lieut.-Col. Oldham, who observed that, since his own son had entered the foreign mission field, he had prayed very differently for missionaries, and he felt that such intercessory prayer was a great help in quickening one's own spiritual life. "It led us to seek that our own lives at home should be what we pray the lives of our missionaries may be abroad; and if this is not so, ours will not be prevailing prayer."

Mrs. Warren (Baalbec), Miss Werner (Beyrout), Misses Lord, Walker and Brown (Tyre) spoke briefly, each pleading for prayer for themselves and "the land," for, as one lady expressed it, "it is only by the indwelling power of Christ in his witnesses that the nominal Christians, the Moslems and the poor degraded Metualic, can be brought out of their superstitions, ignorance, and spiritual blindness into the true light." After fervent and sympathetic prayer on behalf of the outgoing missionaries and the whole field of labour, Rev. H. B. Macartney addressed the meeting. He said that he felt the work of this mission was real because it was spiritual, and it was specially interesting because of its locality. Damascus, one of the stations of the B.S.M., was the oldest city of the Bible. Syria had had seven governments—The Hittite, Semite, Assyrian, Babylonian, Grecian, Roman and now, alas, the Turkish, and the next power (the eighth) will be that of Jesus. The speaker mentioned the pressing need to increase the Society's income by £1,000 per annum. The motto of the Society is Jehovah Jireh—God is able to supply that £1,000, and as much more as may be needed.

Speaking of the difficulty in reaching the Mohammedans, Mr Macartney said: We reach Pagans, and hear of good work in Fiji and Uganda, but why is it so difficult to get at a Moslem? This reason has been given by someone—"The nearer you are to the exact truth apart from Christ, the harder it is for the work of true conversion." Mohammedans have a clear-as-crystal idea of one God. In this land of the Bible, Mohammedanism is at its worst, and Christianity is at its worst.

In conclusion, the speaker said that "when Jesus was on earth He was in Syria; He walked in Syria, and when He comes back again He will come to Syria. You missionaries are paving a way for the Lord Jesus to return, and to give Him a welcome."

Among the "Toughs" of Chicago.

PACIFIC Garden Mission is located in the heart of one of the principal thoroughfares of Chicago, where saloons, gambling houses, and dens of iniquity abound, and where the surging multitude are passing to and fro aimlessly, making it a most desirable place for reaching the masses. "Welcome," and "Hope for all who enter," are the mottoes that greet the passer-by, and many a weary pilgrim has found it a haven of rest.

Preceding the evening meetings, an outdoor service is held in summer in front of the Mission, where large numbers congregate; and the kind invitation to enter in finds a response in many a sad, discouraged heart.

The sceptic, who tried to find consolation in some scientific theory of an unknown God; the drunkard, who has resorted to every expedient; the thief, who has tried, by all the powers of his being, to be an honest man; the moralist, who soothes his conscience with the thought that his good deeds will avail with God—all find, when under the convicting power of God's Spirit, that nothing but the "atoning blood" of the Lord Jesus Christ can save from sin. Numbers have bowed at the altar during the past year, professing a changed life.

The meetings continue with unabated interest, as are heard every night. Every chair has a memorable history, sacred to some one. Colonel Clarke, the founder of the Mission, has gone to his reward, but the work is successfully carried on by his good wife. In the report just to hand, among many others of similar character is a letter from a young Englishman, now back in his native land, which tells its own story:

"After an absence of several years, my memory takes me back to the old mission, and my heart swells with gratitude as I recall the great change in my life. Though 4,000 miles separate us, I am happy to send my testimony that some other poor fellow may be encouraged.

"Thank God for the kind friends that lifted me out of the gutter and brought me to the mission; I was on my way to the lake to end my miserable life, when I heard of a Saviour that could save to the uttermost; and it was there that I was clothed and fed, and, as you Americans say, "fixed up."

"I am now at my old home, surrounded by those who love me, but the best friend of all is Jesus. I have often longed to see the dear old mission again, and my life-long prayer will be that heaven's richest blessing may attend the work and workers."

The Missions to Seamen Society has issued for 1900 an attractive "Churchman's Almanack" with daily lessons, and "Nautical Calendar," with blank "memoranda" page for every month. It has been edited by Rev. T. S. Hatfield, one of the Society's association secretaries, who has spared no pains in getting together a complete record of interesting facts connected with the sea, ships, and sailors. The "Nautical Calendar" is not merely a list of battles and wrecks; much research has resulted in the choice of anniversaries illustrating the wonderful growth of our maritime influence, and the close connection of sailors with the life of the nation, and the evangelization of the world. The Present State of South Africa.

THE daily papers have been full of the miseries that our fellow countrymen are undergoing in their departure from the Transvaal at this time, and we fear these accounts are only too true. As a Mission, we are anxious to do what we can to alleviate the suffering going on. May I, through the medium of your valuable paper, draw the attention of friends to the fact that we have opened a fund for the relief of those who are in distress, and that any funds sent to our care will be despatched to South Africa to be guardedly and carefully distributed amongst those who are in need?

This is, in a sense, a day of opportunity for the Gospel in South Africa, especially as regards the European population; and it will, of course, much strengthen the hands of our workers on the spot to be able to help in a material way whilst dealing with the people with regard to their souls' salvation.

I need hardly point out to our many friends that this will be a time of heavy extra expense to the Mission, as all manner of calls will assuredly be made on our present slender resources. We feel it is only right that those who are deeply interested in the work should be informed of our financial position. Friends sending funds to our care should kindly state clearly their wishes concerning their contributions; namely, what portion they are desirous should go to the "Relief Fund," and what for the "General Fund," of the South Africa General Mission. Among the Jews.

IN the Scattered Nation for October, Rev. C. A. Schönberger gives the following interesting account of the work being done in systematic Bible teaching by himself and his colleague, Rev. David Baron:—

The summer's work in the Mission-house closed at the end of July. It was especially arduous and trying this time on account of the long-continued and intense heat; but we held out and stuck to our task, though we had to perform it under conditions detrimental to our health. Truly, there is no power in the world which enables one to endure and to do cheerfully, under ever so trying circumstanees, what must and ought to be done, as the feeling of sacred duty stimulated by love to Him who loved us first.

The Saturday public meetings and the daily Bible-readings had to be held, during June and July, in a temperature so stifling and exhausting, that we sometimes felt as if we could not continue any longer. But we held out; and, when at last we did close the mission-house for the month of August, we had the greater satisfaction in the prospect of a short rest from the thought that the work had proceeded unbroken to the end.

I was especially anxious to continue with the daily Bible-readings; first, because the people came and manifested the greatest interest, in spite of the heat; and, then, because I did not want to close our working year, which is from September to the end of July, without finishing the exposition of the Book of Isaiah, especially as there were only a few chapters to the end.

At last, a few days before the end of July, I finished, by God's help, with the sixty-sixth chapter of that wonderful book, after a two years' course of readings on Isaiah.

These connected and systematic readings of entire books of the sacred volume have proved a great blessing to hearers and workers alike.

To many Jews these Bible-readings, and especially the readings in Isaiah, have proved quite a "revelation." The Bible has become to them a "new" and a "living" book, having truly the Christ of God for its centre and end. During the last few months a very educated Hungarian Jew has regularly attended these meetings, and has again and again expressed himself to this effect; and, though not yet in Christ, he has unceasingly spoken of Christ and the truth of the Bible to his brethren. It was quite remarkable to hear this man speak of the effect the Bible-readings have had on his mind; and he, as well as others, were rather sad when, at the end of July, these useful and beloved meetings were suspended for a time."

The Indian Famine.

IN a recent letter, Dr. Colin Valentine, of the Agra Medical Missionary Training Institution, writes that he has received the following information from missionaries:—In every part of the Punjab where there are no canals the greatest distress prevails. Cattle are dying in hundreds. In the Central Provinces the grain is higher in price than at any time during the last famine. In Mairwarra, 40,000 out of the 100,000 population are on famine relief works. In other parts of Rajputana the people are leaving the villages by thousands. In Gujerat cattle are being sold at a rupee a head, and children for less. On Sabbath last, continues Dr. Valentine, we had 876 starving creatures at our Beggars' Church, Agra.

The Pioneer states that the number of persons in receipt of relief during a recent week was 107,992; that being more than double the figure for the previous week, when the total was 48,652. The figures for Rajputana jumped from 21,664 to 48,949, there were 25,500 on test works in the Punjab, and 22,177 on test and relief works in Bombay. The Central Provinces granted gratuitous relief to 9,205 persons, and there were 2,161 on test works in Berar.

The situation in Kathiawar is becoming more critical every day. The desertion of children, and murders, and dacoities are committed for but trifling gain. It is reported from Jamnagar that a Kunbi left his three young children on the banks of the river, and they are now in the possession of the police. A raid was made on Khambhalia village, Ambardi, and food obtained. Besides food and fodder, money is getting rare. In the market at Jamnagar hundi rates of currency are koris 464½ per Rs.100, with a possible rise up to koris 475 and above.

A Heart's Yearnings.

"Lord, all my desire is before Thee." (Psa. xxxviii. 9.) "He shall give thee the desires of thy heart." (Psa. xxxvii. 4.)

MASTER, my heart is out of tune,
A poor, discordant thing;
With chords that will not chime aright,
And notes that falsely ring;
With many a harsh and jarring tone,
And many a broken string.

Master, my will is out of joint,
A feeble, fluttering thing;
It cannot reach the azure heights
Of thy sweet will, my King;
But, striving, falleth evermore,
Like bird with broken wing.

Master, my life is out of touch
With Thee—the Risen One.
A streamlet—severed from the sea—
It floweth sadly on.
No tide of Resurrection Life
Flooding its waters lone.

Master, I kneel before thy feet,
With empty heart and hand—
Save for this fire of longing, Lord—
Which Thou hast lit and fanned.
I have scarce words to tell it Thee,
But Thou wilt understand.

To thine own Golden Keynote, Lord,
Tune Thou this heart of mine;
And shape my will's poor wavering flight,
Till it is one with thine;
And dwell within me, till I reach
The Father's House Divine.

Protestant Federation.

THIS Federation makes encouraging progress. Twenty-one societies are now affiliated, for united political action, and energetic men are pushing the movement throughout the United Kingdom. In view of the near approach of the general election, the Federation is working to combine for united action the whole of the Protestant forces of the three kingdoms.

As an example of the manner in which the work is being carried on, it may be mentioned that, in six weeks, over six hundred of the electoral rolls of the Federation were issued to capable and persevering men, determined to push forward the movement to the utmost of their power, and the demand for rolls and literature for distribution is increasing every week. Each roll is for one hundred signatures, and we are informed that many of those sent out have already been filled up. The system of working is of the simplest character possible for efficient organization, and all unnecessary details are avoided.

In every place where the Federation has planted its banner, Evangelical clergymen and laity are cordially co-operating with their Free Church brethren, for the purpose of erecting a formidable barrier to the rapidly increasing encroachments of Rome upon the civil and religious liberties of British subjects. The local secretary of the Federation in Southport has, during the short time he has been at work, done much to consolidate the Protestant party in the constituency; and, as a result of his efforts, an influential meeting of Protestant ministers and laymen of all denominations was recently held, when a district council of the Federation was formed for the purpose of still further federating and uniting the whole of the Protestant forces in the Southport division.

The Federation has issued a leaflet entitled, "How British Men and Women can Help to Return a Powerful Protestant Party to the next Parliament." Copies of this useful paper, together with other literature and electoral rolls, will be sent, free of charge, on application to the secretary, Edward H. Garbett, Imperial Protestant Federation, 3, Palmer Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W.

The Bible League.

MAY we, through your columns, call attention to the present position of the Bible League, formed to promote the reverential study of the sacred Scriptures, and to resist the many attacks made upon their plenary inspiration and Divine authority?

During the past years of its existence the League has done good service, and covered a wide area by its testimony. During the past year alone it has held ninety-seven meetings in forty-four distinct places, among the rest at Manchester, Birmingham, Sunderland, Newport, Dover, Tunbridge Wells, as also in Glasgow, Dundee, and Perth. Never has it had more open doors, or never was there more manifest need for its efforts, than at the present time; but, for lack of funds, it is restricted in its operations, and unable to respond to many calls for its interposition and aid. It is perfectly unsectarian in its aims, working in harmony with all who share its concern for the faith as it has been "once for all delivered to the saints."

In addition to Conferences and meetings in the provinces, we are hoping to arrange a series of sermons and lectures during November and December, to be conducted in London by Rev. John Urquhart, whose labours in this field are well-known, as well as others by Rev. John Tuckwell, our former hon. sec. The work of the League is so definite, and so contrary to the spirit of the age, that it cannot be popular or command widespread support even in the churches of to-day. Its appeal is to those who still "hold fast the form of sound words," to whom the Word of God is precious in its entirety, and in whose esteem the maintenance of its infallibility and supreme authority is a matter of vital importance.

We earnestly ask such to consider its claims, and to lend their aid just now, when its needs and opportunities press urgently on the Council for further action and wider effort. Information will be gladly afforded on application to the office, 186, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.; and donations or subscriptions on its behalf will be thankfully acknowledged by Lieut.-Col. Corrie Smith, hon. treasurer, the Embankment, Bedford.

"Over Against the Treasury."

(Mark xii. 41-44. Luke xxi. 1-4).

In the Bristol Orphan Houses Report for 1899 (page 19), Mr. Wright says, "He who still 'sits over against the treasury' 'beholds' these gifts, and estimates them at their true value."

"Over against the treasury,"
The Master sat down to rest;
He noticed the many givers,
And He noticed who gave best.
Those who were proud and pompous gave
With noise and glitter and show,
With an air of ostentation,
Wishing all the world to know.

But one who was poor and humble,
(Yet with heart so full of love,
She couldn't refrain from bringing
Some gift to the God above;)
Had but tiny coins to offer,
And though but an offering small,
It was the whole of her living,
And she gladly gave it all.

No other gift was so noble,
No self-denial so great;
Hear Christ's commendation falling
Where men least anticipate:
"She hath cast in more than they all,"
Hear the Master kindly say;
Therefore her "mites" are remembered,
And shine before us to-day.

"Over against the treasury,"
The Master is sitting, still,
Beholding, blessing all who give
In accordance with his will.
He sees those who sound a trumpet
And hope to be praised of men,
And those who wish the coins they gave
Were back in their purse again.

He sees who—to ease their conscience—
Give only because they ought;
All these find his commendation
Can not with such gifts be bought.
For He just looks at the motive (Prov. xvi. 2),
And He weighs each gift apart;
He knows what is in each pocket,
He knows what is in each heart.

All the silver and gold are his,
All treasures in earth and heaven;
He wants nought from us but love-gifts,
But He prizes them when given.
Acts of loving self-denial,
Of "doing without" for Him,
Are gilded by Him with radiance
Such as time can never dim.
And though not able to offer
As much as we gladly would;
We are blest, if the Master whisper,
"They have given the best they could."

Protestant Lantern Lectures for Children. —In order to promote a more definite Protestant teaching among the children, a lantern lecture, on the life of Luther, was recently held, charging 1d. and 2d. for admission. Day, Sunday, and private schools were invited, and the room was filled by over 350 children and young people, who spent a pleasant evening, and received good Protestant instruction. They were invited to send in essays upon the lecture, and nine prizes were offered by the local branch of the Church Association, under whose auspices the meeting was held, with the result that fifty-eight essays were received, and nine good Protestant books awarded to the successful competitors. This was done under the shadow of a Ritualistic church, where sacerdotalism is diligently taught, and where great efforts are made to win the children. After all expenses were paid, there was only a deficit of about 20s. Might not this example be followed in many other parishes during the winter months? Excellent slides can be obtained from the various Protestant Societies, and local friends will often give the prizes, or contribute towards the expenses.

International S.S. Lessons.

Psalms of Deliverance.—Psa. lxxxv. and cxxvi.

Golden Text.—Psa. cxxvi. 5.

Introductory.

RECALL the lesson of October 1, and question about the ancient Hebrew hymn-book. To-day we have two samples of the hymns; they express the feelings of the people as they returned from Babylon. Picture the large company as they approached Jerusalem. Psa. lxxxv. would be sung on the journey, so tedious and dangerous; yet so full of gladness, because they had left the land of their captivity. Psa. cxxvi. was one of the "Songs of Ascents," and is an outburst of praise and joy, hope and confidence.

Deliverance.

The whole history of God's people is one of continued deliverances. Question upon some of these. Examples: Noah (Gen. vi. 7, 8). Abraham (Gen. xxii. 11, 12). Israel (Ex. iii. 8). David (Ps. xxxiv. 4). Daniel (Dan. vi. 16-23). God knows how to deliver from every trouble and temptation (2 Pet. ii. 9, Col. i. 13; 1 Thes. i. 10; Gal. i. 4). It is a grand deliverance from the consequences of the past; from the trials of the present we need fear no future, for our God changes not (2 Cor. i. 10). Deliverance can be illustrated from every day life—from fire, by the fire escape; from shipwreck, by the lifeboat; from prison, by the Queen's pardon; from a mine, when accident has buried the men. General Napier delivering the English at Magdala from the cruel Theodore, and escorting the poor natives home, is a good illustration.

Psa. lxxxv.

This psalm was given to the chief musician to be set to music and sung in the temple service. "The sons of Korah" formed one of the choirs, named after Korah, David's chief singer.

Verses 1-3, are grateful praises and adoration to God for what He has done. Notice: Three names for sin; also in Psa. xxxii. 1, 2. Also how God forgives sin, He cancels it, takes it away, and covers it up, hides it for ever. "Forgives and Forgets." There are three names for forgiveness, here and in Psa. xxxii. also. (Let the scholars find these, explain the shades of difference, how they include everything; then compare with Col. ii. 13, 14.)

Verses 4-7. Prayer for more blessing, the restoration was only in part as yet, so much remained to be done in Jerusalem. The time of trouble had been so long, the people were still discouraged; so they prayed for new life to be put into their souls, for fresh salvation from the power of sin (Hab. iii. 2).

Verses 8-9. Listening for the answer (Hab. ii. 1). This is the right way to pray (Mark. ii. 24). Assurance of the answer, which will be peace, salvation and glory.

Verses 10-12. The blessings which follow God's salvation. Mercy, truth, righteousness, peace, plenty, prosperity, guidance. (All these may be explained and illustrated.)

Psa. cxxvi.

Verse 1. "Too good to be true." "It seems like a dream," we often say when some unexpected pleasure comes to us. Even so it seemed to the Jews, who really found themselves again in Jerusalem.

Verses 2, 3. They laughed and sang, and praised and prayed.

Verse 4. "Streams in the south," the land south of Judæa—hot and parched in summer, and then refreshed by the mountain torrents rushing down after the snow had melted.

Verse 5. Describe the toilsome work of the sowers in the east. Illustrate by the toil of school-days, the reaping in manhood. The toil of practising music, the enjoyment of producing true melody.

Practical Application.

1. Our greatest need is deliverance from sin. God has provided an all-powerful Deliverer.
2. Freedom from sin brings peace, assurance, right doing, &c.
3. The Old Testament story is full of lessons for Christians.
4. God forgives for Christ's sake, and He forgets all the sins He forgives.
5. Name some of the great things which God has done for us.
6. What and how are we sowing? What will our harvest be?
7. How much can God deliver me from? (See Ps. xxxiv. 4, 6, 19; Ps. xci. 3).
8. God does for us just as much as we trust Him to do (Matt. ix. 28).

The Church Congress.

[By Our Own Commissioner.]

THIRTY-EIGHT years ago the Church Congress held its first meeting in the dining hall of King's College, Cambridge—a room amply large enough for the number present. Last week the Congress met in the Royal Albert Hall, London, which has accommodation for 8,000 sitters, and not only was every seat taken, but numbers were refused. If we add to these 8,000, the 35,000 tickets distributed for the mass and women's meetings, we have a Church Congress meeting unparalleled in numbers. Indeed, the sight of that magnificent hall, filled as it was for the President's address and the solemn recitation of the Creed from 8,000 tongues as from one man, must have struck anyone as deeply impressive. So far as numbers were concerned, the policy of holding the Congress in London, a policy widely prophesied as mistaken, was a decided success.

Before considering the papers read, let us spend a moment over the general impressions which this year's meeting must have left with an outsider. As far as I could learn, they were twofold. First, that all the papers read were characterized by a higher and broader tone, and by a deeper spirit of moderation and of brotherly love than has sometimes been the case. The note struck by the Archbishop of Canterbury in his sermon on the opening day, when he pleaded for greater toleration, "we are bound always to look upon all other men as truly and conscientiously endeavouring to do what they believe the Lord would have them do," rang out in clear and decided tones in the utterance of most of the speakers. This was emphasized by the splendid chairmanship of the Bishop of London, who kept his audience carefully in hand, and told them plainly what the world outside would say if they disgraced themselves by exhibition of party feeling.

The second impression afforded by the week's gatherings was not one for which we may be thankful, as we assuredly must be for the first. While the readers and speakers displayed this feeling of toleration, taken as a whole body, the Congress showed distinctly that its feeling was for increasingly advanced Churchmanship. The heart of the Congress, it was perfectly evident, was with those speakers who represented the "High Church" section. Of course, it may be true that the Congress does not represent the general feeling of the Church of England—that the High Church party attend congresses more than the Low Church section—and that, accordingly, one has no right to any such deduction. But certainly the sight of that vast audience, showing by its applause and by its actions (the majority crossed themselves at the Creed) wherein lay its preference, was food for serious reflection.

Let us pass to the daily proceedings of the week. On Tuesday morning three Congress sermons were preached. The Archbishop of Canterbury delivered a powerful address to a crowded congregation in St. Paul's, from St. John xvi. 11. "That they may be one, as we are," was the burden of his theme. Dr. Temple pleaded passionately for unity, for peace within the Church. It was impossible not to see how damaged the Christian cause. Instead of preaching the Gospel, men waste time in disputes. The real binding power that would draw men together was to live in closer touch with Christ, and then to cultivate more charity between man and man, and a greater mutual trust.

In Westminster Abbey, the Dean of Christchurch preached from the words: "My kingdom is not of this world." He showed how failure had always arisen when the Church stooped to follow the methods of the world. Her great work is to make clear and real the true character of the Church of England as a branch of the Catholic Church, whose kingdom was not of this world. For what unworldliness is, the preacher quoted Dr. Dale's unfinished sentence—"Unworldliness does not consist in the most rigid and conscientious observance of any external rules of conduct . . . but in the habit of living in constant fellowship with Him. . . . .

Speaking in Kensington Parish Church from "Lo, I am with you alway," the Bishop of Peterborough pointed out how Christ pervades all things, and contended that the Church should be the home of the nation's righteousness, and enter more and more into the nation's life.

In the afternoon the Bishop of London delivered his presidential address, which was remarkable in many respects. He sketched the part played by the Church in the development of civilization, and contended that she must be the chief agent in spreading that civilization in other lands. If the Bishop meant, as he surely must have done, not only the Anglican communion, but the various Christian denominations outside—if he meant by the Church we must heartily agree with him; and also in what he had to say with regard to the Church of England when, in depicting what it might do and be in its ideal form, he added, "Its eyes are turned to the past for instruction and warning, not for imitation." "Not for imitation"—a contrast this with the utterances of Lord Halifax in his paper on Ritual, when he depicted the Middle Ages as the ideal ages of Church Ritual, and advocated return to them in this particular.

In closing, the president spoke words which many present might well lay to heart. "Our difficulties and differences arise because we have not a sufficiently lofty conception of the destiny of the English Church. . . . if any disaster befalls it, the record that will be written will be that English Churchmen of this day were not sufficiently large-hearted and high-minded to recognize the greatness of their heritage."

In the evening the discussion was on the place and work of the laity in the Church. That laymen should be entrusted with more responsibility in the government of the Church, should help more in their services and in the election of incumbents, found advocates in two speakers of opposite sections, the Dean of Norwich and Canon Gore. The Dean reviewed Scripture teaching and early Church history; and held, among other things, that in primitive times the laity had a voice in the selection of the ministry, in the promulgation of the message, in guarding the purity of doctrine, and in ensuring innocency of life. Their rights were elective, evangelistic, conciliar, and disciplinary. These rights were theirs, not only as individuals endowed with spiritual life enrolled amongst the baptized, and members of the supernatural society, but they were theirs, as related to each other, to the whole body, and to its mission.

THE ABSENCE OF LAITY

from its vital movements is like the loss of limbs, hands, arms, ears to an individual. Such a body might live, but some of its muscles will be developed to distortion; work will be curtailed and imperfect, and normal powers will shrivel and die. So the exclusion of the laity from the corporate life of the Church, in her parochial, diocesan, and provincial centres, develops the muscles of clerical autocracy, contracts forces which might otherwise operate in ever-expanding fields, and dwarfs the life for which souls and bodies are by the million yearning.

Wednesday was given up to the Church and missions, and to the Church and Modern Society. Bishop Barry spoke on the "Daughter Churches" of the Colonies as evangelizing centres. Bishop Johnson, from India, pleaded for Christian brotherhoods to help in the evangelization of our great Eastern Dependency, and pointed out the difficulties that beset mission work in that country. Sir John Kennaway spoke of the need of a medical mission at Khartoum; and then Rev. E. A. Stuart delivered a stirring address on missionary expansion.

In the afternoon the sins of society were dealt with, and wise words were spoken with regard to the growing subservience to wealth, and the Church's duty to arrest it. Archdeacon Diggle spoke on speculation and gambling, defining the speculator as "one who betrays the innocent and beggars the innocent when he fails. When he is successful he is a curse to himself, and a scourge to humanity." Speaking of legitimate speculation, the Archdeacon suggested that it submitted to no uncertainty except such as was inevitable; it courted no risk; it could pay for what it bought, and had a well-grounded hope that at the appointed time it could deliver what it sold. It kept well within its means, and its gains, instead of involving another's loss, were intended to flow from the facilitation and expansion of trade, or the success of some beneficent enterprise. On the other hand, the gains of illegitimate speculation were won by other's losses, and the effects even upon man himself were deplorable.

GAMBLING WAS BAD, and he would shun every suspicion of it; and in this connection he roundly denounced raffling at church or charity bazaars.

Mr. George Livesey opened the debate on Sunday Rest, pointing out that not commerce, but society was chiefly to blame in this respect. He believed that Sunday labour in industrial employment is steadily lessening, but that pleasure-seeking was rapidly increasing. Rev. H. Stevens staunchly defended a Puritan Sunday, and assailed the Sunday concerts of the Crystal Palace for "their daring and open competition with churches and chapels." At night various meetings were held, among them notably a mass meeting for men with a splendid attendance, when Sir Edward Clarke, M.P., Dr. Temple, and others spoke, and a meeting in the Imperial Institute to consider the Church's action with regard to purity and temperance. All the speakers at this meeting emphasized the need of parental training, and of quiet individual labour in these matters. The Bishop of Hereford hoped to see grocers' licences, "one of the pests of modern society," swept away, and was glad to see a general feeling towards Sunday Closing.

The burning questions of the Church were reserved for Thursday, when in the morning the relation of the Church to Nonconformity, and in the afternoon the ritual question, were discussed. Dr. Wace sketched the amazing in numbers, influence, and power. In the Anglican Church all over the world there were 3,500,000 communicants, while the number of members of the Protestant bodies amounted to 17 millions! Church Sunday school teachers numbered 206,271, while Free Church teachers were 381,153. Church Sunday scholars numbered 2,410,209, and in the Free Churches 3,284,963. These figures, said Dr. Wace, ought to impress on us the immense personal and religious force now possessed by the Free Churches. He went on to pay a high tribute to the "noble catechism" issued by these churches, which bound them together as one body, and which represented the beliefs of 60 millions of Christians. This union among the Free Churches, he believed, was one step towards union or co-operation, sometime, with the Church of England, since the catechism recently drawn up was a common statement of elementary Christian faith.

Dean Farrar followed with an eloquent plea for greater co-operation with Nonconformists, remarking that they must not fight with one another, or about lights, incense, and vestments, but all fight together "in the great battle between atheism and Christianity, materialism and spirituality." The morning's papers, taken as a whole, certainly suggested the thought—why should there not be held, in the near future, a conference, representative of all Christian denominations, for their better mutual understanding on the fundamental points of faith? This rather than the plan proposed by the Dean of Ripon during the discussion, that Nonconformists should occasionally be asked to Church Congresses to speak from their point of view.

For the discussion on ritual the hall was crowded, and Lord Halifax received a perfect ovation from his followers. His speech was a good one from his point of view, full of restrained emotion and earnestness. But he had little new to say. He declared that to employ ritual to impress the senses was a device unworthy of Christianity; its end and purpose was to give corporate expression to the faith and devotion of Christians.

THE CAUSE OF PROTESTANTISM was well championed by Prebendary Webb-Peploe who made a vigorous speech against the reintroduction of the "rusty tools of Romanism," and declared that the Church could no more admit these superstitious observances than she could the fetish worship of African barbarians. A National Church, he said, should, of course, be comprehensive and tolerant; but the Anglican Church can no more "comprehend" the Roman doctrines and practices of the Mass than she could admit into her sanctuaries the fetish worship of the barbarian of Africa, or the standard of Mohammed, the False Prophet of Arabia! To every loyal son and daughter of the Anglican Church "the offering of Christ, once made, is so perfect a redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual, that the sacrifices of Masses, in which it is commonly said that the priest doth offer Christ for the quick and the dead to have remission of pain and guilt, are blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits;" and no ornament, rite, or ceremony should be adopted in Anglican Churches which tends in any way to teach that in the Holy Communion there is, or can be, any sacrifice for sins.

When we say that liberty must always be subject to law, and that this is the real limitation to which all Christians must submit, we, of course, include Acts of Parliament, or the law of the land, by which every citizen (Christian or otherwise) is absolutely bound; yet would we far rather (if it were possible) turn altogether from the idea of compulsion, and press chiefly (if not only) for attention to that of which the prophet Malachi speaks as found "in the mouth" of every true priest and Levite (Mal. ii. 6), and which, if it does not affect the lay members of the Church, yet assuredly binds every ordained minister of that Church to teach and exhibit no other doctrine or practice but such as are found in God's Holy Word, or are in strict accordance with the teachings and formularies of our Church as exhibited in her Service Book and her Articles of Religion!

The last morning was spent, as is usual, in a devotional meeting, described, by the Bishop of London, as one "for the deepening of the spiritual life." Papers were read on Experimental Religion, by the Bishop of Thetford, Canon Newbolt, Dr. Ryle, and others. It was defined by Dr. Ryle, as "the daily purposeful life based on religious principle."

The last afternoon was given up to the Church's relations with such problems as the housing of the poor old-age pensions, conciliation in labour disputes, &c.; and papers were read showing the need for the Church to guide thought in these matters, and to be ever mindful that religion must enter closely into every department, and that she has a duty in moulding the national life, while at the same time she steers clear of acting as "nurse" to men's minds, as in early ages she was forced to do. Space forbids any account of the special mass meetings—women's girls', men's meetings - that were held; but it is fair to say that hardly any class or subject seemed forgotten, so widely does the Congress interest itself in all sections of life.

The result cannot be tabulated. The Congress never passes any resolution, and is not a legislative body; but so large a gathering must have a far-reaching influence, not only because it brings men of all shades of thought together, but because it arouses a strong feeling of esprit de corps, and cheers isolated workers; and lastly, because the members return to their scattered homes to disseminate, perhaps unconsciously even, some of the lessons which such a Congress has to teach.

International Congregational Council.

[By Our Own Correspondent.]

INTENSE interest and considerable enthusiasm continue to characterize the Council meetings to the end. Saturday forenoon was given up to the consideration of the Church in social reforms; the speakers, Albert Spicer, M.P., London, England; and Professor Graham Taylor, of Chicago Theological Seminary, being specialists on this topic. Mr. Spicer told of the extensive use of hair-dyes, in the old land, by men who were apprehensive lest gray hair should prevent them from securing and maintaining employment; and earnestly called upon ministers, his fellow-employers, and the Press, to give due attention to social reform, which was one of the great calls of the age. Dr. Taylor, who is specially well-known because of his social settlement work, urged a truer recognition of God as the Father, and all men as brothers. The Church, it was contended, should be formative, rather than reformative.

On Sunday the pulpits in and about Boston were supplied by delegates to the Council. Monday was a SCHOOL AND COLLEGE DAY.

"The Influence of Public Schools on the Caste Spirit" was the subject of two addresses in the afternoon by Drs. Noble, of Chicago, and Bevan, of Australia. The latter speaker claimed for his land a national system equal to that of the United States; and in dealing with the threefold characteristic—free, compulsory, and secular—urged religious education as the one and only remedy for the abolition of caste. President Tucker, of Dartmouth College, gave the concluding address.

At the evening meeting, the speakers were four prominent educators of the United States, Drs. Hyde, of Bowdoin College; Slocum, of Colorado College; Hopkins, of Kansas City; and Eliot, of Harvard. President Hyde's topic was "The Education of a Minister," and, in the course of his address, he dealt with the call of God, mental drill, first-hand secular knowledge, and individual grasp of spiritual truth. The interest during this address was very marked, and reached its climax during the concluding address by President Eliot, which was an able and glowing tribute to the work of Congregationalism in matters of education.

On Tuesday morning, Rev. W. B. Selbie, M.A., of London, England, and Rev. Reuen Thomas, D.D., of Brookline, Massachusetts, delivered interesting addresses on

"THE PASTORAL FUNCTION."

Mr. Selbie pointed out that neither the preaching nor pastoral function could be exercised with success apart from the other, and placed strong emphasis on the importance of character, contact with men, and a ministry for the young. Dr. Thomas also urged the value of the pastoral office, which should be taken up reverently and advisedly, and with the firm resolve to guard and nourish the spiritual life of pastor and people.

The afternoon session was devoted to woman's work.

"The Young People" was the theme for the evening, the speakers being Revs. C. H. Patton, D.D., of St. Louis; C. E. Jefferson, D.D., of Brooklyn; and C. Silvester Horne, of London, England. The auditorium was densely packed, and the climax was reached at the conclusion of Mr. Horne's address, when, in an eloquent peroration, he predicted no limits to the influence of Young England and Young America.

On the second Wednesday of the Council, Rev. D. L. Ritchie, of Newcastle, read the paper by Mr. J. C. Rickett, M.P., of Scarborough, England, on "The Christian Idea of the State," and was followed by Mr. William Crosfield, of Liverpool, England, with a paper on "Municipal Government as a Sphere for the Christian Man."

Before the regular order of the afternoon, a strong resolution was passed thanking the missionaries for their great service in helping to restore peace in the Samoan Islands. Then came the great theme of the afternoon, "Congregationalism." Dr. Robert Bruce, of Huddersfield, England, told of its opportunities and obligations in Great Britain; Professor Williston Walker, of Hartford Seminary, dealt with the subject from an American standpoint; Rev. J. G. Halley represented Australia; Rev. Principal George spoke for Canada; and Scotland was then ably and well represented by Rev. James Stark, D.D., of Aberdeen.

The evening meeting was another memorable one, inasmuch as there was then represented the goodwill and sympathy of through distinguished representatives. The occasion was a reception and dinner in the Music Hall by the Congregational Club, when the president, Rev. A. H. Plumb, D.D., presided. After brief addresses by the chairman and Dr. Mackennal, Bishop Lawrence, Professor Peabody, and Presidents Warren, Strong, and Charles Cuthbert Hall tendered cordial greetings on behalf of their different denominations.

"Independence and Church Fellowship" was the morning theme of the second Thursday, and was treated by Dr. A. J. Lyman, of Brooklyn, and Dr. John Brown, of Bedford, England. The last speaker said that extremes either way worked evil. After enlarging on the fellowship of the early churches as shown by letters, meetings, and conferences, Dr. Brown strongly emphasized the fact that no church had a right to do as it liked in the great brotherhood of churches.

The first address of the afternoon was by Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, of London, England, whose subject was the "Adaptation of Methods to New Conditions in Foreign Missions." The opening up of the world, the influence of trade and commerce, the coming of students from foreign lands, and the better knowledge of pagan belief through access to the Koran and other books, were among the new conditions which, if rightly used, were evidences of a future bright with hope and promise. Rev. Principal Cave, of Hackney College, London, gave the second address, the title of which was

"THE LIVING CHRIST."

The cry, "Back to Christ," was combated by the speaker, who declared that Jesus is in all the social, intellectual, and religious movements of the day. Three aspects were then outlined, namely, the Christ of History, the Christ of Dogma, and the Christ of Experience. The last named was presented as the one with whom all thought and feeling and action must stand in living contact.

In the evening came the closing meeting of the Council. Long before the hour for opening, the aisles and halls were crowded by those who were glad to get standing-room to hear Rev. R. S. Storrs, D.D., of Brooklyn, the speaker of the evening. For over an hour the old man, eloquent, now nearly eighty years of age, perhaps lacking his by-gone physical force, but not his intellectual clearness and beauty of expression, spoke on a theme dear to his heart—"The Permanent Motive in Missionary Work." He grouped a number of reasons contributing to this permanent motive, and classed them as a recognition of the terrible evil and misery of mankind apart from Christ, their recoverableness in the face of all that is said to the contrary, the power of the Gospel of Christ to accomplish this, our adoring love for the Saviour, and the dispensation of the Holy Spirit. Very earnestly did the aged veteran of the Cross counsel his hearers to work while it was yet day; and, standing himself on the threshold of the heavenly world, pointed to the eternal rest that awaits the toiler in the Master's vineyard.

On Friday the delegates visited Plymouth and stood upon the rock where the pilgrims of the Mayflower landed in 1620; gazed upon the national monument raised to their memory, and celebrated the occasion with appropriate service.

The Council was undoubtedly a success in the highest sense of the word. There were present men of very diverging views; but all alike seemed actuated by the desire to do the will of God, and hasten the crowning day of the great King.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

MEETINGS FOR PRAYER AND CONSECRATION.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE opening of last week was marked by a manifest increase in the feeling of expectation throughout the city. The first week of gatherings for prayer and consecration had rather quickened, than satisfied, the desire of God's people for a large share in the blessing that was being poured out. The Saturday newspapers again showed, by the special subjects announced, how largely the Campaign was bulking in the minds of ministers and other speakers. There also appeared an unusual number of names, well known in evangelical circles, from other parts of the country. On the Sabbath afternoon, Rev. John McNeill was preaching in Cowcaddens Free Church—the scene of the labours of Rev. William Ross for the last seventeen years, which have been so signally owned of God—where he declared that the curse of the Campaign promised to be "the mixed multitude," who seem to be for God on the Sabbath, but live in Moab all the other days of the week.

Mr. Henry Varley spoke in the evening, in the great Tent Hall, to a crowded meeting, largely composed of people from the slums and poorest districts in the city. The last public prayer we heard for the day—in a little mission hall at the east end of the city—included a passionate cry for blessing on the meetings of the coming week, with a gratefully-worded thanksgiving for blessing received already.

From Monday onward, there were even larger attendances at the meetings than had been the case the previous week.

A COMPLETE CHANGE

was made in the centres of work. Instead of the afternoon gathering in St. Andrew's Hall, three meetings were held each day—West (in Kelvinside Free Church), East (Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church), and South (Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church); and thereby a large number were reached who are unable to attend in any central building. The evening meeting-places, in all the divisions of the city, were also changed, the following buildings being used daily from Monday till Friday:—

Whiteinch Free Church, Kelvinside Avenue Baptist Church, College Free Church, St. Paul's Parish Church, Garngad U.P. Church, Wellpark Free Church, Bridgeton Free Church, Govan U.P. Church, Eglinton Street U.P. Church, Augustine Free Church, Shawlands Free Church, Thursday, Trinity Episcopal Church, Keppochhill; Friday, Keppochhill Free Church.

MONDAY (October 9).

There was a good audience in Kelvinside Free Church in the afternoon, when the pastor (Rev. Walter Ross Taylor, D.D.) presided. Speaking on "Sanctifying the Lord in the Heart" (1 Peter iii, 15), Mr. George Clarke dealt faithfully with the manifest feebleness of many Christian lives, addressing himself specially to those who have an up-and-down experience. He said he looked back to the revival thirteen years ago with peculiar affection, because it was then he began the work for which he had since lived. Mistakes were made in ignorance; but it was a great revival, and he believed we were now at the beginning of another. Proceeding, he laid emphasis on the fact that while the Old Testament says God is "with us," "for us," and is our "Leader," from the New Testament we learn that He is "in us."

There was a large congregation in Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church, where Rev. Joseph Corbett, D.D., presided. The first speaker was Rev. W. D. Moffat (Edinburgh), who gave a deeply spiritual and helpful address on "The Lordship of Christ" (Rom. xiv. 9). Rev. John McNeill followed with an address, of which the text was 1 Sam. xvii. 1. After depicting the effects of discouragement in the life of David, he addressed himself to Christians who had passed into the same condition. Turning to the method and manner of David's recovery, he showed how the light of Christ's presence might be received through faith. "The terrible drawback in Glasgow is the lapsed people in the pews of the churches as well as in the slums." One of the worst things about discouragement, he thought, was that their joyless, dreary religion was turning away their sons and daughters from Jesus Christ; "and, after all, David did not perish by the hand of Saul."

The attendance in Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church was most encouraging. The minister (Rev. J. L. Murray) presided, and gave an impressive and instructive address on Galatians iv. 19. He ventured the opinion that weak men of God would not be of much use in the campaign, and he was not sure of the desirability of their endeavouring to take part in the work. He wondered to how many Christ had really been revealed. Referring to the fact that he had been preaching the Gospel for forty-seven years, and for twenty-seven years had pleasure in seeing a promising work in London, he said it was a real sorrow to witness the stumbling of so many who apparently ran. Yet he was not surprised that many who professed belief in Christ as their Saviour came to grief; they had not Christ rightly formed within; they had not made Him the Root. He pleaded earnestly with parents to see that their children, and especially young men, were duly impressed with the needs of their souls. "Dancing, billiards, good cigars, and social life, with all its gay attractiveness, will keep their hold until the young men know the power of the Son of God."

In St. Paul's Parish Church, Rev. James Paton presided, and a searching and stirring address was given by Rev. Gordon B. Watt (Kilmarnock), on "Hindrances and Helps to Fruit Bearing" (John xv.). He showed that is fruit—(1) fruit, (2) more fruit, (3) much fruit, (4) fruit that is to remain; and that fruit is not necessarily service, but is shown in character rather than in act. Among the hindrances, he enumerated: (1) Unbelief; (2) secret sins, such as jealousy or envy; (3) careless living—regarding reading, praying, conversation, or unwatchfulness; (4) failure to be active in service; (5) criticism of the Word. Turning to the spirit of fruitfulness, he said it was marked by (1) abiding day by day in Christ, (2) pruning—faithfully, (3) the hearing that carries the heard Word into daily life, (4) the hope set on Jesus, who is coming.

TUESDAY (October 10).

Lord Overtoun occupied the chair at the afternoon meeting in Kelvinside Free Church, and the address for the day was given by Rev. John McNeill. Having announced his text as 2 Samuel xxii. 1, 2, he spoke with hope and cheer regarding the prospects of the Evangelistic Campaign. They were, he said, going to begin all over again, as individuals and as churches, with Jesus Christ in the midst of them: to preach the Gospel all over again, to take nothing for granted, to begin at the beginning, and the beginning was repentance toward God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. They were not holding these meetings for consecration one day too soon. They were urgently needed, they were overwhelmingly justified by the state of things in the professing Christian Church, as well as in the world outside.

In Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church, Rev. John Gunson (Kingston parish) presided, Mr. Henry Varley being the speaker. Beginning at "The Transfiguration" (Matthew xvii.), he showed that salvation is not, and never can be, a reward. Work has to do with reward; but salvation always, and in every case, is purely and altogether a gift of God. After many years of careful study, and contact with hundreds of the most profound students of the Scriptures, he did not hesitate to say that we are close to the time of the manifestation of the kingdom of our Lord. This is called the Christian Era; but we might more properly call it the time of the rejection of the Son of God. The state of things leads men of God to the confident expectation of the return of our Lord, to deal with the frightful evils of war and immorality.

Rev. William Arnott presided over a goodly gathering in Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church. The first speaker was the Rev. John Young (Greenock). Taking as his subject "The Call for Rain by Elijah," he observed that at the present time, just as in the days of old, there is need of and of the Holy Spirit, in Scotland. There is a deep, growing, and abundant conviction that there are too many people outside, who are difficult to reach with the voice from Christ. He called on each Christian to consider, at the very outset of the Campaign, what he needs of revival in strong faith, love, and zeal for Christ's work. Mr. Young concluded by speaking a word of comfort and consolation to parents, regarding their children, asking them to put their trust in the Word of the Lord: "I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed." Mr. George Clarke followed with an address, in which he dealt with "The Decline of the Power of the Pulpit." In London, he believed that only one man in 800, and one woman in 500, could be said to be regular church-goers; and went on to give some statistics which he had received since coming to Glasgow. We are, therefore, face to face with the fact that, in ordinary circumstances, thousands of people cannot have the Gospel preached to them, because they will not go to the churches. Before closing Mr. Clarke spoke some weighty words on the dangers attached to careless dealing with anxious souls, and of lightly made professions of conversion.

In the evening Rev. David M. Macintyre (Finnieston Free Church) preached in St. Paul's Parish. His subject was, "God as a Consuming Fire" (Isa. x. 17); and he began by pointing out that in Scripture is Fire, while his supreme attribute is Holiness, and the word "holy" has a physical sense, signifying "burning." The symbol has three manifestations: (1) As a Sword. The glory of God appeared first in this world as a fiery sword, and the eternal holiness of God must smite us through and through. (2) As the Altar of Flame. This was the Shekinah, a picture of an eternal sacrifice. He showed how the Intercessor, who bore our sins in his own body, runs through Scripture, illustrating from Moses and Paul. Intercessory prayer is the highest energy of which the human soul is capable. There must be long agonies of prayer if souls are to be saved. (3) The Crown—at Pentecost. "There is a great deal in this gift of the Holy Ghost about which I cannot speak; but I am sure of one thing, that if we will wait before God in prayer, and get right with Him, He will give us the Holy Ghost. The great word is "Receive."

WEDNESDAY (October 11).

Rev. G. L. Carstairs (Berkeley Street U.P. Church) was chairman at the afternoon service in Kelvinside Free Church, when Rev. John Smith, D.D. (Edinburgh), gave the opening address, choosing as his subject "The Commanding of the Lord" (Judges iv. 6).

An address followed by Rev. T. D. Watt (Aberdeen). The speakers in Pollokshields United Presbyterian Church were Rev. Gordon B. Watt and Mr. George Clarke. Starting from Ephesians iii., 20, the former dwelt mainly on "The Power of the Spirit in the Christian Life," pointing out that our power for service must be in proportion to the power we allow Him to exercise in us.

Mr. Clarke referred to former great movements that began in Glasgow, and said that they stretched out till they touched the whole of Scotland; but he had been assured that, for the past few years, there had been such deadness and formality of religion in Scotland, that many were crying to God that there might, indeed, be a great revival now. Turning to Deut. xxxii. 34, he expressed his fear that "lots of young Christians in Glasgow are not going to engage in the movement, because they cannot understand certain doctrines that are professedly evangelistic, and are passing through that stage of doubt which comes to all young people of an inquiring turn of mind—the terrible time of

MYSTICISM AND MYSTERY.

If they would let God be their Teacher, He knows just how much to teach, and when to do it."

At Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church the first speaker was Rev. Robert Stevenson (Gargunnock), whose address was on the encouragements against weariness and fainting in the Christian way, to be found in a consideration of what Christ endured (Heb. xii. 3).

Following up the same train of thought, Rev. John McNeill pointed out the lessons to be learned from David's example in becoming weary and faint-hearted (1 Sam. xxvii. 1). that friend might have spoken a word for God. Before closing Mr. McNeill referred to those who encouraged doubt in their minds. He had no objection, he said, to honest doubt, but it is very scarce; while there is a great deal of dishonest doubting.

In the evening, an excellent gathering in Wellpark Free Church was addressed by Rev. Professor Denney D.D. After the reading of the fifth chapter of the Romans, he spoke on the five occurrences of "much more" (vv. 9, 10, 15, 17, 20). 1. In verses 9 and 10 the words refer to the surpassing greatness of the Atonement as compared with all the other works of God, and show the greatness of the foundation God had laid for our Christian life in the sacrifice of his Son. 2. In verses 15 and 17 the phrase contrasts the surpassing power of the Cross of Christ to save, with the power of evil, showing how supremely strong the Gospel is, and how far more sure it is to save than evil to destroy. 3. In verse 20 the reference is to the surpassing resource with which God encounters all the developments of sin, and shows that we are bound, when evil abounds, to be much more abundant in the courage and resource with which we may meet it.

THURSDAY, October 12.

There was a large audience in the afternoon at Kelvinside, when Rev. W. D. Moffat (Edinburgh) spoke from Psa. cxxxix. 23. Describing the verse as the prayer of a man who had already been "searched" by God, he said it also disclosed a marvellous vision of God, a profound sense of his omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience. The word "search" has a reference to the miner in search for gold; and, as the miner searches the earth, so God is looked upon as coming into the lives of his people to know and try them. The word is also used about a king searching for rebels. Mr. George Clarke also addressed the meeting.

Rev. Charles Richardson (Montrose Street E.U. Church) occupied the chair in Dennistoun, where the speakers were Revs. George Wilson (St. Michael's, Edinburgh) and T. D. Watt (Aberdeen). At the service in Pollokshields, addresses were given by Rev. Robert Stevenson (Gargunnock) and Mr. William Thomson, jun. There were also services in other churches.

FRIDAY.

The closing day of the time of preparation brought larger audiences than ever. In the afternoon, Rev. John McNeill was, in Kelvinside Free Church, speaking on the "Reappearance of the Lord" (John xx., xxi.). The meeting in Pollokshields was presided over by Rev. W. D. Moffat (Edinburgh), and the speaker was Mr. Henry Varley—subject, "Sin."

During the week in many of the churches, the special meetings were combined with services preparatory to Communion, and on Sabbath the Lord's Supper was generally observed throughout the city in the Presbyterian churches.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

In the choirs especially we observe striking evidence of the entire subordination of denominational differences.

The extensive use of churches, which would otherwise be standing closed, is giving much satisfaction all round.

Stormy weather again prevailed in the beginning of the week, but a favourable change came in the later days.

These consecration meetings have been marked by the large attendance of men and women in the full vigour of youth and maturity—those by whom hard work can be done.

Sir John Neilson Cuthbertson expressed, at the Scottish Sabbath School Union, the earnest hope of many for a revival of interest in work among children.

Rev. James Muir (Cowcaddens) was told by two men that they were converted at a preliminary campaign meeting in July.

Mr. William M. Oatts told in an interesting way last week, to Finnieston Free Church congregation, the story of his own conversion.

Mr. David Rea's great Irish tent—capable of holding 3,000 people—has been erected on the vacant space east of St. Andrew's Hall.

Arrangements have been made for the delivery every fortnight, from door to door, of 100,000 invitation leaflets.

Scottish Notes.

THE sixth annual rally of the Christian Endeavour Societies, forming the Lanarkshire Union, was held recently at Carluke. At the public conference, papers were read, and discussions took place, on "Christian Endeavour and Personal Character," and "The C.E. Society as an Aggressive Agency."

The Scottish Sabbath Protection Association regards the holding of Sabbath evening concerts in public halls as an infringement of the statute law of the land, the same being mere commercial ventures. Accordingly, the Association is again taking steps to bring the matter before the notice of the police authorities. A further effort is to be made, by deputation to the Town Council, to secure at least a reduction in the amount of tramway-car traffic on Sabbath in the city of Glasgow.

The Paisley and District Christian Endeavour Union Council have been considering the decision of the Town Council to take over the management of the local racecourse, and have forwarded to the town clerks a copy of their resolution, expressing their deep regret that such action should have been taken on behalf of the municipality. They naturally view the decision as calculated to affect prejudicially the moral welfare of the youth of the town and district.

At a Sabbath School Conference, held a few days ago in Coatbridge, Rev. Dr. John Pagan (Moderator of the Church of Scotland), who presided, commended the good arrangements which he knew to exist in a number of parishes, for giving religious instruction in board schools; but said that there were many districts in which no such provision was made, and he felt that ministers failed in their duty if they did not stand forward at School Board elections, and endeavour to secure the return of members who would give attention to this matter.

Advantage was taken last week of the annual meeting of the Scottish National Sabbath School Union, to present Sir John Neilson Cuthbertson with an address of congratulation on the attainment of his jubilee as a teacher. In his reply Sir John said he had never met a band of more business-like or energetic Christian men than the directors of the Union. He could bear witness to a very great improvement in Sabbath school affairs since he began teaching. Then, there was grave doubt as to the propriety, usefulness, and correctness of the Sabbath school. Now, it is universally accepted as one of the most useful agencies in connection with the Christian Church.

Missionary Correspondence.—A friend of mine (a Baptist) in the foreign field, knowing that many isolated ones in the homelands interested in missionary work would be glad to hear occasionally direct from the field, has expressed his willingness to send, through me, a circular letter, three or four times yearly, giving an account of work in his district, and making special note of those matters calling for united praise and prayer. This suggestion is not intended for those already corresponding with any on the field, but particularly for those who are far removed from centres of busy religious life, such as invalids, tried and lonely hearts, isolated country workers, &c. George A. Edmonds.

The Evangelical Alliance.

ON Thursday afternoon, a meeting, in the interests of this Society, was held at 33, Carlton Road, Putney, by permission of Mr. Mackenzie Bell. Mr. Augustus Churchill, who presided, spoke of his long connection with the Alliance, his deep interest in its work, and introduced Rev. H. R. T. Jackson, deputation secretary.

The latter drew attention to the divided condition of the visible Church of Christ, and claimed that the Alliance has solved that which is so great a difficulty to some minds, by calling upon every Christian to hold out the right hand of fellowship to his brother in Christ. The widespread observance of the first week of each year, as a universal week of prayer, was a sign that the aim of the Alliance, to be a bond of union between Christians of all nations, had been in some measure carried out.

Pastor C. E. Faithfull, who has laboured for many years in France and Spain, also addressed the meeting. He could look back to the time when Spain was closed to the work of all other Christian bodies except of the Roman Catholic Church, and he was most grateful for the measure of liberty now enjoyed by evangelists. After speaking of the beauties of the sunny land, he went on to tell of the very great hindrances which they met with through the power of the Roman Catholic Church, and through the ignorance and uneducated state of many of the people. Though growth has been slow, yet one could scarcely pass through a town of any size, from north to south of the country, without finding now a little body of Protestants.

Rev. Aylmer House, vicar of St. Stephen's Church; Rev. Donald Matheson, of Putney Presbyterian Church; and Mr. Mackenzie Bell also took part in the proceedings.

Bible Study Classes.

THE Bible Study Classes arranged by Rev. G. Soltau have opened most auspiciously at the seven centres, and already considerable interest has been aroused. The two largest companies are found at Mildmay Conference Hall and Stratford Conference Hall respectively, on the Wednesdays. At Wimbledon, Morley Hall, and Camden Town Y.M.C.A. delightful meetings have been held, and the outlook for the winter is most cheering. Earnest prayer is solicited that these Bible studies may truly deepen spiritual life, and strengthen faith.

A correspondent writes: "I am sensible that a movement is being launched upon the Christian public in and round London, which may be fraught with immense issues. God may have raised up our American brethren to come into our midst and commence the revival of Bible study, and for its further development in the direction in which it is so much needed—first, as to a distinct revival of the 'Searching of the Scriptures;' and secondly, in the unfolding of Scriptural truth so as to make it practical and essential to the individual in the living out the Christian life.

"I fear the danger is to get into the line of 'addresses,' which may become metaphysical, whereas really the need of the day is to make the result of Bible study practical and experimental. Thus the truth needs to be broken up, and to be set forth before the audience in a way that everybody can receive their portion, the characteristics being experimental, incidental, illustrative. I feel sure we are living in an age when people have become fastidious, because their ideas are based upon the traditions of men rather than upon the Word of God; hence we want to get them back to first principles; and, in enunciating these, one needs to be as simple as possible, and essentially practical."

Already a number of applications have been made for similar Bible studies, to be given in other parts of London, at the beginning of 1900. Any further information desired can be obtained from Mr. Soltau, 85, Lordship Park, N.; or Mr. J. H. Tritton, 36, Queen's Gate Gardens, W.

Synthetic Bible Studies.

A PLAN of Bible study that many thousands are following with great interest and profit. Dr. Gray, the originator and most successful teacher of the plan, will conduct a class through the Bible in a year.

SOME FACTS ABOUT IT.

Synthetic study of the Bible is the study of the Bible as a whole, and each book of the Bible as a whole, and as seen in its relation to the other books. The word "synthesis" has the opposite meaning to "analysis." When we analyze a subject, we take it apart and consider it in its various elements; but when we synthesise it we put it together and consider it as a whole.

THE VALUE OF THE PLAN.

Suppose you were to study geography. You would first look at a globe, or map of the world, and after that single, all-including glimpse, you could more intelligently consider the hemispheres, continents and states, and ultimately the mountain ranges, rivers and lakes. It would be abstruse, tedious and difficult, were you to begin the other way and work backwards; and yet that is the method many employ in Bible study, accounting, in great measure, for their lukewarmness in it and the paucity of results.

WHAT IT HAS DONE.

Shortly after applying this method of Bible study for himself, Dr. Gray began to experiment on others—some theological students who were under his care—with most blessed results. Then the plan became introduced to different Bible institutes, and at least one theological seminary in the land. Here two classes of minds were met: those which had a university training, and others which had scarcely more than a common school education. But the effect was just the same in either case; and now, not only hundreds but thousands of such students, some of them in the uttermost parts of the earth, are praising God for having revealed to them his Word in this simple way.

Out of these institute classes gradually grew the popular evening classes in different parts of the country, and more latterly in London, England. In many instances these have reached a membership of 1,000 or more, and are held weekly, both summer and winter, with a sustained interest and enthusiasm.

INSTRUCTIONS TO STUDENTS OR TEACHERS.

The first thing expected of the persons or classes following this plan is. That they will read the lesson assigned each week. Little can be gained in any kind of Bible study without this, and especially under the present plan. Its great advantage lies in getting the people to read the Bible for themselves. You are not asked to memorize what you read, or tax your energies in any other respect than by the simple reading. Let the task be made, in that respect, just as easy and pleasant as it can be made.

The second rule is, Read the lesson continuously. In the first place, always read the lesson through at a single sitting. Do not read part of it now, and part some other time; but, if it be possible, read it all at once. In the second place, do not be influenced by the chapters and verses when you read.

The third rule is, Read the lesson repeatedly. Even if it is needful to read it more rapidly than you would otherwise wish to do. Read it several times rapidly rather than only once very slowly. The first time you go over the lesson in this way, you may see nothing in it that your mind takes hold of; but the next time you will see a little, and the next more; and so on till the complete outline stands out clearly before you.

The fourth rule is, Read the lesson independently. Do not fly to the commentary and Bible "help" for assistance till after you have finished the lesson with your teacher. This is not to depreciate such assistance, which is invaluable in its place, neither is it to inspire an inflated idea of what you are going to get here, but to emphasize what was said above. To master the English Bible you must begin by getting your own individual impression of the contents or outline of each book. What you get will be your own; and no matter how it may be altered afterward by subsequent study, it will still be your own, and you will always be the stronger for it. You will have the consciousness of walking on your feet, and not on stilts.

The last rule, but not the least by any means is, To read the lesson prayerfully. There are two reasons for this. In the first place, the Bible cannot be studied "just like any other book;" because it is unlike every other book in the world. It is God's own Book. The Holy Spirit wrote it through holy men of old (2 Peter i. 21); and its Author is, after all, its only true and safe Interpreter. Coleridge said, "The Bible without the Holy Spirit is a sun-dial by moonlight."

But then the other reason is this. Do we not want his great Bible Class to be something more than a feast of intellect? Do we not want Him whom our soul loveth to tell us where He feeds his flock, where He makes them to rest at noon? (Solomon's Song i. 7). Do we not want to be caused to lie down in the green pastures and led beside the still waters? Do we not desire a rich blessing in our souls? Do we not want our connection with this Class to be ever memorable in our experience as a time when, in a new sense, we were exalted to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus? But how can this be without the power of the Holy Ghost through the Word? And how shall we obtain this power?

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR FIRST LESSON.

The lesson for next week will be Genesis, chapters one to eleven inclusive (1-11). We shall study the Old Testament first, and the New Testament afterward, taking up the books as nearly as possible in the chronological order in which the Holy Spirit caused them to be written. It is well to follow in the channel He Himself has thus marked out for us, and we shall appreciate the advantage of it before we have travelled very far. Please look over the rules given above to see what you are to do with these chapters. There is just one qualification I would make; viz., that as two or three of these chapters are given to genealogical tables, you need not feel obliged to read them more than once. Read them once, however, out of regard to Him who caused them "to be written for our learning;" and it may be you will find some nuggets of gold hidden away there that will repay you for your pains.

The lesson is Genesis 1-11th chapters inclusive.

The rules are:—

1. Read the lesson.
2. Read it continuously.
3. Read it repeatedly.
4. Read it independently.
5. Read it prayerfully.

SUMMARY OF FIRST LESSON.

Lesson I. Genesis i. xi.

We begin our first lesson to-day, and the first question is, Are you prepared for it? Have you read the lesson? Continuously? How many times have you read it? Have you read it seven times, i.e., once every day? Have you prayed over it? All this is essential, and must be done if you are to reap the blessing. And is it not simple, and are you not willing to do it?

The object now before us is to get hold of the facts of this lesson. We shall not do much in the way of their interpretation, indeed, that is not our thought in any of these lessons. The facts must come first, and interpretation afterwards. And it is only the great outline facts we are seeking. To have too many of them in our minds would defeat one of the purposes in view, which is not only to obtain, but to retain, what we get. And then, too, it will be found that, if the reading be done as requested in the introductory lesson last week, the great facts will easily suggest and bring to mind the lesser ones related to them. Of this we shall be persuaded as we advance.

THE WORD OUTLINE.

What, then, is the first great fact in the book of Genesis? At once, you respond, "The creation of the world." What are its chapters? (i. and ii.). Now give the next great fact. "The fall" (chap. iii.). The next? "The deluge" (chap. v. ix.). And the last, so far as this lesson is concerned? "The dispersion of the nations" (chap. x.-xi.).

The following, then, is our word outline of the lesson:—

Creation, 1-2.
Fall, 3.
Deluge, 5-9.
Nations, 10-11.

Only four words, but if we have done the reading asked, they will suggest to us the general details that group themselves under each one. Let us see if this is not true.

THE FIRST GREAT FACT.

What does the word "Creation" suggest? Can you state the events of the six days in their order? Here they are:—

Light.
Firmament.
The Dry Land.
Light-holders.
Fish and Fowl.
Cattle and Man.

Notice, that light was created four days before the sun. Objectors to the Mosaic record used to laugh at that, and say there could have been no light before the sun, since the sun was the source of light. But later scientific discoveries indicate that there is a light separate from the sun—that the earth itself is luminous. This gives authority for the use of the word "Light-holders," as applied to the creation of the fourth day.

Notice, that the word "Firmament" means the expanse or atmosphere that is around the earth supporting the clouds.

Notice, that in the case of "The Dry Land," the herb and the tree came first, and the seed in each case afterwards, different from what we observe now, and yet, as science shows, inevitable at the beginning. Here, again, we have a comparatively recent confirmation of the authority and inspiration of the Mosaic record.

THE LAW OF RECURRENCE.

But this does not exhaust the word "Creation." What have we in chap. ii. different from chap. i.? After referring to the hallowing of the seventh day, the writer describes more in detail one of the acts of creation spoken of only in a general way before. What act is it? "The creation of man." Here, then, we meet for the first time a peculiarity of the rhetoric of the Holy Spirit, with which it is necessary for us to become acquainted at once. We shall need to recognize it many times in the course of our work, especially in the more difficult books of the prophets, and to understand it is vital either to get at their facts or the interpretation of them. This peculiarity is defined as the Law of Recurrence. Look at the name well, and get it fastened on your mind. Now, what is the law of recurrence? It is that peculiarity of the Holy Spirit as an Author by which He gives first the outlines of a subject, and then recurs to it again for the purpose of adding details. To quote the language of a great authority on Bible exegesis, "Many have quite overlooked this, and read Scripture as if the order of narration were always the order of accomplishment, and as if consecutive chapters were necessarily consecutive as to time. But if Scripture be read so, confusion and mistakes are certain."

In the first chapter, then, we have the account of creation in outline, and in the second chapter part of the same account in detail. The part thus given in detail concerns the creation of man. There is a reason for this detail about man in all that follows, for the Bible is not a history of the world, but a history of man, especially the redemption of man. But what are these details about the creation of man? There are at least four—(a), the nature of his being, verse 7; (b), the location in which he was placed, verses 8-14; (c), the moral test laid upon him, verses 15-17; and (d), the help-meet given him, verses 18-25. Let us place them in this position, where we can more readily recognize them:—

Nature.
Location.
Moral test.
Help-meet.

Notice, that the nature of man seems to be threefold. There was first his body made of the dust of the ground, then the breath or spirit of life put into it, and finally the combining of these two forming a third, so that "the man became a living soul." (Compare 1 Thessalonians 5-23). It is said, chap. 1, v. 26, that God made "man in his own image," and morally that it is explained in part by such a passage as Colossians 3-10, but constructively, if one may use such a word in this connection, it is explained by the fact that God Himself is a Trinity in unity, and has given us this reflection and proof of Himself in our own nature.

Notice, that the whole description of the location of man in Eden carries on the face of it the idea of historicity. Eden and the story associated with it can hardly be a myth when we see the Holy Spirit labouring, so to speak, to identify its whereabouts not only by the names of the rivers flowing out of it, and the countries they watered, but even the very nature of the soil of those countries.

Notice, that Adam was a highly intelligent man to be able to name every living creature brought before him, and that this fact has a bearing upon the assumption of some that man is a development from a lower animal.

The other three great facts are taken up and treated similarly in this lesson.

Synthetic study has been explained thus in hope that in addition to the thousands following it in America, that the Bible-loving English world may have the same opportunity. We believe it will prove a great blessing to all who follow it.

You can obtain these lessons by subscribing to the Union Gospel News, a weekly Gospel paper, each issue of which, beginning October 5, 1899 (back numbers furnished until November 15), will contain one of Dr. Gray's studies, fifty-two of which will take you through the Bible in a year. The regular price of the Gospel News is 1.00dols, but to put it in reach of every one we are furnishing it at 50c, postage to England 80c, so that for 1dol 30c you can have these lessons.

By taking one copy, any one who has taught a Sabbath School class can teach a class of twenty or hundred on this plan.

The readers of The Christian have always taken a deep and sympathetic interest in the varied work of the which, for nearly Sixty Years, has been labouring, with glorious result, among the poorest and most neglected Children of this great City—the ragged, the drift, and the cripples. Its primary object is to commend the gospel, and to win the children to Christ. This it seeks to do by Christian sympathy and uplifting ministries; by methods and agencies to reach them spiritually, mentally, and physically. The Society has 150 local Mission Centres in the congested centres of London, with Sunday Schools, Bible Classes, Mothers' Meetings, Bands of Hope, Night Schools, Industrial Classes, &c. It touches at least 100,000 souls weekly through its manifold agencies, sustained as they are by over 5,000 voluntary workers. It has wisely practical methods for helping the boot-less, clothing the ragged, and feeding the hungry. It has a register of over 5,000 Cripples in their own homes; poor afflicted little ones who need "most everything." It sends away over 6,000 pale-faced children and adults to the country and sea-side each year. It gives some 30,000 of the poor children a day in the country. In varied other ways it relieves distress, encourages thrift and industry, and helps the most downtrodden to rise and to learn to help themselves. Briefly, the Society is an embodiment of The Good Samaritan.

The Winter is upon us, the needs are great, and the Council confidently look to YOU, as in the past to supply the means to enable them to continue their Christ-like Work.

CONTRIBUTIONS, as well as gifts of Toys, Clothing, Boots, &c., should be sent to—

MR. JOHN KIRK, Secretary of the RAGGED SCHOOL UNION, 37, Norfolk Street, Strand, London, W.C.; or to Messrs. MORGAN & SCOTT, at the Offices of The Christian, 12, Paternoster Buildings, E.C.

A Report sent on Application.

DONATIONS

Received by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, to Monday, October 16th, 1899.

 Will donors oblige by stating explicitly and fully the titles of the institutions to which they wish their donations to be applied? Further correspondence will thus be obviated.

 Cheques, Money Orders, or Postal Orders should be made payable to Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C., and crossed "London City and Midland Bank, Ltd."; this will effectually prevent loss.

Pen-Pictures from Afar.

My pen-picture this month shall be a sketch—only in outline, of course—of a native Christian, who, away in the remote South Sea Islands, became a missionary to his own people. Because you must know that when the good Spirit of God constrains South Sea Islanders to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ with all their heart, it very often happens that an intense desire springs up within them to tell others of the joy that the Christian religion has been to them. It seems as though they could not live if they did not win their kindred, or their neighbours, from cruel and barbarous practices to the service of the true God. And one thing which distinguishes these is their fervent zeal. These brave native pastors—and some of their wives—have ever held an honourable place in the very forefront of the battle in the Pacific. Many of them have won the martyr's crown, having fallen victims to the club, or the spear, or the deadly fever. Don't you think this is a splendid testimony to the reality of their love to Jesus?

The name of the one that is on my mind now was Papeiha. He was a native of Raiatea, and at his own request was landed by an English missionary on Aitutaki, in the Hervey Group. At this time, remember, the Aitutakians were living in darkest heathenism, and were very cruel. The reception given to Papeiha and the comrade who accompanied him was, as you would suppose, not at all cordial.

THEY WERE AT ONCE SEIZED, led to one of their native altars, and dedicated to their gods. This, however, did not deter them from speaking of what they had themselves tasted and handled of the Gospel of the grace of God. Their courage never failed them. They taught the people to the best of their ability. In spite of many dangers and difficulties, they little by little gained the confidence of their dusky brethren; while, to crown all, God so blessed their labours that, before the missionary returned to visit them, many of the Aitutakians had given themselves to Christ, and idolatry on that island was a thing of the past.

After this Papeiha went to another island of the Hervey Group, named Mangaia. A fringing reef of coral rock completely surrounded it, in which there was no opening, so that it was impossible to land in a boat. When the missionary ship arrived with the intention of landing teachers, the people collected in a crowd on the beach, armed with clubs and spears. In order to open communication with them, some one must to the reef, in the face of the open hostility of the natives. Who but Papeiha volunteered to do this?

Without a fear, he plunged into the sea and swam to the reef. After talking to the people a short time, he succeeded in persuading them to lay aside their weapons. Then the other teacher, who had been set apart for Mangaia, followed Papeiha. Hardly had he landed when, from some cause, the suspicions of the natives were aroused. Both the teachers were seized, and were being dragged inland to the altar, where, without doubt, they would have been offered as sacrifices to the gods. A blank shot was immediately fired from the ship. The report of it so surprised the natives that Papeiha and his companion were able to escape. Rushing down to the beach, they plunged through the surf and swam to the ship.

On another occasion, at Rarotonga, where native teachers were being landed, this same dark-skinned herald of the cross tied a copy of St. Mark's Gospel and his "Pilgrim's Progress" in a handkerchief on his head to prevent their getting wet. Then he slipped down the side of the ship into the sea and made for the shore. His faith and courage were amply rewarded. A work was begun there which has been marvellously successful.

He lived to see Rarotonga become Christian, and the establishment of a training college for native pastors, from which there have gone forth to the mission field many men and women as faithful and devoted as himself.

You quite see that the colour of a Christian teacher's skin has nothing whatever to do with the power of the Gospel upon his heart, or with his usefulness in the Lord's vineyard, when he says with the Apostle, "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel."

The Tent Work.

SOME deeply interesting incidents, showing the evident work of God in the South London tents, were related at the noon meeting last Wednesday. Scores have been smitten under a sense of sin; hundreds have been unable to get in. There are not enough workers to deal with the anxious.

Rev. D. M. Cameron said, forty years ago at Blandford, he had preached on the Prodigal Son, when a young man complained that the preacher had called him a rogue and a vagabond. He had gone away from home, and just returned. He was converted. When the speaker was preaching at the tent, this man came to him, having been following Christ these forty years.

Rev. J. Wilson, Woolwich, told of a wife who wanted her husband to go to the tent; but he refused. She got him to go for a walk, and brought him to the tent door; but he would not go in. A second time he refused. She went in alone, and was saved. A young man came outside and persuaded the husband to go just inside and sit down. He did so; an arrow entered between the joints of the harness, and he was smitten and saved.

Mr. Holness said that, while Mr. Leonard Weaver was preaching about eternity, a young man came forward and wished to shake hands with him; he had found the Lord that night. An elder man followed, saying he also would like to shake hands with him, and took his stand by the younger, who was, he said, his son. The following day, an old man, a Christian for many years, came and praised God for his mercy to these two, who were his son and grandson.

A young man, utterly obdurate on Sunday, on Monday acknowledged himself a sinner, a gambler; but still hard. Mr. Holness was led the next night to take no notice of him; but he came again, evidently piqued by being passed by. Before the week was out he was rejoicing in Christ.

It really seems that tent meetings are one way of solving the difficulty of reaching the masses. The experience here also goes to show that setting forth the solemn realities of eternity, and the inevitable doom of the rejectors of Christ, is a form of testimony most needed and most effectual in these careless, hurried, and superficial days.

At the noon prayer meeting, on Monday, some additional words of cheer and progress were expressed by Mrs. S. J. Alexander, who described some experiences in the visitation of converts. In one interesting instance a woman, whose husband and son had been converted at the Peckham tent, professed to find peace. At another house, Mrs. Alexander came upon a case of a converted woman, whose husband had found salvation at the tent. She then prayed for her father, and subsequently he also went home rejoicing in the Saviour. Indeed, the conversion of families has been one of the most blessed characteristics of the work. Mr. John Vine, who had spoken on the previous day at the closing services at Peckham, gave a vivid account of the pathetic final scene. In response to an invitation, the young converts pressed to the front to testify; deep feeling was manifested, and many were in tears. Among the groups around the platform were a father, mother, and two daughters, all of whom had professed conversion during the mission. It was with difficulty that the meeting could be brought to a conclusion, so many and so glowing were the testimonies. The work is to be continued in a series of services which have been arranged at various local churches.

After many years' absence in America we have lately had a visit from Mr. Wm. Henry Collins at Ardfert, and his earnest, yet simple, Gospel message, said and sung, has been fruitful in awakened interest in many, and some apparently real conversions of young persons. He laboured in Tralee, Listowel, and the villages round; and, in now proposing to renew his evangelistic travels in England, he is followed by prayers of faith and thankfulness for blessing to many.

Geo. F. Trench.

Mr. Monro Collings has just concluded at Feltham a fortnight's series of Bible readings, which have been blessed to the many converts gathered in during Mr. Collings' recent missions in the neighbourhood. Keen interest was created, and the building was filled nightly. At the praise meeting, which we felt bound to convene at the close, many testified that the Bible had become a new book to them, and several experienced Christians stood up to praise the Lord for making known unto them some of "the deep things of God." P. M.

Growing out of a "Quiet Day" at Sholing, a series of evangelistic services have been held in a tent there. Of these Lord Radstock writes: "In spite of the weather the tent has been filled with the working classes, who seem unwilling to go even when the meeting has lasted two hours. Not a few come regularly who had not been at a place of worship for many years. We can see a change coming over quite a number of the hearers. A dear servant of the Lord from the Evangelization Society spoke in the tent."

Miss Chadwick, of Portsmouth, has concluded an eight days' mission at Brunswick Rooms Evangelistic Mission, Portswood, Southampton. The Word has been faithfully proclaimed in the power of the Holy Spirit, Christians have been helped, and a number of persons have professed conversion. To God be all the praise! The general work of the mission continues to prosper, notwithstanding opposition from Ritualists. The hall is filled, and many souls have turned from idols to serve the Lord. J. T. H.

Street Preaching in Ireland.

SIR,—Kindly permit me to make known, through your columns, the attempts being now made in Ireland to stop open-air preaching in some localities. The machinery of the new County Council Bill is being employed for this purpose. The Queenstown Urban District Council opened the campaign by passing a resolution making street preaching unlawful in their district, and this has been followed by the Rathmines Council forbidding preaching in their park and its approaches. Others have followed suit, the last effort in the same direction being that of the Blackrock (co. Dublin) Urban District Council, who, at their meeting on 27th ulto., passed the following resolution:—

"That this Council having, by a majority of twenty-three votes to one, requested the police authorities to remove the obstruction and annoyance caused by the street preachers assembling at the park gates on Sunday and other days, and they having failed to comply with our request, we instruct our engineer to have the recess at the park gates chained off on Sundays, and other days when necessary, said chains to be portable, and only stakes to be made permanent."

The discussion which followed was heated and animated. One of the members opposed it, on the ground that he thought they had too many chains already in the country. The chairman said that there was a legal point in the question: the approach to the park had been opened a long time, and he thought that it was consequently a public thoroughfare, and that an injunction might be got against them for enclosing it. However, when the vote was taken, the resolution was carried by eleven votes to seven. It remains to be seen what the result will be; anyhow, "chains" and "stakes" have not a very pleasant sound, and are certainly suggestive. I may add that there has been no obstruction caused by the preaching, and the addresses delivered are simple Gospel testimonies, devoid of controversy, and spoken alike to Protestants and to Roman Catholics, who usually listen most attentively. May I ask the prayers of your readers for Ireland, and that this and all other efforts to hinder the Gospel may be fustrated?—Yours faithfully, Watchman.

Banquet for the Poor.

WILL you kindly allow me once more to ask your readers for their kind help towards the Lord Mayor's annual banquet and entertainment to the poor of the East End on November 9?

The Lord Mayor Elect has kindly given £20, and the Sheriffs £10 each.

Further donations will be gratefully received by yours obediently, Fredk. N. Charrington.

Newton Abbot Convention was held Oct. 10-12, the speakers being Rev. J. Gregory Mantle, who has, through several visits, become well known in Newton, and Rev. John Brash, of Liverpool. This venerable servant of God, by his plain, direct teaching, helped many. The Convention throughout was felt to be one of great blessing. The numbers attending were good. Many attended from neighbouring towns. Mr. H. G. C. Bishop was chairman at each gathering.

Notes & Comments

AROUND us are now falling the leaves of autumn; mute but eloquent witnesses to the fact that the cycle of Nature is again complete; that the era of fruitfulness is over, and that of decay begun. These falling leaves, however, leave their monuments behind them in the trees on which they grew, and to the growth of which they contributed their share. If the buds of spring are prophetic of the Divine goodness, the withered foliage of the woodlands is a testimony that the promise then given has been fulfilled, and that God has kept his word to his creatures. Henceforth, Nature will rest awhile, till the new wine of life once more pulses through her, and wakens the spring seeds.

It would be well if, in this hurrying age, this lesson of the autumn were pondered by us. There is no outward law of periodicity in the spiritual life; but none the less is there real need for times of fallowness and rest in the soul's activities. We are too much for external show, for results, for statistical returns. Leaves grow in summer, but roots grow in winter; and the leaves would soon fail but for the roots. So do we need to be "rooted and grounded in love," and only those who are thus rooted can bear the peaceable fruit of righteousness. If we thought more of this, and gave our spiritual natures time to strike deep into the soil of the unseen world, we should less need to trouble about "results." These would come as surely as the flowers of spring and the harvest of autumn follow on the busy rooting process of the winter.

The outbreak of the Boer war, absorbing as it does the available "fighting material" of this country, may not be without serious consequences in our foreign relations. We hear of important movements in the direction of China on the part of Russia, troops being steadily poured into that country; of other strategic movements towards Afghanistan and Persia. Germany is rousing herself in Samoa, where the triangular arrangement between that country, America, and ourselves is working as badly as possible. Once the "dogs of war" are unleashed, it is impossible to foretell what may happen. It is a time calling for temperance in speech, sobriety in action, and earnest waiting upon God that He may bring his own ends to pass through the turmoil and conflict of human affairs. We note with pleasure that even on the field of battle, human feeling is asserting itself, as is shown by the kindly care which British surgeons and officers are expending upon the wounded and fallen from the ranks of the enemy.

Among the immediate results of the war must be counted the sad disturbance of Christian work, both among the white and native populations of the colonies. On no one will the burden of suffering and privation fall more quickly than on the ministers and missionaries, whose labours must perforce be interrupted and thrown back for long years. The passions of war and of race-hatred are ever inimical to true spiritual results, and there are circumstances in this unhappy struggle which will unquestionably tend to deepen them. These suffering brethren on both sides, must be loyally and earnestly remembered in our prayers, and every opportunity taken to lighten the burden of sorrow and want under which they are labouring. The task of teaching the Gospel, in its purity, in a country where a three-cornered race feud is carried out to such bitter extremes, is always peculiarly hard; and, under present difficulties, those who are its representatives demand special sympathy and love.

In the House of Lords, Lord Salisbury expressed the hope that, when the present troubles are over, we may be able to do something for the native races, whose welfare has not enjoyed all the care it ought to have had. His lordship is quite right. Neither Boer nor Briton has been either just or generous to the native. Good King Khama's visit is still remembered among us; when he came to this country to save his people out of the clutches of the Chartered Company, and place them under Imperial rule. Then, again, it is only a year since a son of Dr. Moffat was here to plead the cause of a great number of Bechuanas, whom we had "apprenticed" to Dutch farmers, which was practical slavery. Lord Salisbury will find ample scope for righteous dealing.

Letters from India are very saddening in their references to the famine. Dr. Colin Valentine, of the Medical Missionary Training Institution at Agra, writing on October 5, said:

> All hope for rain for the cold-weather sowing has now passed away. Last Sabbath morning we had 1,111 starving creatures at our beggars' church.
> The Pioneer for October 4 says: "Over 50,000 persons have been added to the number in receipt of relief during the past week, the total in all provinces being 158,814."

Dr. Valentine, and other workers in India, hope to be entrusted by generous friends at home with funds, wherewith to feed the hungry which crowd around them at the present time.

The action of the Bishop of Bristol in heading a deputation of welcome to the Congregational Union at Bristol has roused the deep ire of the Church Times, which, in an editorial note, places him and the Catholic Bishop of Clifton in the class of "rebels" against true Church authority — the latter because he usurps an authority he does not possess; the former because he refuses to exercise the true authority he does possess. The writer repudiates the expressions of joy with which the Bishop welcomed the Union to his diocese, and says that to Churchmen elsewhere the joyfulness of such an event is by no means apparent; adding that to them Dissent is a tendency not making for righteousness on the whole—"a tendency which, in its net results, hinders the progress of the Christian religion" (italics ours). With such views, it is clear that the Church Times and its party look upon Dissent as an enemy. It is well to know the views held by the organ representative of Ritualism; lamentable as those views may be.

That the Church Times does not, however, voice the opinions of sober and intelligent Churchmen on this matter is clear from the paper on Church and Dissent read at the Church Congress by Dr. Wace. A better summary of the progress and present position of Nonconformity in this country, and of the forces of Free Churchism throughout the world, could not have been given by the most ardent Nonconformist. He paid a glowing testimony to the Free Church Catechism in which the beliefs common to all the Free Evangelical Churches are voiced; and went so far as to ask whether this great object-lesson in Christian union ought not to lead to a still wider union "in which the Church of England will hold the place which is her due, while preserving as each of these dissenting communities does, her own principles and her own order." The attitude of Dr. Wace not only contrasts favourably with that of the Church Times, but represents the real feelings of a large body of Churchmen towards their dissenting brethren.

The "vitality of evil" was the subject of the Congregational Union sermon. This is a line of thought which is usually left severely alone nowadays, when a cheap optimism too often rules the thoughts of religious people, just as a cheap pessimism rules the ideas of latter-day irreligious thinkers. There is, however, little doubt but that a great revival of the doctrine of sin is needful. Loose views on moral questions, on the one side, and vague theories of the atonement on the other, are closely allied. Until we have right notions about the disease, we cannot value the remedy at its worth. It is not, however, by looking at sin in itself that an adequate conception of it will be engendered in the heart; but by viewing it in relation to the overpowering vision of the Cross of Christ. That alone, under the illumination of the Holy Spirit, can bring home the conviction of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.

The indignation of English Roman Catholics with the Pope, for having silently acquiesced in the condemnation of Dreyfus has not spent itself, for Mr. St. George Mivart has recently written to The Times, expressing his disgust that the Pope should have feared to speak lest he should offend France. He regards Dreyfus as the Galileo of the nineteenth century, and believes that, as the Church's treatment of Galileo alienated millions of Catholics, so her treatment of Dreyfus will probably alienate millions more. He thinks the scandal has been prodigious, and that no trial of any other Jew has had such world-wide consequences since that of Christ. He admits that the Pope may have desired justice to be done, but his mouth is closed by the Roman congregations, chief of which is the Inquisition. He speaks strongly against the Papal Court, which has been a not uncommon thing in the history of Romanism in this country. But now, as always before, the Papal Court pays no attention—it wants English gold, not English influence.

The stimulating effects of Protestantism on Romanist zeal are evidenced in a striking manner in a religious revival at Pachino, a city in the south-east of Sicily. A Protestant evangelist, being welcomed by two families in the place, began to hold meetings at which large numbers were impressed, the work being afterwards carried on by Protestant pastors from neighbouring towns. The population was profoundly stirred by these ministrations, as many as 700 being present on one occasion. This state of things woke up the Romish priests more than all the vice and profanity which had been rampant before; and they bestirred themselves to dissuade the people from attending these gatherings, and the children the Sunday school which had been started for them. They even went so far as to ring the church bell, with a view to disturb the speakers, so vigorously that it cracked in pieces. This last incident looks like a parable of the fate awaiting all endeavours to silence or stifle the truth.

A striking paper in the Nineteenth Century gives an impressive account of the amount of gratuitous public service rendered to the nation by patriotic citizens. Not only in Parliament, but on County and District Councils, the Bench, School Boards, Royal Commissions, an immense amount of unpaid work is done, and that of the highest quality and efficiency. These "public souls" deserve a large tribute of gratitude from the nation. The writer of the paper, however, left out of count the largest and noblest sphere of unpaid labour of all, in ignoring the religious service so freely rendered by willing souls to the world in the name of Christ. Most spiritual work is a free-will offering. The world is unspeakably indebted to those who give up their time, their skill, and their devotion, to the service of their fellows. "Your servants for Jesus' sake" (2 Cor. iv. 5).

In times of war domestic and social legislation is very apt to be neglected. It is interesting to know, however, that the Transvaal episode is not to eclipse the urgent problem of housing London's poor. The County Council will take action under the Light Railways Act, and provide cheapened facilities for rapid transit to the suburbs. The West Ham Town Council has determined to spend £1,000,000 in building cottages alone, because it sees the tendency of capitalists to demand exorbitant rents. An important Conference has been called for next month, to meet at St. Martin's Town Hall, under the presidency of the Bishop of London, to consider the whole housing question. Without committing ourselves to any of the details proposed, we cannot but think that all this is to the good. True, a pure environment does not make the people pure, but an impure one drives to lower depths of degradation and of sin. The well-to-do are often indifferent to the claims of the Gospel, but the responsibility rests upon them. The crowds, however, who swarm in our slums and tenements live a life altogether apart from other people; and missionaries unanimously testify to the difficulty of teaching and helping them in their vile surroundings.

The opening of Westminster College at Cambridge, by the Presbyterians, is an event in which the members of all the churches are interested. The College will, no doubt, be eminently useful to Presbyterianism so long as it is guided by such a principal as Dr. Dykes, who heads the list. It has been started in a beautiful spirit of zeal and love, and has done much to evoke the enthusiasm of all Presbyterians. But we look for wider results from its presence and work in the university town; we believe it will be an influence on the side of a true catholicity of spirit and conduct. Men of other churches will fraternise with its students and professors, and friendships will be formed that will all tend to destroy exclusiveness and separation. Real equality may come by the action of many quiet side influences, and Westminster College will be one of them.

Temperance medical men, of whom we happily have a good number, have long insisted on the serious consequences to the nation of the increase of inebriety; and now the profession, as represented by The Lancet, is taking up the parable, and calls special attention to the spread of alcoholism, or, as it should be called, drunkenness, among women. Chronic drinking in 1897, as compared with 1878, is the cause of an increase of 82½ per cent. of deaths among men, and of 145½ per cent. among women. The deaths from cirrhosis (drunkard's liver) in men have increased 12 per cent.; in women 26 per cent. How far is the practice of sending little girls to the public-house for drink responsible for this alarming spread of drunkenness and disease among females? And how far the grocer's licence? And what will be the effect of this depravity on the coming generation? The Lancet says with truth and force:—

> Statesmen may create for themselves theories that extenuate a national vice which yields the exchequer so many millions a year; but, speaking from a medical point of view, we must point out that it is disgraceful and disastrous.

If three tons of pernicious and indecent literature were captured and destroyed by the police in London, as was done last week, one wonders how many tons escape week by week. The police may be vigilant and faithful, but these corrupters of the mind, especially of young persons, are always alert and active, and it is only after they have been some time at work that they can be detected, and a still longer time must elapse before they can be convicted. Happily every conviction is also a warning; it may frighten some out of this field of evil enterprise and greatly hinder the activity of others. We wish every success to the police in their efforts to harass this deadly traffic out of existence.

Apart altogether from their opinions of the war, all decent people must deprecate the spread of what the Americans call "yellow" journalism, as a result thereof. Certain papers—particularly among those published in the afternoon—seize upon the faintest rumours; and when these fail, apparently invent such, in order to issue flaming placards and thrilling headlines, describing reported incidents which are almost invariably denied a few hours later. All this tends to the further excitement of the people, and to stir up feelings of the worst kind. But we cannot afford in our excitement to support a press which knows no sense of truth and honour, and exploits a painful conflict for the satisfaction of a sordid commercialism.

In last week's Truth, a determined attack is made on the "written and read" sermon as the main cause of the declining interest in church-going. The writer says:

> For one man who can make any impression on his audience, there are 100 who are listened to with listlessness and apathy, and an ill-concealed desire to escape. Why is this? Simply because the sermon is written and read.

The preacher who says that he cannot adequately deal with his subject in an extempore manner, is asked to consider the case of "the statesman who has to speak on matters of far greater complexity, and whose words will reach, not simply to the limits of his immediate audience, but across the world, and be weighed, every one of them, by critical, and perhaps, hostile governments."

There is much truth in this contention, though probably the question is not so simple as it looks at first sight. The statesman makes important speeches only on great occasions, and with exceptional preparation; the preacher has to address the same audience several times a week. Without doubt, the extemporaneous method is the ideal one; but, as those in the work well know, the multifarious demands of the ministry are largely responsible for the "read" sermon. Let preachers cultivate a free handling of their MS. when they feel bound to use it, and this can only be when they make themselves thoroughly masters of their subject. The bulk of an average congregation prefer, and would profit more by a direct message delivered with conviction, than by the elaborated essays so often forced upon them.

Perhaps there is no more striking feature of modern religious thought as compared with that which prevailed in older and simpler times than in the comparative importance of the conceptions of God and man. Our forefathers dwelt much on the being, the attributes, the grace of God; we dwell much on the struggles, the temptations, the sorrows of the soul. Man has become more interesting, and God less so. This fact colours our hymns, our sermons, our systems of theology, and follows us into our devotions. There are probably many causes for the change; recent advances in science, together with the pressure of social problems, are answerable for much of it. Whatever may be the cause, it is a change for the worse in every sense.

For it is clear that the way of redemption is not along the line of this modern tendency. It is the upward not the inward, look that saves. "Look unto Me and be saved, all ye ends of the earth," is the message of the Old Testament. "Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of faith," is the burden of the New. By looking away from self, with its frailty and sin, and up to God, in Jesus Christ—the fountain of holiness and love—are we freed from bondage and despair. It is needful to recognise our own state, and to give voice to our needs and aspirations; but not till the thought of self is burned up in the life-giving vision of the Cross, shall we win emancipation and relief. This is the meaning of John iii. 14, 15.

Mr. George Livesey, the chairman of the South Metropolitan Gas Company, gave a most encouraging account of the results of the profit-sharing scheme of that company during the last ten or fifteen years. The first experiment was a sliding-scale rate of wages, but later the employés were encouraged to invest their bonuses as shares, so possessing a true share in the business. In order consistently to carry out the principle, two workmen were elected last November to the board of directors; and it is gratifying to hear that not only has this not interfered with their efficiency as workmen, but that they have won the respect of their fellow-directors as shrewd and capable men. This interesting experiment has demonstrated the feasibility of successful co-operative effort among employers and workmen, in a direction and to an extent hitherto not suspected. If the long feud between capital and labour could be settled by such friendly expedients, it would prove an immense social benefit, and vastly extend the feeling of brotherhood in the community.

God's Sowings.

ZECHARIAH X.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

TO the superficial eye there is no difference in the distance from our earth of the planets and the fixed stars; but, as a matter of fact, between the one and the other there is a vast intervening space of millions of miles. So in regard to these predictions.

The prophet searches "what manner of time" the Spirit of Christ which is in him signifies. He describes the great facts revealed to him; but it is not within his province to announce the times and seasons, which the Father hath kept in his own power. He sees the mighty mountain ranges; but it is left for us to discover that deep and far-stretching valleys lie between the near and the further, between the first and second advents of Christ. We shall find, therefore, the prophet passing from the one to the other, and grouping on the foreground of his picture incidents which really belong to different ages in the world's history. Such a method of workmanship was necessary, if prophecy was to be an incentive to faith and patience.

We have already had an illustration of this in the previous chapter, when the advent of the Christ on his lowly steed, the struggle of the Maccabees, and the deliverance of Israel in the last years of this dispensation are classed together as though pertaining to the same epoch. There is nothing surprising in such grouping, if we remember that our Lord inserts the whole Christian dispensation in the break of a single comma (compare Isa. lxi. 2, and Luke iv. 19).

In this chapter and the next, taken as one, we detect the same fact. We are bidden, in the first verse, to ask for the latter rain, that Pentecost which is to close the present age, and which the Apostle Peter describes as "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." These are to be expected, he tells us, when the Jewish people to God, and will inaugurate the time of restitution of all things, whereof God hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began. And the rest of the chaper may be interpreted as referring to the same events. But the next deals with the destruction of the second temple by Titus, and the rejection of the true Shepherd. In the thirteenth chapter there is a similar rapid transition from the final cleansing of the chosen people to the awaking of the sword against the Shepherd, who is also the fellow of the Lord of Hosts. And probably there is no satisfactory clue to the comprehension of the Lord's closing utterances about the fall of Jerusalem, which does not recognise the same principle. If these thoughts are borne in mind, there will be no obstacle to our deriving help and teaching from these chapters.

From the summons to ask for the latter rain, coupled as it is with the Divine promise of a gracious hearing, we are led to a graphic description of what God will make of his people—a description which was partially realized in the successful stand made by Judas Maccabæus and his brethren against Antiochus. Judah was as his goodly horse in the battle. From him came forth the corner-stone, from him the nail, from him the battle-bow, from him every exactor together. The following description of their successes against their foes, treading them down in the battle, as mire in the streets, was fully verified during that brief but glorious period, when for a little the waning splendour of the Hebrew people shone out in its pristine beauty. But when the prophet goes on to class Joseph with Judah, and to speak of the people being brought again from the ends of the earth, the mightiest nations being humbled for their sake, and the promised land, though inhabited to Lebanon on the North, and to Gilead on the East, being too small for them, we feel that there looms before his vision something greater than has taken place, or shall take place, till God summons people from all the world to inhabit their own land, as the bee-farmer hisses for his bees, scattered in search of honey throughout meadows and garden (v. 8). In the meanwhile, during the present age, we may view the Jewish race as

SO MUCH BURIED SEED.

I will sow them among the people, and they shall remember me in far countries, and they shall live with their children, and shall return.

At the end of the seventy years' captivity, the people of God's ancient choice were distributed through Parthia, Media, Persia, Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, Pontus, Phrygia, Pamphylia, Egypt, Libya and Rome, Crete and Arabia. Everywhere, throughout the great Roman Empire, they fell into the ground to die. So far as their natural life was concerned, they seemed on the point of being obliterated among the nations of the world; but you might as well talk of the obliteration of the seed which the husbandman casts into the autumn furrows. They built their synagogues, throve in the quarters assigned to them in the great cities, and disseminated new conceptions of God, high ethical standards, a fresh religious speech, destined to be of incalculable service to the early preachers of Christ's Evangel.

At this present hour, the Jews lie sown among all the nations of the earth. But they still live, or exist, with their children, and shall one day return. There shall be spring-time, earing, and harvest. The sea of affliction has too long rolled over them, with the thunder of its mighty billows. Its wide expanse has stretched out between them and their great destiny; but their Almighty Friend shall yet pass through it, smiting its waves and drying up its depths, so that they may re-occupy the land given in covenant to their fathers.

It was thus with the first believers. By the rough hand of the persecutor, the rich wheat of Pentecost, which had laid too long in the bin of the mother church, was scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria. "They therefore that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the Word." "They therefore that were scattered abroad, upon the tribulation that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenicia, and Cyprus, and Antioch." These spring sowings yielded a marvellous return. There was such a crop of churches and converts as multiplied the original number of the Church a hundredfold. Though there was a diminution of the numbers at Jerusalem, there were sheaves of golden corn throughout the world's acreage.

In the persecutions of Nero, Decius and Diocletian, the precious seed of the kingdom was sown deep in the dark graves of agony and death. Surely the great Sower went forth weeping, as He bore the precious seed to its destined ministry. It was buried in the voracious animals of the arena, in the labyrinths of the catacombs, in the dens and caves of the earth; but it lived again in millions of converts that so filled the earth as to appal and silence their persecutors. The blood of the martyrs became the seed of the Church.

There was a grand quality in the corn of the Waldensian Valleys, in the Paulicians, the Hussites, the Lollards, which was sown by the Master in the dungeons of the Inquisition, in mockings and scourgings, in bonds and imprisonment, in the fires of martyrdom, and in the current of swiftly-flowing rivers. But what harvests it all yielded! There was, for instance, the harvest of the Reformation in Germany, of the Huguenots in France, and of the Puritans in England. "A great multitude which no man can number, of every nation, and tribe, and people."

So in later days. The martyrs of Uganda have yielded to-day 300 Christian churches. The devoted labours of saintly missionaries in India, Burmah, China, and Africa, who fell into the ground of obscurity, and loneliness, and disappointment, and died among strangers, many of them prematurely or violently, have resulted in the salvation of myriads.

In all probability many of the children of God who read these lines know what sowing means. They, too, have fallen into the ground to die. That obscure village in which your friends say you are buried; that humble position in which your powers are cramped and limited by neglect and confinement; that bed of suffering and weakness; that incessant demand to undertake menial and lowly drudging; that summons to leave home and friends, and sphere of successful labour, to become the companion of savage and illiterate people—all this is the grave, with its darkness and silence, in which God sows his people, not that they should abide there for ever, but that they should bring forth much fruit. You shall live through other lives. Your prayers and alms shall be and the day shall reveal the wonderful ways in which you have no longer abode alone.

Sowing means death. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die . . ." We must be prepared to die, not only to sins, and weights, and self-indulgences, but to our own notions of pleasing God, to our emotional life, to our self-congratulation at the results of Christian service, to the energy and enthusiasm of our devotion.

Sowing means darkness. Through long months the seed lies in darkness and has no light. Madame Guyon tells of prolonged seasons in which she lost all the joy of God, that she might be led to God Himself. It is a strange experience: "God removes all conscious experience of his grace, all power to work for Him, and the very beauty of the Divine virtues." The soul from God, for He is beside it whilst it treads the dark valley; but it goes ever deeper into the grave of Jesus, no song on its lips, no rapture at its heart, no ray of sunlight from the former sources of hope and consolation.

Sowing means loneliness. The corn of wheat falls into the ground to die, that it may not abide alone; but this dying is necessarily a lonely experience. Each man is born alone, and alone he dies. God will perhaps touch your friends, and you will be separated from them by misunderstandings; your home life, so that your dearest will be called from your side; your church relationships, and you will have to go forth without the camp, bearing his reproach. But there is no one who has left brethren, or sister, or father, or mother, or children, for Christ's sake, that shall not receive a hundredfold in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children; and in the age to come, eternal life.

The Gospel by the Sea.—III.

By Mr. CHAS. COOK.

YARMOUTH is the great holiday-haunt, not only of tens of thousands of jaded Londoners, but of a large number of people who live in the great Eastern counties. Its sands are capacious, and the town is capable of taking in 80,000 visitors in one day; and since the vast improvements have been made, and the beautiful gardens by the sea have been finished, the holiday folks have been coming in greater numbers than ever; and the class of visitors has wonderfully changed for the better since the rowdyism—once so rampant—has been stopped by the authorities.

Some twenty years ago, John Hambleton and myself conducted a series of services on the sands; and I remember one striking case of a butcher from the New Cut, Lambeth, who, being awakened through the preaching, spent the whole night in prayer on the sands; and, having found peace in Christ, returned home; and, the following day being Sunday, he kept his shop closed, to the amazement of everybody, as he was accustomed to keep open on Sundays till two o'clock. He never opened again on the Lord's Day. He greatly prospered in business, and after a most consistent life recently died rejoicing in Christ.

About twelve years later I hired the Singers' Ring on several Sundays; and on another occasion held a few services with our brother, Chas. Inglis; but, save such desultory work as this, and an occasional meeting held by a few visitors, I know of no systematic, regular work on these immense sands until a year or so ago.

It is wonderful to me that the various churches do not see their duty and their privilege to preach regularly among the masses of the people, who will willingly and gladly listen to anyone who lovingly and intelligently proclaims the Gospel to them on the sands. This year I was delighted to find Canon Rogers, and his two able and spiritual curates, Messrs. Cobham and Willis, standing by and helping our brethren, who for six weeks have been daily toiling among the people here.

Nor should we fail to acknowledge that ministers of the Free Churches have also rallied to our help; but there would be ample room for six such meetings. The Yarmouth Established churches were formerly Ritualistic to a degree; but when the livings were in the hands of Dean Lefroy, of Norwich, he turned the High Church party out and appointed spiritually-minded Low Church ministers.

One Saturday evening recently, after a prayer meeting at the vicarage, the two curates, Mr. Cockrem, Mr. George Heath, with myself and a few others, took our stand in the splendid old market-place of Yarmouth, about 8.30; and amidst a number of cheap-jacks and a noisy quack—busy dispensing pills and drawing teeth—we sang and preached the Gospel to an attentive crowd of country folks, who gathered from the different stalls where they had been busy purchasing their goods and foods for the morrow. At the close we announced our three services on the Sunday, and wended our way homeward to ask our Lord to bless this "extra special" meeting.

So large and extensive are the sands of Yarmouth that no fewer than three piers run out from them, and there are two large open-air singers' rings permanently built on the sands. The Open-Air Mission secured the largest of these, which is in a most central position, and here they held three meetings every Sunday, at 3, 6.30, and 8.15, and on the week-nights at 7, and every morning at 11, arranging for a fresh relay of preachers every week. So successful were the meetings, that I sincerely hope it may be possible to have a three months' mission next year, if the Lord tarry.

The addresses of the clergymen and the ministers were marked by definiteness and robustness. Appeals to the conscience were the rule, and not the exception; and one had the joy of knowing that, in many instances, a saving change was wrought in the hearts of hearers. I was only able to give eight days myself, but during that short time some very definite and distinct cases of anxiety and conversion came under my own notice—specially three ladies, two of whom most clearly accepted Christ, whilst several young men professed to begin to serve the Lord from the Sunday evening meeting.

On the two Sundays that I was present there was an attendance of at least 3,000 people each day at the three services.

The week-night meetings were well attended. Seats were provided, hymn-sheets given away, the singing led by a harmonium, and the preaching such as God was pleased to honour. Among the ministerial brethren resting from their labours, and who were sitting amidst the listeners, whilst praying for the preachers, I noticed our brother, Mr. Woffendale, of Somers Town, and Mr. Cameron, from Wandsworth.

Many visitors from London and the suburbs, who went to Great Yarmouth, received a great blessing. Their object was to obtain renewed health to their bodies; God's purpose was that they should receive eternal life to their souls.

To God be the glory,
Great things hath He done.

The charming little seaside place of Gorleston—hard by Yarmouth—was not forgotten, and the Gospel was carried thither to the pleasure-seekers and the careless. If God shall continue to raise up open-air preachers who, in city and by sea, at street corner and on village green, shall persistently tell of ruin by the fall, of redemption by the blood, and of regeneration by the Spirit, and educate others to follow in their steps, it will be a safeguard and a bulwark to our country from the sophistries of the atheist, and the subtleties of the so-called priest.

Melksham Convention.

ONE of the interesting features of the Keswick Convention has been the marvellous spread of its influence. Not only in large centres of population, but even in remote parts of the country, has the pulse-beat of a deepened spiritual life been felt. Some of these smaller conventions are typical of what might be accomplished on a yet larger scale.

Melksham, not far from Chippenham, has, for the last six years, held a little Convention of its own; and, at this year's meeting, Rev. J. Gossett Tanner and Dr. Harry Guinness were the principal speakers. One of the earnest friends in this little town—Mr. George Stratton—threw open his charming grounds, where a tent, affording accommodation to hundreds, was erected, and well-known friends took part in the happy and helpful gatherings thus convened.

In Worcestershire Hop-yards.

FOR the seventeenth year, Mr. John Jones, of Shepherd's Bush, and myself, have visited the hop-yards of Hereford and Worcester. Owing to the prolonged picking, the work has taken the entire month, during which time we have walked over 300 miles, and preached and distributed heavy packs of Gospel literature in 188 different companies, which, with twelve special meetings held on the Sundays, make a total of 200 visits. In this way over 14,000 adults have been reached, besides, perhaps, twice that number of children.

"The mons with the books, mother! the mons with the books," was the cry of a child as we appeared at the gate; and a similar hearty reception welcomed us everywhere. We have been assisted by Messrs. Dinham and Staniford. We thank all friends who sent books and tracts; others will, no doubt, desire to make up the deficit in our most economical expenses.

William Luff.

The Brixton Hill Home.—The twelfth annual report of this Home sets forth in an interesting manner the useful work of the institution. During last year thirty-two girls were admitted, and twenty-seven babies placed under the care of foster-mothers. Suitable situations have been procured for some of the young women, while others have either returned to their homes or gone to friends. It is satisfactory to note that the balance-sheet shows no debt; but this is due to the exceptional kindness of colonial friends. As in other cases, the committee seeks the co-operation of additional friends in their work. The treasurer is Mrs. Alexander McArthur, 79, Holland Park, W.

Open-Air Work in Ireland.

A BRIEF account of work in the fairs and streets of some of our towns cannot but be of interest to readers of The Christian, who are praying for the spread of God's work in the land. The writer and his helpers are voluntary and unpaid agents of the Open-Air Mission.

"On August 30 we took our stand in the streets of Sligo, and for an hour, or thereabouts, sang and preached the Gospel to over 200 people. A few persons sought to interrupt, but caused no inconvenience whatever. We considered it one of the best meetings we ever had in Sligo, and I understand that several persons there said the same.

"The same evening we took train to Clones, where we preached next day in the fair to a very large congregation. Here all was absolutely quiet. On Sunday we went out into the market-square in Athlone at 8.30 p.m., and preached by gaslight (as is now our wont in that town) to fully 500 people. For several Sunday evenings we have thus preached to congregations as orderly as in any church; but last Sunday we had considerable noise, owing to a drunken man making an exhibition of his folly. Monday, September 5, found us in the fair of Maryborough. Here, with our organ and a goodly team of singers, the square resounded with the praises of King Jesus. Several addresses were listened to, amid impressive silence. At the close, conversation with large numbers showed how our message had been grasped by the audience. We came away praising the Lord.

"On Friday we took the fair of Athenry. Our audience was small, but about fifty persons listened eagerly. Some youths enjoyed themselves in throwing missiles over the houses at us—an old saucepan fell at our feet and was broken to pieces. Then with a great thud among us; but, as ever, God was our shield and defence. Before we closed, He gave us the complete attention of all around.

"Yesterday we preached in the fair of Tuam. The people closed around us on every side. An old man tried to interrupt, but was told by many to cease. Never was service in Church more orderly or reverent; and, leaving, scores of voices, ready to sob, followed us with: 'Them was lovely words,' 'God bless you,' etc. How we thanked God and rejoiced before Him! The same evening we were again in Sligo. We sang and preached while we had strength, and God gave us unusual liberty in opening up the Scriptures concerning the plan of salvation. To-day we took the fair of Manorhamilton, where some hundreds of people gave us their deepest attention from beginning to end. On every side men seemed to feel the truth.

On Thursday we went again to Loughrea. The last time we were there, a man under the influence of drink did his utmost to create a riot, and furiously rushed horses among us, when our escape from serious injury was nothing short of miraculous. By patient continuance we wore out the opposition; but, on Thursday, we had not even a breath of opposition, while very many listened earnestly to our messages of the Saviour's love.

"To-day we were in T——. For some time the priests here have denounced us from their altar, and to-day they were present in full force, apparently guiding the opposition. A poor fellow tried to shout us down. The priests sought to drive away the people, but evidently the day for thus dealing with them has gone. We had a good force of friends with us; our Gospel songs floated over the large assemblage grandly, and the greater part of our addresses was heard distinctly. Though it was up-hill work, yet it was by no means discouraging. One could not help feeling that the contrast must tell powerfully for Christ. Help us to praise God!"

The travelling and other incidental expenses of this work have been over £25 per month during the past six months.

The Congregational Union.

By OUR COMMISSIONER.

THE sixtieth Autumnal Assembly opened at Bristol on Monday week, with a very large attendance of ministers and delegates. The Broadmead Chapel was crowded to the utmost for the devotional service and the annual sermon. Scripture was read and prayer offered by Rev. H. G. Hastings, M.A., of Rodborough, whose earnest petition for the welfare of the churches, and for the power of the Holy Ghost to fill all present with a passion for souls, struck a note to which the assembly heartily responded; as also the prayer for the Queen and her Ministers of State, under the awful responsibilities lying upon this nation in the present trial of war. The sermon was preached by Rev. Albert Goodrich, D.D. (Manchester), from the two texts—2 Cor. ii. 16, "Who is sufficient for these things?" and 2 Cor. iii. 5, "Our sufficiency is of God."

"These things," the preacher said, "referred to the practical aims for the reclamation of the world from sin." Dwelling on the vastness and variety and vitality of the evil to be faced, he compared it to the hydra, a monster of many heads. One head cut off made room only for another to spring up. The old infidelity of the early century killed, there has come in its place an even more deadly refinement of scepticism. The old brutality of sport has given place to new forms of selfishness and gambling. The highwayman of old is followed by promoters of fraudulent public companies; an effete evangelicalism has been followed by

A HAUGHTY SACERDOTALISM.

Even the Lord Jesus shrank for a moment as He faced the awful sin of the world; and how then shall we be sufficient for these things?

Another aspect of the evil was, he said, the possibility of our so handling even the Word of God as to corrupt it, or deal deceitfully with it. Will you, or will you not, submit to God in Christ—yea or nay? That must be the criterion of a true handling of the Word. Yet some so speak as to only titillate the ear, or interest the intellect, or please the fancy. And some so adulterate the doctrine of sin, that the sinner lays blame on heredity; or they deal with justification by faith in a way that represents God as a pettifogging attorney. Yet, if we fail in these things, who is to declare the mind of God? The apostolic answer comes to the question—our sufficiency is of God. Our hope must be in making our work and our methods, as Congregationalists, according to God's will. The chief instrument for bringing men and women into subjection to Christ is to be found in the churches of Christ—not as caves of superstition or machines of priestly tyranny, but as nourishers of a Divine life and homes of worship. Neglect the churches, and

THE KINGDOM WILL TARRY.

Again, our sufficiency is of God through our statement of his truth and Gospel. The Divine Word is the truth which man is feeling after, the medicine which his disease needs, the bread for which he hungers.

We must claim to be in the guidance of God. To discern the leading is not always easy, but God never forsakes his trusting ones. We have a great company also of God's people about us. With an apt recalling of Cromwell's appeal to Fairfax to love the Lord and his poor despised people, and to the Parliament to "own God's people more and more," the preacher urged the representatives of the churches to own one another, and to own themselves more and more, as not their own, but as God's people, through whom not man's but God's will is to be wrought.

Later, in the same building, there gathered a partly fresh, but equally large, audience for the temperance meeting, under the auspices of the Congregational Total Abstinence Society. Rev. Urijah Thomas presided, and introduced a deputation from the Bristol Temperance Society and Gospel Temperance Union. Mr. J. S. Fry met with a hearty welcome from the audience on rising to deliver an address. He referred at the outset to the great awakening on these matters that had come over the conscience of Christians, and prophesied that the change would continue. He felt that legislative interference was but appealed to workers of all shades of opinion to concentrate on some one part of the reform in view.

Professor Adeney then followed in a capital speech, pointing to the signs of progress since the England of the Georges, of Fielding's novels and Hogarth's pictures, and even of Charles Dickens' easy-going treatment of drinking; yet giving warning with the serious facts as to the enormously increased drink bill, the increase in drinking among women, and the palatial enlargement of public-houses in all our towns. He appealed for total abstinence as a new custom to assist the reclamation of the drunkard. Other speakers were Mr. H. J. Wilson, M. P., and Rev. Pedr Williams. The sermon and temperance meetings were a splendid beginning of the week's deliberations.

The assembly on Tuesday morning again presented a very animated appearance. The building has been recently redecorated and fitted with electric light &c. The Chairman for the year, Rev. H. Arnold Thomas, M.A., of Bristol, delivered a thoughtful address on

"THE VALUE OF RELIGION."

He began by a survey of the range of activities and organizations which are usually cited as evidence that religion is not a decaying force amongst us. Yet great ecclesiastical movements, activity in church and school building, the extension of what is known as the religious press, and even such movements as Free Church Federation and the raising of twentieth century funds, are not necessarily indications of a genuine and vigorous religious life. Symbolism may indicate the hunger of the soul for God, but also, it may only be a substitute for fellowship with Him. Aggressive energy may be only the activity of worldly men about a religion in which they do not believe. Real religion is, in the words of Jesus, the worship of the Father in spirit and in truth; it is to be willing and anxious to be reconciled through Christ, it is personal faith and fellowship with Him.

The great interests of the churches in raising funds and seeking religious equality, and promoting peace, and temperance, and social reform, must have attention, yet what we and the world need most is GOD. This is the profound need of the soul. Charges of "otherworldliness," of seeking to benefit souls rather than bodies, are a criticism strangely wide of the mark. We are in terrible danger of assuming that the poor do not appreciate truths concerning God and the Divine life; yet this is our mission even more than to reform their surroundings, to bring them righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

At the close of the address a statement in behalf of the Church Aid Society was made by Rev. J. J. Poynter, of Oswestry; and Rev. W. Pierce, of West Hampstead, who has returned from a visit to the churches in British Guiana, reported that the work there is in a distinctly hopeful condition.

On Tuesday evening a great public meeting in the interest of the Twentieth Century Fund was held. Mr. Edmund Holt, of Manchester who presided, intimated that since the secretaryship of the Fund had been taken up by Mr. Rutherford, great progress had been made. Ninety churches in London alone had consented to co-operate, and 400 churches altogether; and there had been seventy meetings specially arranged to make the fund known. It is desired by the fund to express gratitude to God for our denominational ancestry—three centuries of men enduring torture, imprisonment, and death, who would "rather burn than turn," to secure freedom and spirituality of faith. A vigorous address was delivered by who said the fund would be a test of the Christianity of the churches at the end of this century. If it were a movement of rivalry merely, or vainglory, the sooner it were dropped the better. The only question is, not as to millions, or half-millions, but in the money going to do God's work in the new situation which the labours of our fathers have made for us.

After the singing of "Take my life, and let it be—Consecrated, Lord, to Thee," Dr. R. F. Horton spoke. "You never (he said) can reach the spirit through the pocket, but you can always reach the pocket through the spirit. We must first raise the spirit of the churches. This appeal should go throughout the land as

A GREAT CALL TO REVIVAL.

The attendance was so great that an overflow meeting was held at the Old King Street Baptist Chapel, presided over by Mr. Hooper, and addressed by Dr. Horton and Dr. Rogers.

On Wednesday morning, a largely attended communion service for the ministers and delegates was held in the Presbyterian Church. Rev. Urijah Thomas presided, and gave a short address. A collection was taken for the Widows' and Orphans' Fund.

Later on, business began with an address by Dr. Bruce, of Huddersfield, on "The Second International Congregational Council, Boston, U.S.A." He said the impression produced on American opinion by the various papers, addresses, sermons, &c., was that the Americans were perhaps more keen in emphasizing the most advanced positions of scholarship and theology, but were less clear in their affirmation of the fundamental truths of the Gospel which survive all criticism than were the British delegates.

A paper was then read by Rev. H. Elvet Lewis, of Highbury, on "Congregationalism during the Nineteenth Century"; and an address on similar lines was given by Rev. A. T. Viner, of Oldham.

A deputation from the Churches of Bristol was then introduced, the Bishop of Bristol (Dr. G. F. Browne) representing the Church of England; Rev. W. B. Cooper, M.A. (Presbyterian); and Rev. Dr. Glover (Baptist), representing the Bristol Council of the Free Churches. The Bishop said that, speaking not only face to face, but heart to heart, he would say there, what on other occasions he might not say, that he prayed every night and every morning, that God might bless every Christian work done in that great diocese in the true Spirit of Christ, and that they might all be brought nearer to one another in being brought nearer to Him.

On Wednesday afternoon, in connection with the Congregational Total Abstinence Association, a reception to temperance workers was given by Mr. J. S. Fry. At this gathering, an important resolution was moved by Rev. J. Hilton Stowell, of Stroud Green, recommending the executive of the Association to formulate a scheme, by which efforts shall be made throughout the churches to secure, during the next year, as a twentieth century effort. This it is proposed to accomplish in conjunction with the Baptist Total Abstinence Association, who have undertaken the effort to secure a quarter of the million, and are appealing to other denominations to combine with them in this forward movement.

In the evening there was a Children's Mass Meeting in Broadmead Chapel, and, later, a closely packed and enthusiastic gathering in the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, to bid farewell to the outgoing missionaries of the L.M.S. The Chairman (Mr. J. S. Fry) reaffirmed the truth that a living church must be a missionary church. Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, the the foreign secretary of the Society, introduced a number of missionaries going to various spheres of labour.

After the singing of "Lord speak to me that I may speak," the valedictory prayer was offered by Rev. Herbert Arnold, of Exeter, and the valedictory message was given by Rev. Samuel Pearson, of Manchester.

On Thursday a paper was read by Rev. W. S. Houghton, of Edgbaston, on the "Misuse of the Lord's Day;" and another, by Rev. J. Hirst Hollowell, of Rochdale, on the "Degradation of Sport."

There were over 1,100 delegates present at the meetings.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, October 29. 2 Chron. iv.

JOIN massiveness of conception with delicacy of texture and beauty of design, in all your Christian service. If the great molten sea be an hand-breadth thick, and able to contain three thousand baths, see that its brim is wrought like the flower of a lily (5).

Do not be penurious and cheeseparing in what you do and give for God. It is not necessary to find out the weight of the brass. Freely ye have received; freely give. Only Judas counted how much the box of alabaster must have cost (18).

And remember that the gold must be perfect gold. Even the snuffers, and the basons, the spoons and the firepans, the commonest and meanest parts of life's furniture must be worthy of the great King.

Probably the one element in the soul-life which refines and ennobles it, rendering it so prolific in its gifts, is Hope. It is like the philosopher's stone, which transmutes ordinary and common metals to gold. It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of God. The hope that God would come in to tenant his new-made temple, animated Solomon in his toils; and the hope, which is a certainty, that God will accept our least efforts as grateful to his heart, may well encourage us to put our best into all we do.

MONDAY, October 30. 2 Chron. v.

What an eloquent chapter! We seem to see that great retinue of elders and princes, gathered around Solomon, to convey the ark to its resting place; the procession through the old, tortuous streets; the altars which lined the route, from which the smoke of sacrifice ascended; the setting down of the ark beneath the cherubic wings; the singers and the trumpets of the priests, making one sound, so that the city must have grown still with listening. And then the glory of the Lord. But why has it all passed away, as a dream, as the cloud-palaces of sunset? Ah, all this was only a stepping-stone, a preamble, a preparation for a spiritual reality which may be thine and mine, in our innermost experience.

It pleased Him that in nature, or in grace,
Seed-germ, or soul, toward Him, should all things grow.
Reaching, aspiring, from beginnings small,
Till the sweet day when Christ is all in all,
And we his will shall know.

And, as we read these glowing words, may we not ask ourselves whether their counterpart has ever been our experience? Have the Ark of the Covenant and the holy vessels ever come within our souls, amid sacrifices and expressions of adoration, that could not be counted? Have all the properties of our nature joined in song, making one harmonious sound? Has our soul ever been filled with the glory of the Lord? What though that glory be enwrapt in folds of cloud, so that we could hardly stand before the sense of Divine Presence and Power, as when the holy Halyburton asked God to stay his hand, lest nature should faint, overpowered with the weight of glory; yet to have had one such infilling lifts all after experiences to an unwonted level of blessedness and power.

TUESDAY, October 31. 2 Chron. vi.

God keeps covenant and mercy for his servants. But He will that we should say to Him, Let thy word be verified (17). This is the spirit of true prayer. Taking our stand on the promises of God, we spread forth our hands towards heaven and say, "O Lord, who keepest . . . who has kept . . . keep."

In hours when we are afraid of the enemy and avenger, He will vindicate us. In hours when we are smitten down before the enemy, He will restore us, bringing us again into the position we have forfeited. In hours when we have missed the early and latter rain through our sins, so that the soil is caked and ungenerous to the plough, He will send rain. In hours when the consciousness of plague and chastisement is upon us, and our hearts fail for fear, He will forgive us. When lonely and strange, when carried captive and oppressed, when entering on a new and untrodden way, He will not leave us orphans, but come and mightily succour us.

It is in hours like these that we pray best. Our sins and sorrows, our sharp and bitter pains, are the rough sheep-dogs that drive us from straying to the shepherd's side. There is no sort of need in your life which may not be met by prayer, no place from which prayer may not arise.

With us, however, the place to which we turn our eyes is no earthly structure, however splendid; no human priest however merciful. We look towards the presence-chamber of the eternal God, our Father, where Jesus stands to represent and plead for us.

Make then your wants and wishes known,
He will present them at the throne,
And angel bands are waiting there,
His messages of love to bear.

WEDNESDAY, November 1. 2 Chron. vii.

God's Fire is the Holy Ghost. He has come down from heaven, and is burning on the heart of the Church. We too often ask that He may be sent, we need eyes to see the sure evidence of his presence. If, instead of looking back on the blessed past, or counting on a yet distant future, we would dare to believe that the spirit was amongst us, and would bring to Him our sacrifices of consecration and thanksgiving, we should more often, like Israel, break into adoring songs and say: God is good, his mercy endured for ever.

The numbers of the sacrifices which Solomon offered seem prodigious, until we remember that only a very small portion of each was offered to God, and used to feed the sacrificial flame. The greater part was consumed by the offerers. Thus it befell that a great provision was made for the entertainment of the vast crowds, which had gathered from all places to that mighty dedication service. It is very reassuring to see how God took up the particular points which Solomon had made in his prayer. One by one He seems to enumerate, to go over them again, in order to assure us that He is very mindful of each petition his children offer. They may forget what they have asked, but He does not forget. They may carry away a vague and confused outline of their engagements with Him, but to Him each feature is of deep and permanent interest. And is it not just to apply these words to our Lord Jesus, and to all prayer offered in his name—"Mine eyes shall be open, and mine ears attend to every prayer that is made in his name. Mine eyes and mine heart are there continually."

THURSDAY, November 2. 2 Chron. viii.

In this chapter we are taken to the confines of Solomon's kingdom from north to south. In the far north, Hamath and Tadmor. In the far south, the port of Ezion-geber. We learn, too, of his store-cities and chariots, of his officers and the levies of Canaanites, of his careful regulation of the ritual of God's House. But surely a greater than Solomon is here.

There is an infinite difference between the Lord Jesus and the best of all the sons of men. They can help us to a certain point by their prowess on the field of battle, their gifts, their efficiency as kings, statesmen, soldiers; but only Jesus would die for us, and in dying put away our sins. Christ's empire is founded on his cross, his self-sacrifice, his love; whilst the greatest empires, of which his world has been the scene, have been founded on force, on force like Solomon's, and through force they have fallen. It is an indisputable axiom that those who take the sword perish by it.

"I know men," said Napoleon; "and I tell you that Jesus is not a man. Everything in Him amazes me. Comparison is impossible between Him and any other being in the world. He is truly a being by Himself. His ideas and sentiments, the truth He announces, his manner of convincing, are all beyond humanity and the natural order of things. . . . Cæsar, Charlemagne, and I founded great empires, but upon what did the creations of our genius depend? Upon force. Jesus alone founded his empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for Him." How impossible to suppose that Jews could have invented the character of our Lord! Their notion of a great Messiah was always borrowed from the reign of Solomon; they could not have conceived of the Son of God as a poor man and an outcast.

FRIDAY, November 3. 2 Chron. ix.

Do you want to know Christ? Imitate this noble queen, who yet stooped to travel to his court and learn of Solomon. Come in person as she did. She might have sent an ambassador, but she came herself. She would be satisfied with no one else. Not one of Solomon's mighty men would serve her purpose; she must speak with Solomon. See to it that you are content with nothing short of Christ. She told all that was in her heart. Tell Jesus all: He cannot be surprised, for He knows it already; but He waits to hear it from your own lips.

"Tell not half thy story,
But the whole."

If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. Propose to Christ your hard questions: how such a rebel as you are can be justified, how righteousness and peace can kiss each other, how He is able to be just and the Justifier. And be sure to listen to all his answers, which are weighted with gold and frankincense. Take a good long look at the house which He is building—the Church. Observe the meat of his table, for his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed. See how well apparelled, and how blessed, his servants are.

And when you have considered all these things, confess that the half was never told of his glorious majesty; turn to bless God, as revealed to you in Jesus, and give Him of your treasures. Souls that know the beauty of Jesus are glad to give Him all they have. There are no such spices as those which come from those who have but lately seen his preciousness. And Jesus will never remain long in your debt. We give Him pence, He returns pounds. We give years of labour, He gives an eternity of bliss. He opens to us his royal bounty, and gives all that is in our hearts to request. Oh, let us talk of the fame of Jesus, as men did of Solomon's! He exceeds all that men have ever said or heard.

SATURDAY, November 4. 2 Chron. x.

It was a surly answer, and Rehoboam richly deserved its consequences; but "the cause was of God." The King, in following an evil counsel, and the Hebrew people, each acted as free agents, obeying their own will and passions. But God was in it, contriving that the alienation of a considerable part of the kingdom should be a punishment on the house of David for Solomon's apostacy. "The cause was of God." How clearly these words prove the immediate superintendence of God's providence over the revolutions of kingdoms, and the results of international disputes. In reviewing our own history, we must often admit that the cause was of God, that the outcome of human passion was to execute what God before determined, and by the mouth of his servants predicted, should be done, and what was for our good.

Or do not think that your sufferings, your losses, your bitter heritage of pain, are wholly the result of misguided and desperate human passion, defying control; but that beneath and through all there has run a Divine purpose. The cause has been of God!

You are being trained, it has been said, for an endless destiny, for the companionship of angels, the celestial service of God; and it is needful that your nascent sins should be rebuked, that evil habits should be curbed, and that the pruning-knife be applied to the redundant woody growth of your self-life. Therefore it is that God uses secondary causes, the interposition of natural agents. All is under law, all is writing out his will; but beneath the flag of human inclination and the clash of human antagonism we will henceforth dare to believe that myriads of agents are simply doing what He chooses, effecting in us results which will compensate us one day, when we have become partakers of his holiness.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

OPENING MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

MONDAY of last week (October 16) was the day set for the beginning of the evangelistic meetings of the Campaign. But, as a number of the preachers had already arrived in the city, advantage was taken of the special opportunity, presented by the Sabbath evening, to open the missions in several of the churches—Barony Free, Gorbals Free, and Camphill United Presbyterian being among the number.

The Campaign being entirely an extra effort, the work at the various halls of the Evangelistic Association is not included in the arrangements. Still the meetings at these centres are to be carried on with full vigour throughout the winter, and in Sabbath's gatherings there were evidences of the new movement. The Tent Hall accommodated four great audiences. Mr. WILLIAM THOMSON, jun., spoke to the usual full hall at the Free Breakfast; Mr. J. W. VAN DE VENTER (from London) gave one of his "Chalk Talks" to a thoroughly attentive throng of children, at the Free Dinner; the hall was crowded an extra time in the afternoon, when Mr. HENRY VARLEY gave a lectures on "The Curse of Manhood," to men only; and in the evening Mr. CHARLES INGLIS opened an evangelistic mission, his request at the close for indications from those who "had the faintest desire to be saved" being responded to from every part of the hall. Mr. GEORGE CLARKE also had a crowded audience at the Y.M.C.A. meeting in Bothwell Street, when his subject was "True Manhood, and How to Attain It."

The beginning of the week saw no fewer than twenty-one missions in full working order, ten being intended for adults, and eleven specially arranged and adapted for children. Rev. JOHN MCNEILL began work in Free St. Matthew's Church (Dr. James Stalker), where from the onset the audiences were large enough to call from him

EXPRESSIONS OF THANKSGIVING.

He first called attention to the great object lesson that was given to the world, from the simple fact of so many churches being opened simultaneously for aggressive work. Speaking from his world-wide experience of such efforts, he again gave expression to the belief that the Lord has in many ways set his seal on the movement, and that the Christian people of the city are gathering round in a manner he has never seen equalled in any other city. Referring to his brethren in the ministry, he said he had always worked in company with them; and, although they might not be seen in great numbers in the general audiences, they were busy promoting the work in other ways, working unitedly in the fullest sympathy for the one great end.

He pointedly contrasted the calm, reserved demeanour of so many of our church members, when spiritual matters are concerned, with the enthusiasm and active interest manifested at such times as elections; he called for them, while remaining "as quiet as Presbyterians can be, to be pithy and to the purpose, to be propagandists in the best sense,

TO PUSH THIS BUSINESS."

Deprecating strongly the idea that Gospel services were best fitted for poor or slum districts, and should be reserved for these, he declared that no part of the city needed the preaching of the simple Gospel more than the West End squares and terraces near which they were gathered—"Decent, respectable, well-dressed Death, Death, DEATH."

Speaking on the "Healing of the Man with the Withered Hand" (Mark iii.), he drew a graphic picture, with the dark background showing the bad-heartedness of the world, as represented by the Pharisees, in the fore-front standing Jesus, in his grace and sympathy and power to save, "like a star shining in the blackness of a mid-night sky." In the special circumstances of the gathering, it had been arranged that no after-meeting should be held that evening; but all the Lord's people who had experience in dealing with the anxious were invited to come to the front, to be enrolled for the purpose, and to receive "workers' cards," as it was desired that all who were giving help in this way should be in direct communication with the committee.

Further west, a mission was carried on in Whiteinch Free Church, under the leadership of Mr. ARTHUR KLEIN, B.A. In the Barony Free Church (Rev. D. S. Macdonald), Castle Street—a church born in revival times, and which has ever since been in the fore-front of the fight—Mr. HUGH PATON (of the South Morocco Mission) was speaker for the week. Rev. John Alexander (Chaplain of Glasgow Prison) presided over the meeting on Tuesday evening, and Miss MARY KERR provided an additional element in the presentation of the truth through her minstry of song.

It had been mentioned that one mother had sent in a request for prayer on behalf of her son, when two other women presented similar petitions, and a man asked that his brother be remembered. Then, from a corner, came the voice of a man, tremulously asking, on his own behalf, an interest in the supplications; and, on this becoming known, and the question being asked whether there were any others, ten men and women signified their desire. After the requests had been most earnestly pleaded before the Throne, a third meeting was held, when all who were in a state of concern were pointed to the Saviour on the Cross. We had a deep sense of the very presence of God throughout the whole evening. It was noteworthy that the expression of the wish for fuller knowledge began in the audience, and not on the platform.

On other evenings Mr. MACROSTIE (late of the Ayrshire Christian Union) rendered valuable aid as a song preacher.

The large meetings in the Hillhead division have agreeably surprised many. In Wellington United Presbyterian Church (Rev. James Black, D.D., minister), University Avenue, Rev. CHARLES SPURGEON (Greenwich) has addressed large and influential audiences each evening from Tuesday to Friday. Parable and miracle were vividly pictured by Mr. Spurgeon, his address being full of imagery and illustration.

Mr. JAMES MARSHALL has been labouring, with marked success, in Trinity Free Church. On Thursday, the pastor (Rev. Norman Macpherson), when presenting a touching petition for prayer on behalf of a backsliding husband, expressed his gratitude for the way in which God has been manifesting his presence and cheering the hearts of his people. The results have been extremely gratifying, and have sent the workers to their knees with thanksgivings.

Another mission in the East End has been carried on by Mr. George Clarke, in Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church. To the south of the River Clyde, Rev. J. Rorke (Newcastle) has been in Fairfield United Presbyterian Church, Copeland Road; Mr. T. W. Canning, in Plantation Church, Cornwall Street; Mr. Henry Varley, in Gorbals Free Church, South Portland Street; and Rev. D. M. Cameron (London), in Camphill Church, Crosshill. For the river-side and dock population, a special mission is in progress in the Seamen's Bethell, Eaglesham Street, under the charge of Mr. William Thomson, jun. Accounts are being received from all the centres, of blessing in rich measure, with "signs following."

The Boys and Girls.

Among the children more diversity of method is being used. Blackboard work, lantern illustrations, and simple addresses are going on at different centres. We found Mr. J. PATON, on Tuesday, telling over again—to a splendid audience gathered in Alexandra Parade United Presbyterian Church—in the most simple and effective way, the lessons from the experience of the Prodigal while he was in the far country as well as on his return to the Father's home. No choir was visible, no apparatus was in use, yet the children were thoroughly aroused, and giving close attention to the speaker. So well, indeed, had the work begun, that an apology was made for having allowed the after meeting, on the opening night, to overrun the hour fixed by the committee for closing all juvenile gatherings.

Mr. THOMAS M. PRATT has for many years been known as a specialist in the preparation and use of cartoon and lantern illustrations for Gospel addresses. The use of the Gospel lantern is not for purposes of entertainment, the majority of the slides containing texts (on which close attention is thus rivetted) and verses of hymns, while the actual pictures are well-chosen illustrations of the lesson being taught. On Wednesday evening, when we made our way to Free Anderston Church, the minister (Rev. Dr. Adamson) was actively leading a good body of helpers in arranging the children. Particularly at the juvenile meetings it is noticeable how leading citizens and grey-headed elders vie with younger men in acting as ushers and door-keepers. Large numbers of boys and girls from the schools and academies in the West End have been coming to this centre.

The workers of the Sabbath School Union took the responsibility of a mission in East Campbell Street Free Church, and on Thursday evening we saw the church filled with a typical gathering of East End children. Despite the lateness of the season, not a few were there without shoes or stockings, yet in the best of spirits. Mr. Nimmo is taking them through the experience of Bunyan's Pilgrim, with the aid of lime-light illustrations, and it was evident that the story has lost none of its fascination for youthful minds. Christian and Faithful had just parted again from Evangelist and were on the point of entering Vanity Fair. The ready responses proved that the text—"He that overcometh shall inherit all things"—was being appreciated in a full and true sense.

A third method of appealing to the youthful minds was the "Chalk Talking," carried on by Mr. J. W. VAN DE VENTER in St. George's Cross Tabernacle. Pastor Findlay and Mr. David J. Knox have lent active and valuable aid. The audiences have been gathered from a number of Sabbath schools in the neighbourhood, and a large amount of genuine interest has been manifested.

Friday being the closing night, the lesson took the form of an acrostic on the word "Friend." The children were asked to give adjectives, beginning with each letter, which might be applied to the friendship of Jesus. After a number had been collected and written on the board, all who had made a profession of conversion were invited to rise and describe their experience of the Lord as a Friend by the use of one of the words. Fifty or sixty did so, and in their enthusiasm soon got beyond the words provided.

NOTE AND INCIDENT.

The Campaign has been divided into fortnightly missions, and one of the most important gatherings is when the Preachers' Committee meets on the Monday mornings before beginning with the evangelists and the ministers of the churches in which they are to speak, for prayer and conference.

At the mid-day prayer meeting on Tuesday, Mr. McNeill said that some people had a desperate fear of a crowd. It looked as if the emptier the church the holier they thought it was. The quiet of deadly dulness was heaven to them. Well, tastes differed. He preferred to see the pews filled with low, dirty, ragged people. Many, in fact, sent the multitude away, so as to eat their own little feast, without any regard for the heathen abroad or the heathen at their own doors.

One evangelist, looking down on a well-dressed congregation on his opening night, remarked to the minister of the church, that this did not seem like a field for evangelistic Conference at Glasgow.

THE fruit of experience in spiritual work has been pithily put—"much prayer, much blessing; little prayer, little blessing." So, indeed, it proved in the twentieth annual Conference recently held in St. George's Cross Tabernacle, Glasgow. There had been much prayer, resulting in much blessing. Pastor Findlay, who presided over the large gatherings, testified to the wonderfully definite way in which prayer had been answered. A singularly fruitful three weeks' mission at the Tabernacle had just concluded, the evangelist being Mr. Hugh Paton, of the Southern Morocco Mission. Some had yielded to Christ as the Word was being preached. At the Conference, Mr. Paton also spoke with great power, the burden of his messages being the need for the new birth, and real conversion to God.

Mr. J. Stuart Holden, B.A., of Cambridge, whose ministry was so blessed last year, was again much used of God in all his addresses. The great and all-inclusive need of every Christian, the Pentecostal gift of the Holy Ghost, has been laid heavily upon his servant's heart. The word on this theme (from John iv. 10; vii. 37-39), spoken in great power and tenderness, fell into prepared hearts, marking, we believe, a blessed crisis in not a few lives. Dr. Duncan Main (C.M.S.), of Hang Chow, who was warmly welcomed as an old Tabernacle worker, graphically described Medical Mission work in China. He told of a mandarin, who, after being treated for several weeks in hospital, said to him: "Doctor, you have come to me every day, twice a day, to care for my healing, and you have never mentioned money. Why is this?" The doctor told him that it was not for money, but for Jesus' sake that he did so, and that he might learn to know the Saviour. That man was not only cured in body, but converted to God.

Mrs. Baker, of Rochester, U.S.A., who has recently spent seven months in India with that noble woman, Pundita Ramabai, eloquently pleaded, not only for the work among child-widows and famine orphans, but for a work just begun—a Refuge for poor outcast fallen girls. A suitable building for this, which will cost £2,000, is urgently wanted. Dr. Churcher spoke of the work in North Africa, and Pastor Fanstone of the need of Brazil. An interesting feature on Saturday was four ten minutes' addresses from committee-representatives of the great Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign just commencing. Mr. J. W. Arthur gave details of the plan, and thanked God for the unanimity of the Committees in all their meetings. Rev. J. Bell Henderson (St. Vincent Parish Church) also spoke of the unity of the Spirit, and of how stumbling-blocks had been taken out of the way.

Rev. Jas. Muir (Cowcaddens Free Church) regarded it as a token for good, that two men had been converted at the former campaign meeting held at the Tabernacle. While critics and enemies to the Gospel were sneeringly asking, "Where is thy God?" let us, in the spirit of the prophet, ask the Lord, "Where is the Lord God of Elijah, the God of '59, of '74?" and he will come with power amongst us. Mr. John Anderson (Bible Training Institute) reviewed the forces arrayed against the Gospel, and exhorted to confidence in God and the need for our giving ourselves unceasingly to prayer.

P.W.

Mission Church, Orient Street, Liverpool.—The recently issued account of work carried on at the above centre, in unconventional but earnest fashion, gives some interesting instances of evangelistic effort. Both the open-air and indoor branches of the work have been blessed. A Romanist lady and a number of young men and women have professed conversion.

"Out and Out" Conference.—The annual gathering, under the above title, for Christian young men and lads was held on the 14th inst., in the Y.W.C.A. Hall, New Bridge Street, Manchester. There was a large gathering of representatives from the neighbouring towns of Lancashire, and the meetings were attended with blessing. Stirring addresses were delivered by Dr. Harry Guinness, and Pastor Geo. Soltau gave instructive Bible readings.

A "Missionary Day."

"MISSIONARY DAY" at the Conference Hall, Strangeways, Manchester, has long been a red-letter day to the friends of foreign missions in Manchester. The day began with breakfast, at which the Bishop of Manchester spoke some weighty words, showing the obligation resting on the Christian Church of all denominations to give far more to the cause of foreign missions than has yet been realized.

The opening meeting for prayer, held later, was presided over by Preb. MacDonald. Mr. Walter Sloan (C.I.M.), in a brief, pointed address, pressed home on each soul the necessity of getting hold of God in definite believing prayer. The keynote of his words was "First the Kingdom." While we thank God, in conscious assurance of ultimate victory, that it is "our Father's good pleasure to give us the Kingdom," we must in humble obedient faith take it.

At the general meeting, at eleven o'clock, Mr. Leonard Shaw opened, as in former years reading Psa. lxxii., and Bishop Tugwell followed with an address on verses 17-19. Very triumphantly the three "shalls" rang out; "His name shall endure for ever," "his name shall be continued," "men shall be blessed in Him."

Every heart surely was thrilled as the Bishop reminded us that Christ's Kingdom is the only remaining one of those which existed at the time of his crucifixion. Having dwelt upon the perpetuity, universality, and extension of our Lord's kingdom, the Bishop went on to speak of West Africa, its needs and opportunities, and appealed earnestly for prayer.

Dr. Harry Guinness followed with an account of his visit to Peru, and of work organized there in spite of priestly opposition. In the afternoon, Dr. Guinness was again the speaker. This time "The Congo" was his subject, and our hearts were full of praise as he told us of much and much ground for hope. There are about 2,000 church members, and yet some have dared to call the lives laid down "wasted."

India's needs and claims came next, and were earnestly pleaded by Miss Lucy Guinness. Truly the statistics are appalling. England shows an average of 800 people to every ordained minister; in India 165,000 to every worker, male and female; and in some districts in Behar there are millions without one missionary. Truly the Master may once again ask: "Lovest thou Me?"

Mr. Shaw mentioned that the children in the Refuge and various Homes had contributed over £37 to the special missionary fund, which maintains two "our own" missionaries in China and India. The closing speaker was Rev. H. H. Pullen, who described the work of the Spezia Mission, which includes the instruction of over 1,000 children.

At six o'clock a goodly company listened to Mrs. Baker's thrilling story of Pundita Ramabai's work among Indian widows, and her special need of help during the present time of famine. Then Mrs. Longhurst Ward pleaded for the training of Eurasian girls as missionaries in India, and a great burden of spirit came upon us as we heard once more of the 20,000,000 of child widows, whose lives know no love, no sunshine, but whom Jesus can save and satisfy. The hour passed all too quickly, and then came the evening general meeting. Bishop Tugwell spoke on Luke ix. 51—our Lord's steadfast determination to do his Father's will at all costs; and St. Paul's exhortation to us, "Be ye steadfast" (1 Cor. xv. 58). The Bishop dwelt on the work of the Native Church of West Africa, on the need of the Hausa country, asking prayer for the pioneer band to start in December; and then sought to arouse the consciences of Manchester men against the rapid extension of the terrible liquor traffic into the interior.

Miss Guinness' text was Rev. iii. 8, and she showed how God has practically written it over the whole world. China, Japan, India, South America, Africa—all doors are wide open. Following this came a searching personal word from the Chairman, Preb. MacDonald, as the offertory was taken up.

Mr. Walter Sloan delivered the last address, and China occupied our thoughts—poor, perplexed, struggling China; and yet China, in this her hour of marvellous opportunity, the greatest she has ever known. Then, with a definite appeal for unreserved and whole-hearted consecration to God, the missionary day ended. But, as the search-light of God has shown us our failure in living, in loving, in giving, and, above all, in praying, we say, "O God, be merciful unto us and bless us, that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations."

Manchester Convention.

"JESUS HIMSELF"—such is the abiding impression left on the heart of a visitor to the annual Convention held at Star Hall, Manchester, from October 10 to 15. Not that the teaching was not of a definite and precise, doctrinal character; far from it, but the doctrine was felt to be really subordinate, and wholly conducive to the exaltation of Jesus. Revs. Andrew Allan, of Hull; G. C. Grubb; and J. K. Nuttall, of Liverpool, gave searching messages of no uncertain sound.

There was also Rev. Thomas Waugh, evangelist of the Wesleyan Connexion, who moved his audience as he spoke from large experience of the power of the Spirit in actual labour for souls, and urged his hearers to claim the Pentecostal gift. Mr. H. E. Govan's messages, perhaps, were more characteristically Scotch, and Mr. Millard's addresses were in his own happy vein; so that we had due variety. Mrs. Bramwell Booth ministered to us one day, and some part was taken in the meetings by Miss Crossley, Miss Hatch, and Mr. Bayliffe. The definite teaching of the earlier stages advanced to a large magnifying of Divine grace in the latter part of the Convention; and in the final testimony meeting, the prevailing note was one marked, by what Tersteegen termed, "the valuable love of self-contempt," with great confidence and exultation in the Almighty Saviour.

Nor was the practical side of Christian service forgotten. Italy's needs, and those of the women of India, were portrayed by Mr. Pullen, of the Spezia Mission, by Mrs. Ward, of Madras, and by Mrs. E. Baker, who represented the excellent work of Pundita Ramabai. Stirring open-air effort, among the needy folk of the neighbourhood, was conducted in the intervals between the meetings, and the great gathering in the hall on Sunday night closed with many sinners seeking the Saviour. The good work at "the Star" seems to go on with unabated energy, though the loved president has been called "up higher;" and it was felt to be a real privilege to hold happy fellowship with God's labourers in this corner of the great field.

Metropolitan Tabernacle.—The Evangelists Association held its annual meeting a few days ago in the Pastors' College, Rev. Thos. Spurgeon presiding. From the secretary's report, it appeared that, during the year, the Society had conducted 2,022 services, chiefly in London chapels and mission halls. Extracts from other reports showed that successful work had also been accomplished at the Association's centres in adjoining counties. An earnest and prayerful spirit has been manifest among the brethren, which augurs well for the future success of the Society.

Meals for the Poor.—The excellent work carried on these thirty-three years in connection with the "Dinner Table and Soup Kitchen," at Paddington Street, Marylebone, is to be continued during the coming winter. It is the only institution of its kind in the neighbourhood, and applicants come from many of the parishes around for the hot and nourishing meals provided there. Visitors are welcome at any time during the dinner hour, when they can see for themselves the way in which the work is carried on. Soup, meat dinners, rice, milk, and beef tea, will be provided each day in the week, as heretofore. Communications may be addressed to Lady Thompson, 35, Wimpole Street, W.

Manchester Wesleyan Mission

THE eleventh annual report of this well-known work is just to hand. It is a volume of 240 pages, full of thrilling interest. Fact is ever stranger than fiction, and certainly the record here given of achievement, in the face of enormous difficulty, of the transformation effected in the lives of most notorious men and women of the worst classes, constitutes a story of the most fascinating kind.

The book itself is well printed and copiously illustrated from interesting photographs of the work and workers, and is for sale at 1s. per copy.

The influence of the Mission is wide-spread, and it radiates from nine preaching centres, seven Sunday schools, and the various headquarters of social activity, viz.: Hood Street Home, Casual Ward, Labour Yard, Preventive Home for Girls, Women's Night Shelter, and Medical Mission.

Each of these places has a separate staff of workers, although all are under the direction of the versatile and energetic superintendent, Rev. S. F. Collier. The committee encourage each department to and an examination of the accounts shows that of the £8,142 raised during the last year, £5,021 were contributed by the people on the spot. Bearing in mind the necessarily heavy expense of such work, and the character of the people reached, this is a most encouraging statement.

There is but one object in all the work, viz., the salvation of the people through faith in the crucified Redeemer; but for convenience, it is divided into two classes—the directly evangelistic, and the social work.

The former is the never-varying characteristic of what may perhaps be termed the ordinary church work of the Mission. In each of the nine halls or chapels the old Gospel is constantly preached with a view to immediate and definite results, and rarely if ever is a service held in which some soul is not led into the kingdom. The converts are immediately enlisted for service, and encouraged to a growth in Grace. The membership now stands at 2,857, an increase on the year of 226. In addition to these full members there are 897 "on trial," and 751 in junior classes.

The order of services for the Central Hall alone is perfectly astonishing. There are no fewer than thirty-two meetings of various kinds arranged for the Sunday, nine for Monday, eight for Tuesday, eight for Wednesday, six for Thursday, four for Friday, and six for Saturday.

Never in the history of the Mission (says the report) has the work of the Central Hall been more varied or successful than during the past year. Congregations have been maintained, and where possible increased. On one Sunday evening (and the incident is typical), the preacher spoke, in the prayer meeting which always follows the service, to a publican; an ex-local preacher, fallen through drink; a theatre proprietor; an avowed sceptic; a Greek scholar, who is now an earnest seeker after truth; a notoriety hunter, journeying round the world for a wager from San Francisco, and receiving only such food and lodgings as are offered (this man was amongst the Sunday afternoon casuals); in addition to many men from lodging-houses and tramp wards. All sorts and conditions of men are found in the Central Hall service. The crowd is such a one as the Mission exists to gather and to save. Nor is the genuine working man absent. He and his class frequent the Mission services to an amazing extent. Some Sunday evenings the proportion of men, especially young men, present is remarkable.

It is estimated that 14,000 persons attend the services at the various branches of the Mission every week. These immense congregations are gathered together by the hundreds of voluntary workers going out into the highways and hedges and compelling them to come in.

By means of innumerable small services and meetings held in lodging-houses, cottages, work-rooms, railway yards, and the open air, these workers, numbering over 1,000, the Gospel message is carried to over 15,000 of those outside the pale of ordinary church influence.

The regular visitation of the Sisterhood counts for a good deal in the same direction. The Sisters meet with and often have the joy of leading such to Him who alone can save. Let one illustration, from the many given, suffice.

The wife of a publican had found her way to the Central Hall. Hers was a sad history. Early in life she had left a good home to marry the man with home she still lived, but her experience had been a prolonged misery. Her husband constantly ill-treated her. She was compelled to serve behind the public-house bar, a thing she hated with the strength of her whole being. Her only child, a little boy, had died when quite young, and she had long since come to thank God for taking him from such sinful surroundings. The poor woman wept bitterly as she told her grief to Sister Lillie. "No one has ever come to see me before," she said; "I have been so lonely and miserable, and longed for someone to whom I could confide my troubles. Together the Sister and the publican's wife knelt in prayer, and in that parlour the Light of God streamed into her soul. Her life is still hard, her husband still cold and cruel; but the peace pictured on that woman's face is a thing to see and thank God for. Now her earnest and believing prayer is for her husband's conversion. There are conducted from the Central Hall every week, ten of which are on the Sunday. The ministers take their full share in this work, though here, again, voluntary help is largely relied on. Three of these open-air meetings are picturesque in their surroundings—the Saturday evening meeting in Stevenson Square, the Sunday evening meeting in Dale Street, and the Wednesday evening meeting in Jersey Dwellings.

An Encouraging Open-Air Service.

While the message is being spoken, workers may be seen in the crowd fastening on their man, by personal conversation and entreaty striving to win him for God. Many come forward to sign the pledges against drink and gambling, which are always in evidence at the services. Many, too, remain to the after meeting which follows in the Central Hall.

The Cottage Services lay hold of those who excuse themselves from public worship on such grounds as lack of clothes, distance, or—an excuse commonly given—they have not been to a church or chapel for years. There are nine in connection with the Central Hall, all in the hands of capable voluntary workers. It would be difficult to say how many regular members of the Central Hall Society have been won through these meetings.

The spiritual development of the members is well looked after. The fellowship meetings are numerously attended, and every encouragement and help is given to make them

LOVERS OF THE WORD OF GOD.

Apart from the Sunday School, which is a large and flourishing institution, two large Bible classes are held on week-nights, as well as a theological class for the training of young exhorters, local preachers, &c. Several young men have graduated from that class into the ministry.

The social work is splendidly conceived and carried out. Dr. Alexander Maclaren, who is on the spot and familiar with its working, says of it: "I am glad of the opportunity of expressing my high appreciation of your social work, which seems to me to be conceived and carried on with an amount of sanctified common sense not always found in conjunction with philanthropic efforts, and to have its moving spring in Christian principles and motives. I think that you have a good ground of appeal for help to all who care for the amelioration of the condition of the very poor and outcast class; and I earnestly hope that your wider scheme will secure support from a wider area than you have hitherto reached."

It is impossible here to describe this ministry of rescue, relief and prevention. It must suffice to give taken from the report, which will convey some idea of the extent and comprehensiveness of this wonderful adjunct of the Mission.

The doors of the Central Hall are open from morning till night, and experienced men and women are retained on the building to deal with rescue and relief cases. An average of 650 destitute or degraded men and women individually appeal to us every week. Six thousand five hundred and forty men and 4,321 women were helped in some definite way during the past year. One hundred and thirty beds are provided every night. Bed and food are given in return for labour. The Men's Home, shelter, and labour yard have been self-supporting for four years. The women's shelter and coffee tavern are also self-supporting. The turnover in labour amounts to £1,700 per annum.

The Girls' Preventive Home has guarded and trained twenty-five girls each year. The prison-gate work has been systematically done, 4,607 women having been dealt with. Apart from homes and shelters, there is a systematic mode of relief, and a careful visitation of the homes of the very poor. The sick are visited by a trained nurse. One thousand six hundred and twenty-four visits were paid last year.

Every Sunday food is provided for the destitute. Last year over 30,000 half-starved persons availed themselves of this provision. In addition to the hundreds for whom temporary work is found, an average of over 450 per annum have been placed in permanent situations, through our labour and advice bureau.

One hundred and sixty-six young women have been cared for in their first trouble (many of them being utterly without friends). Each young woman has afterwards been placed in a situation, where she could maintain herself and child. The home of rest has saved many a poor working girl from a serious breakdown. Many families have been re-united and homes re-established. Lost boys and girls have been restored to their friends. Discharged prisoners have been cared for and helped in the search for employment. The work is unsectarian. A labour test is applied. Thorough investigation is made. No unfair competition with the labour market is allowed.

Every care is taken to co-operate, and not to interfere, with the work of guardians and other agencies amongst the poor. Everything is done, not only to help, but to keep in touch with those helped, and to make the work permanent. Efforts are made to influence each separate applicant to live a true and upright life, seeking to that end the help of the Lord Jesus.

The staff consists of Revs. S. F. Collier, W. H. Heap, Samuel Marriott, Thomas Dargue, G. H. McNeal, H. M. Nield, together with seven lay missioners and fourteen Sisters.

At the present time considerable extension of the work is being carried forward, and there is need of added help. The report and any particulars may be had from Rev. S. F. Collier, Central Hall, Manchester, to whom all inquiries should be addressed.

Delving in Shoreditch.

FOR twenty-seven years Rev. W. Cuff has held the pastorate of the Shoreditch Tabernacle Church, with which are connected several mission centres, also a house-to-house visiting society, conducted by voluntary workers. Unremitting and singularly useful service has been rendered to the poorest classes of East London by men and women banded together in association with the devoted pastor, who, in his annual circular, expresses joy that, with the extinction of the Tabernacle building debt, opportunity comes for developing more thoroughly the mission agencies:—

"About the middle of the year, quite unlooked for, two fresh mission halls were offered to us—one in Union Street, Hackney Road, and the other in the Vinegar Ground, Hoxton. Both stand in the midst of a network of back streets, densely crowded with poor people. They had been worked by others for some years, but had gone down and become empty. They had never been attached to any church, and the workers had removed, and the work flagged. We took them both, and at once workers volunteered to go and occupy them. We have had them but three months in our hands, and they are now full, and a good Sunday School is gathered in one of them. This, of course, involves extra cost; but I am sure the Lord will send us what is needful to carry on the work where it is so urgently needed.

"All our other work goes on as in all the years past. The benevolent part of it is larger than ever, and deeply needs help. Mrs. Cuff manages the clothing department with others to help her. Garments of any kind are a very precious boon. We do not help the lazy, drunken and dissolute. They know this, and trouble us but little. Every shilling sent us goes to the poor. The rent for the halls comes out of the church and mission fund. Every worker is a voluntary worker, and does all for Christ's sake. There are over 300 of these doing the work every Sunday, and almost every night in the week."

Decrease of Crime.

AS the St. Giles' Christian Mission appears to have been the first to make a determined attempt to get hold of discharged prisoners at the prison gates of the London local prisons, it must be gratifying to Mr. William Wheatley, after twenty-two years of earnest labour to find the new report of the Commissioners of Prisons, just issued, still bearing testimony to the falling-off of serious crime. In this respect, Great Britain would appear to hold a place by itself among the countries of the world. Notwithstanding the complaints which from, time to time, have been made against our prison discipline, we can almost suppose that, could he compare the prisons of to-day with what prevailed in his own times, John Howard would find his day-dream realized. The Bill to amend the Prisons Acts, which came into operation on May 1st, has introduced many important amendments in prison discipline, which, while tending towards more humane treatment, in other respects may better meet the demands of justice. Thus, dark cells for extra punishment are abolished; associated labour is introduced; more attention will be given to education; and the rules concerning debtors imprisoned for debts which they are able to pay, have been revised.

The annals of the St. Giles' Christian Mission seem to prove to demonstration that the endeavour to courses on the day of their discharge from prison is the most effective way of checking the increase of crime. We have to distinguish carefully between the local or short term prisons and the convict establishments to which penal servitude or long term subjects are committed. As the latter represent serious crimes, the decrease in the number committed is the more reassuring. The yearly average of convict prisons population in England and Wales during the five years ending March 31, 1885, was 9,962, or slightly over 37 to each 100,000 of the population; but this year the average number is 8,315, or just over 26 to each 100,000 of the people. The summary convictions, during the same period, have fallen from 566 to 483 in each 100,000 persons, without reckoning fractions. Of course, it has to be remembered that a very large number of the offences dealt with summarily, are not actually criminal at all; relating, as they do, to dog-muzzles, bicycles, and the Highway Acts.

When we look at the case of youthful offenders—a class which, at the opening of the Queen's reign, inspired Christian reformers with feelings of despair—we have still further cause to thank God and take courage. In 1893, there were convicted 2,512 boys and 262 girls under sixteen years of age; but the return for 1898 dropped to 1,586 boys and 93 girls. During the same period, young persons, under twenty-one, has fallen from 17,940 boys and 3,645 girls, to 15,302 boys, and 2,667 girls. The commissioners are of opinion that so far as the boys are concerned, they "are who, in the insolence of youth, have made up their minds to defy the law, and to obtain their living by other than honest means." It is added that, no less than 280 had good and respectable homes; yet, in spite of this, we cannot regard the criminal character at this age to be fully formed." In other words, it is possible for them to be reclaimed. As regards the possibility of their being reformed and fitted for useful situations, the St. Giles' Mission could show hundreds of examples. No fewer than 500 boys pass through its five Homes every year. We can well believe that this large number of boys, who for the most part are taken from criminal surroundings for positions in honest life largely account for the decrease of crime. In 1877, when the work among discharged prisoners commenced, there were 1,637 persons sentenced to penal servitude in England and Wales, but last year the total had fallen to 789. In less than ten years the cost of maintenance of convict prisons has fallen from £214,603 to £131,505. In 1889 the convicts numbered 5,033 men and 326 women; the return for the year ending March 31 last was 2,595 men and 135 women. There is no other nation in the world that can tell such a story as this; and it is mainly the outcome of Christian enterprise.

Berger Hall, E.

THE above-mentioned hall is the home mission headquarters of the "Regions Beyond" Missionary Union, and one of the busiest centres of Christian and soul-saving activity in East London. Altogether, over thirty meetings a week of various kinds are conducted. The hall, with accommodation for 900 people, is situate in the very heart of the working masses of Bromley-by-Bow.

The East End News thus comments on the Sunday evening service: "Why a hall, situated away from the main thoroughfare, should be so attractive, is a marvel until a visit is made. There the poor really have the Gospel preached to them, and the general character of the congregation proves it. Mothers with babes in their arms, fathers, mothers, children, and aged people long past the time when the upbringing of a family forms the main source of their trouble and joy, all are to be found at Berger Hall. It is at once apparent that there is a feeling of 'at homeness' pervading the assemblage. The services are hearty, the singing is led by an unpretentious but efficient choir, and the people join in heartily."

In addition to Berger Hall itself, there are several lesser rooms. The Mackenzie Memorial Hall, recently finished at a cost of £3,000, is a fine modern building, and the centre of the Medical Mission work. Behind the mission and evangelistic agencies, there is a vigorous church life and membership, numbering 350. The pastor (Rev. James Lyall) emphasizes this strongly, believing in its supreme necessity in order to an effective work for God. The result is, that, difficult though it be to secure a hearing on Sunday mornings in East London, the morning services for believers are being sustained by a LARGE AND INCREASING CONGREGATION.

The "Men's Own" meeting each Sunday afternoon has an enrolment of over 300, and is a soul-saving agency. Social, political, and secondary questions are strictly prohibited. A straight Gospel message is delivered Sunday after Sunday by intelligent Gospel preachers, and the men come to listen. Numbers of men trace their conversion to this service. The Sunday school, with a membership of nearly 1,200, is the second largest in East London. Much careful, painstaking work is bestowed upon this department. In the line of distinctly spiritual work there are six cottage prayer meetings, conducted every Thursday evening by workers organized for this department.

An important section of the work is the Medical Mission, in connection with which large numbers of the poor receive advice and medicine free, or for the nominal sum of three pence, if they can afford it. In this work Harley College students and deaconesses are engaged as helpers, and, while the people wait to have their physical sufferings attended to, the Gospel that brings spiritual healing is preached, and Gospel hymns are sung.

During the college session, night schools for men, lads, and girls are also conducted. These are taught by the college students and deaconesses. While many branches of education are taught, including sewing and cooking, the main point is spiritual enlightenment. At the close of the schools each night about thirty minutes are given to Bible study, prayer, and song. Scores of souls have been brought to Christ in this way, some of whom even came in to break up or disturb the schools.

Friends who would like to see for themselves the working of this Mission, are cordially invited to visit on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, and on Monday and Wednesday evenings, when they will be warmly welcomed by the pastor and his helpers. Communications should be addressed to Dr. H. Grattan Guinness, Harley House, Bow, London, E

The Bridge of Hope.

RATCLIFF HIGHWAY, formerly so noted as the popular promenade of those who secured ill-gotten gold from the sins and weaknesses of sailors using the port of London, has, of late years, undergone transformation, if not improvement. To-day it is an abode of grinding poverty, and of the vices which follow in the train of want.

But, while the eastward trend of the shipping industry towards the new and vaster regions of Canning Town has thus induced a change in the character of the district, there are alterations in the very buildings in the vicinity, which are of keen interest to those who are concerned in the welfare and progress of Christian effort. In inspecting, for instance, the capacious institution known as the Bridge of Hope, and for so many years associated with the devoted labours of Miss Steer, one realizes with a sense of profound satisfaction, the translation of what was once a typical den of East End revelry and dissipation, into a bright for the rescue of young women from careers of sin.

The neat meeting room, decorated with words of Scripture, and daily resounding with spiritual melodies, was the dancing saloon of a public-house. Those bright, clean dormitories once formed part of a cluster of infamous haunts. Therein, some of Miss Steer's workers pray with their young charges on the very boards where, in other days, the unhappiest of women made their miserable abode. More than that, some of those women subsequently became inmates of their old rooms under the new conditions, and there, with hearts touched by Jesus' love, bore, by changed characters and lives, a glad witness to his power to save. Truly, what hath God wrought!

After usefully absorbing a number of degrading resorts, the Bridge of Hope was largely rebuilt. It is now one of the most convenient institutions of its kind. A glance at its various departments is an education in the art of skilful management. In the knitting-room, the machines are rattling merrily, guided by the deft hands of some who toil vigorously in order to earn a portion, at any rate, of the cost of their reclamation. A glance at the kitchen induces the reflection that its spotless woodwork, and shining utensils would surely evoke the praise of that paragon of cleanliness, a Dutch housewife. In the larders, the kindly overseer, after demonstrating the care with which the distribution of goods is managed, points, with a to sundry barrels of vegetables which a Norfolk farmer has sent, and suggests that other friends might spare similar gifts from their basket and store. Throwing open, too, the repository for disused clothing forwarded by occasional donors, the good lady sighs that the stacks of strong boots and jackets, and what not, are so shrunken. The winter is on us, and a thorough overhauling of the cupboards of the philanthropic may well take place in the interests of Miss Steer's many dependents.

The needlework room presents a blithe and busy scene. Piles of neatly made articles lay ready for despatch, and the general merit of the handiwork of the Home is attested by the framed diploma for excellence obtained at the Chicago Exhibition. The large, well-lighted rooms in the upper part of the premises are used for the laundry, and there, as in other departments, one realizes the presence of that spirit of quiet content and homeliness which characterizes the work as a whole. The spiritual needs of the girls, who, it will readily be believed, are a class by no means easy to influence, are met in various ways. Ministers and missionaries conduct special services, but the chief importance is attached to the home gatherings for prayer. Nor is innocent recreation overlooked. To the London girl, native or acclimatised, the slender strip of paved yard possesses glorious attributes as a pleasaunce for after dinner enjoyment of ball or skipping rope, while magic lantern entertainments and other simple forms of modest diversion help to give a needed variety to the daily round of life.

The story of Miss Steer's work is interwoven with that of what may be called the modern social movement. Commenced twenty years since, when the Highway was a kind of squalid and sordid Vanity Fair, its first work was to reclaim the viragoes who were the local rulers of social life. In this direction God wonderfully owned the work, and numbers were rescued. From the public-house tap-room, from the dancing saloons, some of which out-rivalled the latter day infamies of the Moulin Rouge, with dishevelled hair and blackened eyes, sullenly or bathed in repentant tears, the women came. The good work developed, the present model premises were erected, and, as time went on, Miss Steer was led to make special effort in the way of preventive work among the young. Great expansion followed, for this departure exactly met, and still meets, one of the chief social needs of the time. Here is a poor woman, deserted by her husband and entirely destitute. What is she to do with her five children? There is an industrious working man, whose termagant and dissolute wife is in gaol, and who is at his wits' end to know what to do with their children. Who will take the unhappy babes and train them to walk in the paths of righteousness? Here are little ones in circumstances of grave moral danger, and a pitying neighbour speaks a word on their behalf. In such cases Miss Steer has been able to cope with the difficulty, and the result is seen in the important branch work at Chingford, where large numbers of little ones are cared for in cottage homes.

As years go by, this Bridge of Hope, far from showing any sign of decay, becomes increasingly useful as a means of escape from the thorny ways of wickedness. Communications respecting the work, may be addressed to Miss Steer, at 28, Betts Street, St. George's, London, E.

The Railway Mission.

THE eighteenth annual report of this well-known agency contains interesting details of the various branches of work at home and abroad. The committee look back with pleasure upon the continued extension of the Society's field of labour, corresponding with the growing development of the railway system. Hence the need for additional funds and workers becomes greater year by year.

During the year the Mission arranged over a thousand meetings weekly at about 400 centres, while twenty-one new branches were opened, and 1,102 members added to the Railway Mission Christian Association. Meetings are also held in waiting-rooms, mess-rooms, at goods yards, &c., and it is gratifying to note how heartily these services have been appreciated by railway men, debarred, on account of their occupation, from regularly attending ordinary places of worship.

Some remarkable results are given of a special series of meetings at Swindon, where over 10,000 men are employed in the works of the Great Western Railway. A large number of persons professed to accept Christ as their Saviour, and at one Gospel temperance meeting 180 signed the total abstinence pledge. As a result of the special services at Swindon, a branch of the mission has been formed, and several weekly meetings have been arranged.

The superintendent at one of the branches observes: "We have had a Pentecost at H——. The Lord has given showers of blessing, chiefly among the young railway men. Many of them have come out boldly for Christ. As we walk along the street we constantly meet railway men and lads who are under deep conviction and are seeking Christ."

The agent in Scotland testifies to the "signs following" the efforts of the Mission, which is not inappropriately styled a "Brother's Keeper" Association. Glimpses of the work of the missionaries in South Africa, India, Japan, Chili, and other countries are given, and their labours have been heartily seconded by Christian workers in all lands. The office of the mission is No. 1, Adam Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Amongst the Navvies.

TRAVELLERS over the great iron roads which stretch in every direction through our land must be often reminded by the sudden appearance of a company of navvies how far this class of labour removes the men so employed from Christian influence. Responsibility for the moral and spiritual welfare of these men is recognized by various organizations, as experience has proved that the needs of navvies are not met by the ordinary Gospel methods.

The Scottish Navvy Mission Society has a staff of experienced missionaries, who are sent to various centres as need may arise. Short services are held at the works; huts, shanties, and homes are visited, and the men are enabled to spend their evenings at Gospel services or reading rooms, built through the efforts of the society. Being open all days, the reading-room provides a counter attraction to the public-house. The society is fortunate in having agents who are more or less acquainted with the details of surgery, a branch of effort which is much in request, where occupation is beset by peculiar dangers.

The society is undenominational, and its utility has been recognized by the various Churches in Scotland. The efforts of the society to spread a knowledge of the Gospel to those who are situated almost beyond the reach of the Christian Church are deserving of support. Mr. F. J. Taylor is superintendent, and the office is 49, Castle Street, Edinburgh.

Winning the Children.

THERE was a goodly gathering of friends at the Metropolitan Tabernacle last week, on the occasion of the visit of Mr. John Kirk, secretary of the Ragged School Union, accompanied by members of the Council and supporters of the cause. In C. H. Spurgeon's time this visit was an annual affair, and it is still continued. For more than forty years the people at the Tabernacle have held a prominent place as regards ragged school service, several large mission centres being maintained in and about Southwark and Bermondsey. In the course of a characteristic address, following a few words from Mr. Goodman, Rev. Thomas Spurgeon specially commended the service of the R.S.U., especially what was done among the more needy children and cripples.

Adverting to the fact that before he undertook pastoral work he was occupied in the engraver's art, Mr. Spurgeon introduced illustrations from wood-engraving. To engrave the truth upon young hearts needs patience and the aid of the Holy Spirit. The engraver has various sorts of tools, and so with children different tools have to be used; and workers need divine direction as to how to speak to this or that child. No work needs greater patience than engraving, unless it was Sunday-school teaching. Might their children become pictures to gladden the heart of God! There was a good attendance, and no doubt the Ragged School Union cause was stimulated by the reunion.

The Christian Community.

THIS well-known Society finds it advisable to develop its work in several important respects. The increasing population of London makes it imperative to open out new missions in destitute parts, and strengthen existing agencies. The people who concentrate in the already overcrowded districts, are largely composed of such as never attend the ordinary places of worship, but who will attend halls or rooms like those it is proposed to provide.

Two of the missions must have new or enlarged halls, and it is intended to make some little provision for the sick and overworked members in a Home of Rest. The council desire also to provide modest pensions for old and disabled members who are past work, as is done by many other societies, and so keep them from ending their days in absolute poverty. This is regarded as a Christian duty toward those who give their ungrudging labour without payment. The hon. sec. is Dr. John Gritton, Memorial Hall, London Street, Bethnal Green, E.

Holiday Impressions.

IF England is a pretty garden of Europe, as a Utah citizen once remarked to us, then the Golden Valley is certainly one of the most charming spots in this garden. At the foot of lovely hills throbs the life of English industry, and clusters of pleasant cottages speak of the comfort of the working man.

As the eye climbs the slopes of those hills, upon which the first autumn-tints appear, one is struck with the landscape. How snug the houses look between the groups of trees! In one such house, almost lost in their green embrace, lives a generous Christian woman, who is known for miles around as "the lovely old lady." Three generations gather around her. She had trained her children in the fear of God, and now she is rewarded by seeing them engaged in active Christian work, their influence extending to the youngest of their employés. Happy mother! happy grandmother! to look back upon eighty years of a useful life, and taste the fruit thereof. Her sight is failing, but her spirit is young and her mind active, taking keen interest in all the leading questions of the present time.

Lovely Devonshire, lovely Ilfracombe. On a stage-coach we spin along over dales and hills to Lynton. Though admiring the landscape, we agree with Marie Corelli that it is a mistake to give it the name of "English Switzerland." There is sufficient attractiveness and variety in the scenery of our little island to make it appreciated by itself, whereas trying to pass for a copy entails ridicule. A pretty maiden can never be a giant; why should she want to be? This by the way.

MR. ROBERT CHAPMAN.

We came to Ilfracombe on our search for Mr. Robert Chapman, whose home at Barnstaple we had found shut up. His neighbour told us that he had gone away, not so much for his sake as that his servants might rest a little from the strain of summer work. "Those," said she, pointing out three in a row of small houses, "belong to Mr. Chapman, and they are always full of visitors—brethren coming from far and near to seek spiritual counsel or fellowship, and rest awhile." "Does he still speak in public? "Oh, yes; sometimes. He is wonderfully well for his age. Fancy, over ninety-seven!"

At Ilfracombe we grasped the hand of this aged saint of God, never tired of speaking about his Master.

"You will stay to tea, won't you?" was his request, before really knowing who we were. We sat down to a chat. "Oh, you're the Editor of The Christian," he said to my husband; "indeed I remember. You published my 'Choice Sayings.' I am really glad to see you." "Are you pretty well, dear brother Chapman?" "Pretty well? No, I am not pretty well; I am very well, thank the Lord." His voice had a joyous ring as he accentuated the last sentence. The years had evidently told but lightly on his constitution. Worry had had no chance of furrowing his countenance with wrinkles. It was placid and happy. Where was the secret of his marvellous health? If the shoulder were a little rounded by age, they were certainly not weighted by any burdens; for these all had been cast upon Him.

In speaking of the Homeland, my husband remarked: "It is comforting to think that up there all controversies will cease." "But they ought to cease here, don't you think so, brother?" "Certainly I do, but——" "The only means by which we can influence an erring brother is patience, and for that we must have grace enough to be, in our own eyes, 'nobody.' I do not ask people so much: 'Are you saved?' as I tell them of my being saved."

Yet, the Holy Ghost prompted him sometimes to ask the question straightforwardly. Once when travelling through Spain, and as he was bidding good-bye to a young man who had been much in his company, he said those three solemn words and left him. Years afterwards he met with the same man. "Do you remember your parting question, Mr. Chapman? It set me to think. I am able to say 'yes' now; I could not have done so then."

When we expressed our fear of wearying the aged pilgrim with too much talking, he answered: "I do not know the meaning of that word. I am never tired of speaking about my Lord. In dealing with men, it is through conversation that I am able to influence them most. I love young people, and wish to help them."

Tea being ready, we went upstairs, and were introduced to a circle of friends, all united in the same bonds of love. One, set apart to glorify God in her suffering, lay on a couch near the window. "Mrs. Pearce is an invalid," said Mr. Chapman, tenderly taking her hands. "She does not know what an amount of good her presence does to the children of God."

The cheerful meal finished, we joined in the evening worship, and then separated. How I wished to carry away a photo with me; but, if such a thing exists, it must be a snap-shot. Should you ask permission for producing a likeness, the reply would be: "I have no objection to it, if you promise to make me as I will look in my resurrection-body."

"FATHER IGNATIUS."

This visit reminded us, by the way of contrast, of another man whom we had seen a few days previously, and who also professes to teach Jesus and Jesus only. If one hears of somebody who has the power of melting large congregations to tears, and of attracting jewels into the offering plates, one feels excused for being curious to see him, even although it be in a retreat, where, as head of a community of monks and nuns, he worships God after mediæval fashion.

On a pleasant autumn day, we went to Llanthony Abbey. Another half-hour's drive on a rising, shady road, brought us to Father Ignatius' monastery, prettily situated among the wooded hills of Monmouthshire. As we entered the grounds, a fair religieuse gently bade us welcome, and led us to the church. Through a very low door, apparently symbolic of humility, she introduced us into a little space, dipped in the gloom so characteristic of Roman Catholic churches. To our left, the altar of the Virgin, with an abundance of candles; in the front, a partition, which, our guide explained to us, as symbolizing separation from the world. Beyond the folding doors represents the higher life. There sit those who have renounced ordinary human life, with its joys, its obligations, and its relationships.

"And you?" asked one of our company. "I belong to the outer court; I have not made the vow." "What hinders you from doing so?" "I am not considered strong enough for the night work. So I am only under promise." "What is the distinction between a promise and a vow?" "Those under promise can return into the world if they wish; the others are cut off from it for ever." All this she said in hardly audible whisper, and then asked us whether we would like to remain for the noon service.

As we sat down, books in hand, she disappeared, but soon returned with another sister wearing, like herself, the white veil, and both prostrated themselves in front of us. As the clock struck twelve, steps, as of heavy-booted feet walking on tip-toe, resounded behind the partition. A few plaintive notes, then an impressive silence, followed by Psalms, prayers and hymns, which were accompanied by various ceremonies. After another silence, a voice read and repeated solemnly, "And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy houses and upon thy gates" (Deut. vi.). The door opened, and we gazed upon a figure whose face we could not discern at first. Father Ignatius began in a low tone to say that the command for the Christian was the same as for the Israelite, with the difference that we who love Jesus have the words written in our hearts. As he grew warmer and more eloquent, he rose from his chair and stepped forward into full view, speaking of the distinction between the chosen earthly nation and the heavenly nation—a people who were not a nation, though gathered out of all nations. Dreyfus came in fitly as an illustration. Earthly love was touchingly compared with the love of Him who died for us. "Do you know that He died for you? Do you love Him, because He first loved you? Have you the assurance of personal salvation, of being one with Him?"

Everything the speaker uttered was personal and pointed, and as he spoke, waving his arms, he turned from time to time to his left where, in the deep shadow, sheltered from our curiosity, were sitting those whom he addressed as "my dear little children," living, as he said, the higher life, the life of consecration and prayer. When the last words had passed his lips, the door closed, as if moved by unseen hands. The worship ended with prayers and prostrations, resembling in every way the rites of the Romish Church.

Out-doors I ventured a question as to the number of monks and nuns, and was rebuked by the sister. "We only speak of spiritual things. How did you like our reverend father?" "I liked his sermon very well, but it is not in accordance with your form of worship." "We have a very high ritual, indeed; but that has nothing to do with our creed."

I felt sorry for Father Ignatius, for he is either throwing dust into the eyes of the people, or deceiving himself. The soul whom Jesus satisfies worships in spirit and in truth, and abhors idolatrous knick-knacks of Mariolatry and saint worship. W. M.

A Call to Prayer.

THE Council of the Evangelical Alliance have recently issued a request to Christians in all parts of the world to unite in humiliation in prayer, in view of the dark and troubled condition of the world, "the distress of nations fainting for fear and for expectation of the things which may be coming."

The special objects suggested in the invitation are, that present events may be overruled for the Divine glory, that Christians in all parts of South Africa may be kept in the secret of his peace and love, and the war soon brought to an end; and that He would speedily accomplish the number of his elect, and hasten his kingdom.

The Council suggest that this concert in prayer be observed privately or unitedly in the early morning of each Lord's day until further notice, and that the first Sunday in December be specially set apart for public prayer and exhortation on the subjects.

In addition, the Council urge the need of prayer in respect of the growth of sacerdotalism, the increase of Sabbath breaking, and of other national sins, such as intemperance, impurity, and gambling.

During the ensuing three months a prayer meeting is to be held each Thursday, from 10.30 to 11.30 a.m., at the Alliance Offices, 7, Adam Street, Adelphi, and the presence of friends is invited. The Council earnestly request that in all parts of the land similar gatherings be held, and private prayer offered also, with regard to the subjects specified, and for a general outpouring of God's Spirit. The appeal is signed by Lords Polwarth and Kinnaird, Revs. H. W. Webb-Peploe and F. B. Meyer, Dr. David McEwan, and Mr. E. P. Field.

A "Home in Camp" at Lydd.—In response to an earnest request from men stationed at Lydd, who had benefited by Soldiers' Homes in Sandgate and elsewhere, the trustees and managers of the Papillon Soldiers' Home, Sandgate, recently undertook to provide in the camp itself a resort where the soldiers could spend a comfortable and profitable evening when the day's work was done. The project met with hearty approbation and support from the military authorities. Through General Hallam-Parr, the Commander-in-Chief made a grant of £100 toward building, and the War Department sanctioned the use of a very convenient site. The room has now been finished, and opened with appropriate services. The soldiers appreciate its comforts, while its Christian influence and activities will doubtless be productive of much good. The treasurer is Lieut.-General Sir W. Stirling, K.C.B., Ochiltree, Folkestone.

Mr. Will Gordon Sprigg

AND THE CAPE TOWN Y.M.C.A.

AFFAIRS in South Africa at the present time invest with a peculiar interest the visit to England of Mr. Will Gordon Sprigg, general secretary of the Cape Town Young Men's Christian Association. Innumerable bonds link the homes of Britain with the commercial centres of Cape Colony and the lands which lie beyond in the southern regions of the Dark Continent; and just now those bonds are cemented by the pressure of a common anxiety as well as a warm national sympathy.

Mr. Sprigg is a man of athletic build and looking younger than his years. He is a nephew of Sir Gordon Sprigg, ex-Prime Minister of Cape Colony, and deservedly held in high esteem in Christian circles in South Africa. He comes to lay before friends in the old land the claims and needs of the Cape Town Y.M.C.A. His errand is one attended with difficulty at the best of times; but to-day, when philanthropists and other Christian people are confronted by a variety of urgent appeals, we feel a large measure of compassion for the secretary who finds himself engaged upon "collection" duty.

In some parts it may seem needful to apologize for Y.M.C.A. work, but there is no call for that as to Cape Town. By common consent, Christian interest in young men, and labour in their behalf, is its own vindication there. Being situate at the gateway of the continent, and at the first point of call for ocean steamers, the Association not only furnishes a safe resort for young men far from home, but forms a general information bureau and an employment office—agencies which are greatly valued, alike by employers of labour and those who have labour to give. All sections of the Christian Church wished Mr. Sprigg a good voyage and large success in his enterprise. In the course of a recent interview, our friend outlined the objects of his visit.

"I have come (he said) for money, and my story should get me what is wanted. Our Association was established in 1865, and it has made steady progress until to-day. The latest report shows a membership of 826; and the Association provides, in its various departments, all that a young man requires."

Handing us an attractive booklet, entitled "A Bright Spot in the Dark Continent," Mr. Sprigg called attention to some statistics of general interest relating to the past five years. In all, 2,470 members have passed through the Association; 2,500 have been interviewed and advised regarding employment; and some 45,000 oversea letters and packets have been received for young men. Other figures refer to gatherings of various kinds, members boarded and lodged, and to advice given to others on the important subject of apartments. How many parents whose sons have gone to South Africa, have had reason to thank God for the operations of the Cape Town Y.M.C.A.

Mr. Sprigg is a native of Melbourne, and went as a young man to the Cape. There he was converted in 1886, under the preaching of Mr. Henry Varley, in the Dutch Reformed Church. He was then engaged in the Cape Civil Service. Obtaining leave of absence, he went home to Australia, and, deciding to stay in Melbourne, he took up Y.M.C.A. work. In this he found much happiness, and it was obviously a sphere of labour for which God had prepared him. In 1894, he was recalled to South Africa, to assume the responsible post of secretary of the Cape Town Association. Since then he has been engaged in the consolidation and extension of the work, and during the past five years the membership has been almost doubled.

Asked to explain his mission, Mr. Sprigg made a statement characterized by wholesome modesty combined with earnest purpose. He said: "While all eyes are on South Africa, my directors have sent me to interest the public of Great Britain in work among their sons and brothers in Cape Town and beyond. Our work is largely among young men who come from England. The Metropolitan Association is in Cape Town, also the head office of the South African Council of the Y.M.C.A., of which I am also secretary. I am likewise travelling secretary for South Africa. Our work is varied and far-reaching, and when I say that (speaking roughly) the entire membership changes in the course of every two years, you will realize, in a measure, the difficulty of our work and the extent of our influence. The movement is ever northward, and we touch hosts of young men who are never enrolled as members."

Coming to particulars, Mr. Sprigg explained that it was proposed to extend the Y.M.C.A. premises, at a cost of £9,000. He hoped to raise one-third of this — £3,000—from the British public. Mr. Sprigg pointed out that commercial leaders recognise the important service rendered by the Association, the President of the Cape Town Chamber of Commerce having commended the work to "the hearty support of the merchants of Great Britain," declaring that the Association "merits the support of the commercial community." He added that he had found some difficulty in his collection hitherto, but his hope is in the Christian public.

On the subject of the present unrest in South Africa, Mr. Sprigg exercised a wise restraint. His work has the support of men favouring both sides in the controversy between Great Britain and the Transvaal. He regretted deeply that trade was now paralyzed throughout the country; and this seriously affects his enterprise. Already £3,000 has been collected in Cape Colony, nearly all of it having been given by business men in the City of Cape Town.

In reply to further questions, Mr. Sprigg remarked: "Our work is not confined to any one class or nationality. We provide an open door to all young men, and the majority who come to us are away from home, living in boarding houses. We lay ourselves out to reach these and do them good. And this does not end our endeavours for those who are remote from home and friends. We visit them in their lodgings, comfort them in sickness; and, should they die with no relative at hand, we bury them in the Association's plot at the Cemetery. There are already nine graves in that plot."

Having mentioned this pathetic fact, Mr. Sprigg continued to speak of the all-round practical work of the Association. We thought he had amply justified his plea for Christian sympathy and help. An organization that provides friends for the dying, and that gives Christian burial to those who fall asleep by the way, will assuredly be equal to every possible service for the living in the name of Christ, and constrained by his love.

Mr. Sprigg's stay in London is limited. He may only remain a week or two. His address is Horrex's Hotel, corner of Norfolk Street and Strand, W.C.

"The Christian" Almanack, 1900.

WE are sensibly impressed with the flight of time, as year by year we associate "The Christian" Almanack with one of our weekly issues in the month of October. The Calendar is brought out thus early in order that it may arrive in good time in the distant continents and lands to which our paper goes week by week. We rejoice to know that it will meet with a glad reception on the part of Christian men and women everywhere.

The figures now before us, 1900, indicate a telling fact—not only are we approaching a new year, but we are within short distance of a new century. "Ye have not passed this way heretofore."

The Scripture passages, which are again the prayerful selection of a devoted servant of God, are made to surround a striking Oriental scene. In this particular we follow the example of last year's Almanack. Once, again, we reproduce a drawing by Mr. James Clark, made in the East, to serve the purpose of illustrating Holy Scripture. Along with many others, some landscapes and some natural objects, all of them true to life, this picture was executed for the publications of the Scripture Gift Mission and Crystal Palace Bible Stand. As our readers may know, this excellent agency exists to disseminate Gospel truth by the circulation of Scripture portions, attractively got up, and embellished with engravings of unique interest. A great work has been done in the past; and, in view of the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1900, preparations on a large scale are now in progress. Regarding past and future, information may be had from the Secretary of the Mission, Mr. W. Walters, 15, Strand, W.C.

From "A Carpenter's Shop at Damascus" we may judge of the features of such a place in many another city and hamlet in "the unchanging East." The conditions and surroundings of work in the home at Nazareth, where our Lord "was brought up," were substantially such as appear in the engraving. So far as the sheet is concerned, however, the picture is, of course, a central object round which excerpts from God's Word are arranged; and these excerpts, with their alternating counsel and warning, their word of comfort and direction, will, it is hoped, be blessed to many at the hour of prayer day by day.

It is gratifying to us to know that the Almanack is so generally received with Christian sympathy and regard. Year by year we are encouraged to learn that the passages of Scripture come to many as the very Word of God—and such, indeed, they are. They come, moreover, as God's Word for a time of need and in a day of trouble—in a moment of perplexity or an hour of joy. And grateful hearts are not slow to acknowledge the goodness of our heavenly Father in the opportune reminder administered by the selected text. We pray that, as it has been in the past, so it may be in 1900. May the God of all grace own and bless his own Word, and impress upon all who use the Almanack the old-time lesson: "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom!"

Havre Sailors' Home.

IT was my privilege for some years to be associated with the late Hon. Lady Beauchamp in the Lord's work amongst the sailors at Havre; and, as I feel that a few of your many readers who have known the work personally, as well as others who have been interested in it, may be wondering what has taken place with regard to the Sailors' Home and Rest since Lady Beauchamp's death, my object in writing is to let them know that, in face of the temptations and allurements to sin abounding on every hand, those most sensible to the pressing need could see no other course open than to endeavour to carry on the work in the same spirit as heretofore, in entire dependence on our God and Father, who called his handmaid to take it up fourteen years ago.

The Home and Rest (which include a coffee bar), instead of, as formerly, being two separate houses, are now carried on in one building (the old Rest). For some years past the need of a large home has been becoming gradually less, owing chiefly to steamers having so generally taken the place of sailing-ships. Formerly nearly all the sailing-ships were paid off on their arrival; and, if the men did not leave the place at once for their homes, they had to find lodgings on shore until they got another ship. The Home was started to befriend such, by assisting them in a Christian spirit to keep out of the terrible places into which they were constantly inveigled. Steamers coming here very rarely "pay off," their crews remaining on board; consequently, the nature of

OUR WORK HAS SOMEWHAT CHANGED.

We have now, as a rule, very few boarders in the Home, but many more men from steamers, coming to the Rest of an evening after their work is over to attend the meeting, write letters, read the papers, and have a little quiet.

From time to time we still get a rush of grain-laden sailing-ships from British Columbia, California, Australia, and South America, generally owing to a short harvest in France, or to changes in the import duties. So far, we have always been equal to housing the men coming under such circumstances. Last year, before we gave up the old Home, we had 800 boarders between January and June; but such numbers are now very exceptional. With our new arrangements we have about thirty beds. The expense of keeping a number of unoccupied rooms is very considerable; but we should be very sorry, through lack of means, to be compelled further to reduce our sleeping accommodation.

With dear Lady Beauchamp, who always gave so liberally, we were in easy circumstances, however. Sometimes we had bad years, with little shipping; but when funds were needed, as well as in all other matters, it has always been our habit to spread all before the Lord, and He has "never failed." I may add that sometimes we have required from £400 to £500 a-year to make up our deficiency. During the last twelve months we have had fewer ships paid off than ever before, and now that she, who gave herself and all she had, is no longer with us, we would set the needs before the Lord's people, and look to Him to supply them in RAISING UP FRESH HELPERS.

This Mission is the only work being carried on for sailors at Havre, with the exception of that amongst the Scandinavians, who have a reading-room attached to their church, which is only used by their own people. Our labour extends to seafarers of all nationalities. We have, therefore, a very wide field for tract distribution, and we endeavour to give every outward-bound vessel some Gospel reading matter. The Mission is unsectarian, and we are always glad of a visit from any of the Lord's people passing through Havre.

We would take this opportunity of expressing our grateful thanks to those who have assisted us, and to those who do assist in various ways, and specially to those who bear us up in prayer, and we would ask a continuance of this blessed service. Mrs. J. E. K. Studd, 67, Harley Street, London, will be glad to forward any parcels of books, &c., which may be sent to her. (1384)

Portions of Scripture, Gospel books, tracts, or sound reading in various languages, Eastern and Western, are always acceptable, as well as flat bags to keep them in, made of any material. Also comforters, socks, and other such articles for Christmas.

Our treasurer is Mr. James Winning, Cunard Steamship Company, Hâvre. Should any of your readers desire further particulars, I will gladly answer any inquiries.

"When Stormy Winds—"

THE English people have ever entertained sentiments of specially warm sympathy towards those of her sons who follow maritime occupations. The knowledge that our supremacy on the seas, as well as the prosperity of our commerce, is bound up with the well-being of our seamen is, doubtless, responsible for these feelings of concern and regard respecting those who go "down to the sea in ships."

That interest is always accentuated in the presence of danger; nothing stirs the popular mind more than the frequently recurring stories of wreck and loss, of imminent peril and hairbreadth escape from the boiling waters. Britannia does not rule the waves without paying heavy tribute.

There's never a flood goes shoreward now
But lift's a keel we manned;
There's never an ebb goes seaward now
But drops our dead on the sand.

But, while we are stirred by such announcements as "Total loss of a British steamer," or "Terrible wreck on the Casquets," or "Fishing fleet decimated by a storm," we do not always realize how much pitiful suffering is allied to the loss of a vessel. It may mean the ruin of many homes, the doom to heart-rending poverty of widows and little children. In the case of survivors, it probably entails loss, not only of employment, but of their few belongings, even down to their wearing apparel.

It is not unfitting, therefore, to refer to the relief work, undertaken in this connection, by the Shipwrecked Mariners' Society. This body, which extends immediate aid both to sailors and fishermen, without respect to any question of religious belief, has proved to be one of the most useful organizations initiated during the present reign. It sprang into existence during the popular excitement that was aroused by the thrilling heroism of Grace Darling at the wreck of the Forfarshire. To-day the Society has a thousand honorary agents, who act as a kind of benevolent coastguard. No matter at what part of the seaboard a wreck occurs, brings forth not only the lifeboat to speed through the surf to save life, but the Shipwrecked Mariners' Society's agent with hope and help for those in distress. In such appalling catastrophes as, for instance, the loss of the ill-fated Mohegan, these devoted workers have to shoulder vast responsibilities, and toil incessantly by day and night, and it is to the country's credit that such a phalanx of men are ever ready to devote time and effort to succouring the shipwrecked mariner. None of the tempest-driven toilers of the sea suffer more severely than fishermen, and to these, also, the Society affords a relief so promptly given as to happily illustrate the old adage that "he gives twice who gives quickly."

THE SIGNAL OF DISTRESS

An inspection of the Society's office methods is convincing as to the economy and thoroughness of the administration. While imposition is carefully guarded against, destitute seamen, widows and orphans receive kindly and praiseworthy consideration. There is no phase of labour on board ship which is not heartily recognized, from the chief navigator to the stewardess; and, while the organization is not a friendly society in the ordinary sense, it encourages membership, those who join becoming entitled, in virtue of a trifling subscription, to special consideration.

Here are a couple of sample cases of relief:—

Captain D—— R——, of Fishguard, a member for eleven years, drowned at Antwerp, from the s.s. Celynen, of Newport. Widow, left in needy circumstances, with three children, aged nine, three, and one, received "immediate relief" grant of £5 10s. on August 12, and membership grant of £15 2s. 6d. on August 20, and will receive further grants of £2 per annum, if necessary, for at least four years.

J—— T—— W——, mariner, a member for thirty-four years, died in Guy's Hospital. Widow, living at Greenwich, left with five children, aged thirteen, eleven, ten, nine, and six, received grant of £25 6s. 3d. on February 10, and will, if necessary, receive further grants of £2 10s. per annum for at least five years.

A wise discretion gives special care to the aged and indigent, and the well-worn tomes stacked in the Society's huge safe contain, in their simple, business-like entries, touching stories of lives shielded from suffering and want. This has continued for sixty years. Its meritorious efforts have been cordially recognized in golden encomiums from all classes of society, and the Queen has extended her word of appreciative recognition.

A work so extensive, and so constituted as to satisfactorily meet the multifarious demands made upon it, is surely one of national importance, and has a right to the prayers and support of Christian people. Communications may be addressed to the Secretary, Mr. G. E. Maude, 26, Suffolk Street, Pall Mall East, S.W.

The Indian Famine.

THE urgent character and extent of the need for relief are referred to in a further communication which we have received from Lord Radstock. A committee of missionaries and others who are acquainted with the people's wants has been formed, and Mr. Frank Clark has consented to act as their hon. sec. and representative. Mr. Clark may be addressed at the G.I.P. Railway Office, Bombay.

Writing from the Methodist Episcopal Church, Ahmedabad, Gujarat, Rev. Robert Ward (Man Sukh Lal) writes, "There are over 5,000 Christians alone, suffering acutely from famine. In some sections of the district more than half the cattle have died. Thousands of refugees have congregated at Ahmedabad. Deaths from famine fever have occurred. Unless comprehensive and immediate help is afforded, a great loss of life is inevitable. There has been no famine in Gujarat for nearly a century. Hence the people had confidently expected rain to fall in time to save the crops, and precautions were not taken in time. . . The Christian community of the M.E. Church is well on to 6,000 souls, almost all of them belonging to the classes which are the first to suffer. . . We must provide grain at living prices, or our people will starve. Relief works in the chapel building and hand-loom weaving are to be provided at once."

European Poor Children in India.—Rev. Thomas Evans, one of the directors of the School for Poor Children and Home for Orphans, at Mussoorie, India, writes on behalf of the institution. Help is afforded to many destitute little ones, the offspring of English parents who have died in India. Numbers who are in urgent need apply for admission, but have to be refused. The school, adds Mr. Evans, is conducted on Christian principles, and sound Biblical education is imparted.

Nestorian Orphans.

THE well-known Professor Lepsius, of Berlin, writes in Rays of Light, the Urumiah American missionary periodical: "One of the blessings which the Nestorian or Syrian nation has received, is seen in the orphanages which have been established by the kindness of Christians in England and Germany. These orphanages are full of the needy children of Syrians, and are under the loving care of worthy and honoured Christians." Professor Lepsius knows well how to estimate the value of this work; for he has made great sacrifices for similar work throughout Turkey and Persia, having now 500 orphans to take care of in different places.

Deacon Abraham writes: "I want Christian friends in England to know that our work for the Lord is not only for the good of our people, but for the good of the different peoples around us also." A touching instance of the way the light and love, which is the daily atmosphere of the orphanages, influenced a Moslem heart, is well worth narrating. Two or three years ago, the Deacon let of the orphanage vineyards to a Persian Moslem of Urumiah. At the proper time his grapes were almost all cut, dipped in the boiling water, and spread on an elevated place in the vineyard to dry in the sun, in preparation for being made into sultanas. Then came very heavy rains, which spoiled all poor Aoosta Alakpor's fruit; but, to his amazement, Deacon Abraham returned the rent already paid for the year's produce. His own words to his fellow-Moslems have since been: "Go and see what sort of a man that Shamasha (Deacon) is, who looks after and cares for so many poor souls. I wish there could be found one like him amongst us Moslem people. I praise Christianity."

Every time this Moslem visits the orphanages he "brings presents in his hands." In her last letter, Deacon Abraham's good wife, Esther, writes: "Aoosta Alakpor has been here, and he said, 'My heart moves for Shamasha like those leaves which are moved by the wind on the trees. We pray for him, and when I pray to God for him, my family say, 'Amen!'"

Deacon Abraham has visited England three times: in 1875, when he was heartily received by Archbishop Tait; also in 1884; and last March he arrived in England for the third time, and is now longing for opportunities of deepening the interest of English Christians in the orphanages.

In addition to the orphanage work, he has been instrumental in circulating—thanks to the London Association for the Free Distribution of the Scriptures—hundreds of copies of the Scriptures amongst people who have hitherto never seen them; and, not satisfied with this, he has succeeded in establishing for the consecutive reading of the Scriptures." Add to this, the last five years of continued hard labour, and anxious thought and care, in providing for the needs—temporal and spiritual—of the poor refugees from his own people in Kurdistan and its neighbourhood, and every thoughtful reader and devout disciple of Jesus will admit that this man's life is being well spent.

The Deacon preaches either in native costume or otherwise, as may be desired, and in his missionary addresses he is pleased to have the help of friends, whom he attires in native costume, which makes his addresses bright and instructive. He will be most glad to receive invitations from any part of the United Kingdom either to preach or lecture, and to receive offerings from the Lord's people in aid of his work. He is staying at 60, Trinity Square, Southwark, S.E. The hon. treasurer of the work is Mr. H. Tasker, Brookside, Andover, Hants; and the hon. secretary, Rev. A. W. Payne, 350, Kennington Road, S.E.

In the Canaries.

A LETTER from Mrs. T. Macknight describes the prospects of the mission work at Las Palmas as particularly encouraging, compared with the reception extended to the workers on first arrival. A complete transformation of the lives and habits of the natives, who are chiefly Spaniards and Roman Catholics, has now evidently taken place. "Indeed, the Lord has wrought a miracle in me by the Holy Spirit anointing my eyes to look out on this island, claiming it as his land. No missionary is here—only the colporteur."

The Word of God is virtually an expelled book in the Spanish dominions. "Spain wants," adds Mrs. Macknight, "those to come to her help who will feel her sorrows and read and pray with her out of the living Word of God." Many have received it most gladly, and during August we were enabled to give or sell over fifty Gospels, and a few Bibles and Testaments, in Spanish. Pray for us, for the coming kingdom is near, and not a day should be left without fruit unto harvest. Picture leaflets and 'British Workmen' have been kindly sent to me, and they are valued for the pictures. Anything about animals is specially valuable among these people.

"At one distant village, twenty miles from Las Palmas, a circle of Bible readers has openly been formed; and day by day they meet and are receiving truth."

Mrs. Macknight's address is Monte, Las Palmas, Canary Islands.

Anglo-Indian Evangelization.

IN her letter in a recent issue, Miss A. G. Hill, the travelling secretary of the Indian Y.W.C.A., calls attention to what is really "a felt need in India." I should rejoice to see an earnest Christian woman at work among the families of our European railway employés in every large railway community in India.

Miss Hill gives a true account of the moral and spiritual condition of these communities, in which the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society has been carrying on evangelistic work for nearly thirty years. India is not a country, but a continent, and the Society has never been able to occupy the vast field as its directors have desired. Still it has carried on most valuable work, not only among Europeans along the railway lines, but in other remote parts of India, such as the tea and coffee planting districts. Its evangelists generally live in some railway town, from which they labour as a centre. They not only hold services, but they also visit the people in their homes, and conduct Sabbath schools for the children. There are also several evangelists who give part of their time to railway work in Bengal, as well as in the Punjab and the North-West; while evangelistic tours are undertaken during the cold season among the tea planters.

These agencies do not by any means cover the whole vast field to be occupied in India, but a most hopeful forward movement has recently been inaugurated with a view to extending the work. Rev. P. R. Mackay, late of Prestonpans, about a year ago resigned his charge and went out to India as secretary of the society, and Mr. Alexander Stewart, of Wardie, Edinburgh, accompanied him to labour as an honorary evangelist. Mr. Mackay has already been able to appoint two additional evangelists, and he is just on the eve of appointing a third.

We have the prospect of sending out other agents from home soon, and a devoted Christian lady, going out to India, has agreed to become an hon. worker among the railway people. Hence a hopeful future is dawning for the Society, and we hope soon to occupy the vast field more adequately than hitherto.

Soldier Lads in India.

Letter received by REV. F. B. MEYER.

MISS POGSON and I left Ludhiana eight days ago on special business—looking into the abominable dens of vice formerly maintained and still sanctioned by military authorities for our soldier lads, many of whom I am sure would not go astray were it not for the inducements put in their way by the authorities. It is a matter on which I cannot write freely, but we have been horrified with what we have seen.

Even up in the mountains, with everything beautiful around, and plenty of exercise in the fresh air possible, these places of iniquity are found here and there in out of the way corners, the poor sinful women being huddled together in open sheds, into which no merciful man would put his beast during the inclemency of the rainy season. "Below the mules you will find the women," our guide said. But the mules were far the best housed.

We marched four stages, thirty-five miles, through most lovely mountain scenery; but our hearts were heavy, and Miss Pogson said: "Come what may, I must do all I can to save the boys." So we talked over the places for the Jallandar Soldiers' Home, and reminded each other of your kind promise to find us a helper, if possible, when you got back from America. And, behold! the first thing we find on reaching Murree is THE CHRISTIAN, with your most kind appeal on our behalf for the Medical School and the Soldiers' Home.

Coming down the mountain Miss Pogson picked up a leaf out of a small Bible containing the last two chapters of Ezra, and she took chap. x. 4 for a God-sent message: "Arise, be of good courage, and do it." So on her way back to Ludhiana to-day, just now when I am writing, she is looking for a house suitable, and I am to see it (D.V.) on my way down next week. M. ROSE GREENFIELD.

Waifs in the Far West.

A COMMUNICATION from Rev. J. R Matheson, who is labouring in the district of Onion Lake, Sask., N.W.T., Canada, gratefully acknowledges the kindness of an "unknown friend," who regularly forwards THE CHRISTIAN to that distant land. "The work," says Mr. Matheson," is growing so rapidly that it taxes my utmost energies to provide room for the little half-breed, and Indian waifs and strays. In nearly every instance these are rescued from the twin blindness of Romanism and heathenism. The Roman Catholic half-breeds are waking up to a sense of their need, and are handing me their children from far and near, some of them bringing them ten days' journey to place them in our care."

Mr. Matheson adds that the Department of Education is disposed to grant a sum to assist his undertakings, but still he labours in confidence that God's people will sympathize with him in a practical manner.

Famine in British East Africa.—In connection with the severe famine in British East Africa, Mr. Richard Lambert, hon. sec. of the C.M.S. Lay Workers' Union for Bradford, writes respecting the efforts of Mr. J. A. Wray, who has been working at Taita for some years for the C.M.S. Mr. Wray is labouring with industry and devotion to succour those who are suffering as a result of the famine, and Mr. Lambert has undertaken to open a fund on his behalf. Communications may be addressed to 21, Northfield Place, Bradford.

Villa Helvetia, Mentone.—The twenty-fifth annual report of this Home of Rest for Ladies, whose means are limited, and who are suffering from ill-health, shows the utility of this institution in various ways. Another successful year has been passed, both as regards the support accorded the Home and the number of ladies who have taken advantage of the privilege thus afforded of spending a winter in the South of France, and enjoying the means, with the blessing of God, of restoration to active life. Services are held at the Home by Mons. Delapierre, and the ladies, of different nationalities and all Protestant denominations, are free to attend whatever church they prefer. Further information will be given by Miss Dudgeon, at Villa les Grottes, Mentone.

A Visit to Herrnhut.

By H. GRATTAN GUINNESS, D.D.

A FOUNTAIN throwing up its sparkling waters in the midst of an old countrified square, tastefully laid out with shrubbery and gravelled walks, where the children stroll about in cheerful groups, in the interval of their lessons in the neighbouring school; a large, quaint, four-storied mansion with more than thirty windows in front, and a long, lovely garden behind, occupying the corner of the square, and houses of various styles of architecture with high, red-tiled roofs, the rest—one of which is a Gasthof or hotel; four or five quiet streets branching off in different directions from the square, with roomy dwelling-houses — some for single men, some for single women, others for married people, with flowers showing here and there in the windows; a few shops, an old church, and a post-office, and, round about, green meadows, cultivated fields, charming woods, and hills in the distance; such is Herrnhut to-day.

The large mansion in the square was Count Zinzendorf's house. There is an aspect of purity and peace about the place. The week-days seem like Sunday. An old avenue leads to some rising ground, where there is an extensive cemetery surrounded by trees, in which hundreds of horizontal gravestones, all of the same size and equi-distant, with simple inscriptions, lie on the turf. The graves of the Zinzendorf family occupy the centre. A mile further on is the pretty village of Berthelsdorf, in which stands the old chateau of the Count. Near it is a plain, roomy church, with two low galleries for men, one above the other; seats below in the body for women, and a large pew, quite a windowed chamber, formerly used by the

and now by the elders of the community, on a level with the first gallery, near the pulpit. The walls and pews are painted so as to look like white polished marble. An old shrubbery surrounds the chateau, and on the slope of the hill are some well-kept gardens and neat dwelling houses, half wood, half stone; while at the bottom of the hill a stream ripples through the village, and, falling over a little weir,

FILLS THE AIR WITH CEASELESS SONG.

In the simple, peaceful homes of Herrnhut dwell about a thousand people, a number of them returned missionaries, aged, and resting from their toils. This is the centre from which they went forth when they became missionaries, the centre from which thousands of missionaries have gone, the centre from which the labours of between 400 and 500 missionaries are still directed; missionaries labouring in Greenland, Labrador, and Alaska, in the West Indies, in Jamaica, St. Thomas, St. Croix, Antigua, St. Kitts, Barbados, Tobago, Trinidad, in Nicaragua, Demerara, and Surinam, in South Africa, in Kaffraria, and Nyassaland, in Queensland, in North India among the mountains of Himalaya, and even in Jerusalem, where there is a lepers' home under their care.

Nearly 100,000 members gathered from among the heathen are found to-day in the churches ministered to by their missionaries, and 30,000 in various Moravian centres in Europe and America, with schools, churches, and settlements, from which radiate healthful influences on surrounding populations.

How wonderful are God's ways, for all this blessed Christian life and missionary labour is from Him. He is the living fountain in the midst, and has been these 150 years and more, ever since the beginning of this Herrnhut settlement on the borders of Saxony and Bohemia, where groups of Bohemians and Moravians, the spiritual children of the martyrs John Huss and Jerome of Prague, took refuge from their Roman Catholic persecutors. Never was any persecution more cruel and prolonged than that of the Protestants of Bohemia. They were persecuted for centuries. They were pillaged, hunted, imprisoned, starved, racked, broken on the wheel, hanged, beheaded, burned at the stake, thrown in thousands into old mine pits, crushed, exterminated. Yet, they live!

A fountain springs to-day in Herrnhut, whose waters flow forth to many a wilderness, and make the desert blossom as the rose. Thousands of children sing sweet hymns to Jesus Christ in many languages and many lands, who have learned all they know of Him in schools taught by these Moravian Brethren; these whose ever since Zinzendorf's day, has been the Gospel of "Jesus Christ and Him crucified." Life out of death, such has been the story. As Jesus Christ, slain by the hands of men, was raised from the dead to bless and save his enemies, so has it been with his suffering, martyred Church.

Rome conquered the Hussites on the field of carnal strife, but has been conquered, in her turn, by Hussites and Moravians, by the spiritual weapons of faith, love, gentleness, and long-suffering; by prayer and patience; by the pen of the writer, the palm of the martyr, the pulpit of the preacher, the courage of the confessor, the purity of Christian characters and lives reflecting the moral loveliness of the Redeemer of the World. And from these Moravian witnesses has sounded forth the Word of God to distant lands. Their mission, like that of their Master, has been chiefly to

THE POOR WHO COULD NOT REQUITE THEM.

They have gone for his sake to the snows of Greenland, to the burning deserts of Africa, to the fever-stricken swamps of Central America; to low, lost tribes; to the savage, the leper, and the slave; and, in the name of Jesus Christ, have broken their fetters, washed their wounds, illuminated their ignorance, and poured the balm of consolation and hope into their miserable, despairing hearts. Jesus Christ has done it through them. They were nothing. They are nothing, and they know and confess it, and glory in this, that He is all.

And still the fountain springs in the midst of the peaceful Moravian settlement at Herrnhut, flinging up its spray in the sunshine, and falling on the verdure round it in refreshing showers. And still, evening by evening, from the old church in Herrnhut, with walls and benches of marble whiteness, the song of praise and the voice of prayer ascend, summer and winter alike—an unceasing act of worship rendered to Him for whom the martyred fathers of the community died, its honoured founders lived, and the devoted missionaries who succeeded them have laboured, bearing his name to earth's remotest bounds.

On the Upper Zambesi.

WRITING from Sesheke to friends and supporters in this country, Rev. F. Coillard bears striking testimony to the goodness of God while travelling up country to the Zambesi. The venerable pastor led a numerous expedition, which included Mr. and Mdme. Lorriaux, bound for the mission of Basutoland; Mons. Verdier, an artisan evangelist, for Barotsiland; and his friend, Captain A. Bertrand. As many as fourteen other brethren and sisters joined the party at Buluwayo to take up work in Barotsiland. Referring to the treatment extended to them in South Africa generally, Mr. Coillard writes: "Our stay at Cape Town was much longer than we expected, and of it I could not speak but with feelings of deep gratitude. The Government and the Chartered Company made to us all possible favours within the limits of reason and justice, for our travelling on their railway lines and the transport of our goods, and kindness was showered upon us by friends, many of whom were hitherto unknown to us. Public meetings had been organized before our landing, and, with such a man of God as the beloved and venerated Andrew Murray, you may imagine what they were, and what was also the warmth and the tenderness of his 'welcome' and 'God Speed' to us."

With regard to the mission at Basutoland, it is gratifying to learn from Mr. Coillard's communication that, although many influential friends have gone, the churches have awakened to a sense of their duty towards the blacks, and even the Dutch have now their own missions in the Transvaal, in Banyailand, and also in Nyassaland. "The most beautiful, loving spirit has ever prevailed among us. Never the shadow of a murmur, a hasty word, or a look lacking in frankness, clouded our intercourse. The King was with us, and we followed in his train. That was the feeling."

Thus it will be seen that the movements of the expedition were characterized by much harmony, though progress was often made under very trying circumstances. "We arrived on the banks of the Zambesi," continues Mr. Coillard, "on the 18th of May, and the last waggon on the 23rd. Sad news had already reached us, a few days before, of the death of Mdme. Louis Jalla. She had returned from Europe a few months before, unknowingly and simply to lay down her life for the Barotsis. The meeting with our beloved brother, who hastened from Sesheke to welcome us at Kazungula, was affecting. Our young missionary ladies had thought of her as the mother of the Mission since Mdme. Coillard was no more; and they, too, like us, felt bereft."

Crossing the river, another unwelcome visitor, —fever—thrust himself upon the missionaries, who, forced by circumstances, were divided into two bands—one at Sesheke, and the other at Kazungula, each place soon becoming a permanent hospital. "Only two or three of us have hitherto been spared—to all the others life has been a struggle, and some of them have given us, and give us still, great anxiety. One, the youngest of the whole party, Mdme. Bouchet, succumbed after ten days of illness. She was a very amiable and gifted young lady. The sickness that carried her away was fever, of course, but with a complication. Our only doctor—Dr. de Prosch—was away at Kazungula, some sixty miles off, spending himself with other patients."

King Lewanika heartily welcomed the missionaries, despatching a large number of canoes, and overland some sixty porters.

Nehemiah's Prayer.—Neh. i. 1-11.

Golden Text.—Neh. i. 11.

Lesson Connection.

AFTER the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem, nearly 100 years passed, and the Jews at Jerusalem grew careless, and indifferent, and wicked, some of them. They intermarried with the idolators, neglected the Sabbath and God's laws, and took no trouble to restore their beautiful city and rebuild its walls. God raised up two men who left their homes in Persia, and went to try and do good to their countrymen in Judea. One was Ezra, of whom you heard two Sundays ago, and the other Nehemiah, of whom we learn to-day. (Impress upon the scholars the wondrous love and forbearance of God in not casting off these wicked Jews and having no more to do with them. How could they grow careless after his great deliverances? Are we much better?)

Nehemiah.

Try and fancy yourselves looking into that Grand Palace of Lilies at Shushan. Who lived there before? It is about thirteen years since Ezra first went to Jerusalem. The same king (the son of Esther's king) is reigning. He has been king for twenty years. You see, with the King in his private room, a fine, handsome young man, who is his favourite, counsellor, and statesman. He holds the highest office—that of cup-bearer to the King. The most trusted man had to hand the King his cup, and generally taste the wine first, for fear there should be any poison in it. This man is a Jew, and his name Nehemiah. (Name some other Jews who were raised to high positions, though in captivity.) Nehemiah was a very rich man, and very clever, and had a splendid character. Though surrounded with luxury and worldly honour in a heathen court, he loved his God, and his country, and his people. He was a man of prayer, sympathy, and self-sacrifice. God's honour stood first with him. (Describe a true patriot.)

The Book of Nehemiah.

This is a continuation of the history in the Chronicles and Ezra. Notice that the greater part was written by Nehemiah himself. It is written in the first person (chap. i.-vii. and xiii.). It contains the story of Nehemiah's first visit of twelve years to Jerusalem, and his second visit a year or two later. The whole book may be taken as an illustration or allegory of a soul's salvation (chap. i.). Conviction and confession of sin (chap. ii.). Resolutions and determination to lead a new life (chap. iii.). The rebuilding of character (chap. iv.). Enemies from without (chap. v.). Temptation from within (chap. vi.). Subtle temptation of the wicked one (chap. vii.). Successful spiritual work, &c. (Bunyan's "Mansoul").

Neh., Chap. i. 1-11.

Josephus tells us that Nehemiah was one day walking outside the walls of Susa, and overheard some travel-stained men talking in his own language, Hebrew. He introduced himself, and found one of them was his own brother; from them he learned the story which made his heart so sad. God's kingdom on earth was in danger. For four months Nehemiah wept and prayed, and his face bore traces of his grief. Our lesson gives us the substance of the prayer. Point out the characteristics of this prayer.

Verse 5. The adoration and the attributes of God (Get the scholars to repeat these). All prayer should begin thus.

Verses 6, 7. The entreaty is earnest, humble, penitent. Confession of sin comes before forgiveness.

Verse 8. Pleading the promises; note how well Nehemiah knew his Bible, and based his prayer thereon.

Verse 10. Trusting God because of past mercies and experiences.

Verse 11. The plea, we delight to fear thy name; our plea is for Jesus' sake, who delights to fear thy Name.

Practical Lessons.

(1) How to pray? (Luke xi. 1-4). Give other examples of Bible prayers.

(2) It is our duty to do all we can for the good of our country.

(3) Prayer prepares us for service.

(4) A knowledge of God's word helps us to pray. Compare verse 5 with Dan. ix. 4, 5; Deut. vii. 9. Verse 6, with 2 Chron. vi. 40; 1 Kings viii. 29, 52.

Schools for Bible Study.

THE second of Rev. Hubert Brooke's lectures on Bible study was given at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday of last week, to a large and attentive audience.

The Old Testament was the subject of consideration, and Mr. Brooke dealt with it under four heads.

I. Composition. 1. Contains thirty-nine books, by thirty or thirty-two authors, who lived during at least 1,100 years. 2. Consists of history, law, poetry, philosophy, prophecy; divided by the Jews into the law, the prophets, the Psalms; and by us usually into the Mosaic, the historical, the poetical and the prophetical books. 3. Is an Eastern book, by Israelitish writers, concerning Divine matters, with progressive revelation and prophetic portions.

II. Sub-divisions. 1. The Law, or the Pentateuch, the five books of Moses: A record covering at least 2,500 years. 2. The Prophets: (a) The former—descriptive (forth-tellers, not foretellers), Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings. (b) The latter—predictive: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets. These cover about 1,000. 3. The Psalms (so named from the first book), or the Writings (Heb.), or the Sacred Writings (Greek): (a) Psalms, Job, Proverbs. (b) The five scrolls: Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther. (c) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles.

III. General Purposes. 1. To point to Christ: "All roads in the Bible lead to Christ" (Jno. v. 39, 46; xii. 41; Lu. xxiv. 27, 44). There are 100 distinct predictions of Christ, and 300 which converge in Christ, in the Old Testament. 2. To describe in full the lines of New Testament history: proving inspiration of Old Testament, and attesting Divine character of New Testament; e.g., Matt. i. 1-17, historical connection; Matt. i. 22, 23; ii. 6, 15, 18, 23, prophetic connection. Note the exceedingly close connection of Old and New Testaments. (a) Only five chaps. in Gospels without allusion to the Old Testament (cp. Lu. i. 5-9). (b) 600 quotations from Old Testament in the New.

IV. Personal Use. 1. "Written for our sakes" (Rom. iv. 23, 24; 1 Cor. ix. 9). 2. "For our learning" (Rom. xv. 4); and enlightenment (Rom. xvi. 26). 3. "Written for our admonition and examples" (1 Cor. x. 6, 11). Fullest summary in 2 Tim. iii. 16; to teach by (a) doctrine (Rom. xv. 4); (b) reproof (Heb. xi. 1; Jno. xvi. 8); (c) correction (Lu. xiii. 13; Acts xvi. 16; Heb. xii. 12); (d) instruction (Heb. xii. 5, 7, 8, 11). Observe the result of this use of the Old Testament as seen in (a) adaptedness for God's work, and (b) equipment for it (2 Tim. iii. 17; ii. 21; Eph. ii. 10).

Rev. G. Soltau's Lectures.

In addressing classes recently, Rev. G. Soltau took for his subject, "The Four Portraits of the Lord Jesus." He remarked that the features of the Four Gospels, giving the Four Portraits, may be summarized as follows:—

Matthew shows Him as "The King," head of the Jewish race. Symbol, "the Lion." Gives genealogy to David and Abraham (line of succession). Writes specially for Jews. Opening question, ii. 2: "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" Closing statement (xxviii. 18), "All power is given unto Me . . . I am with you alway."

Mark shows Christ as "The Servant," head of the Church. Symbol, "the Ox." No genealogy—for "a servant only needs to produce character from the last place" (i. 11). Writes for Romans. Opening question (vi. 3): "Is not this the Carpenter?" Closing statement (xvi. 17): "In my name shall they," &c.; "the Lord also working with them." Writes from others' impressions (cp. Zech. iii. 18). God sends you his Servant, skilled, working, living, dying, risen for you.

In Luke we have the portrait of "The Man," head of the Human Race. Symbol, "the Man." Gives genealogy back to Adam. Writes specially for Greeks. Opening question (ii. 49); "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Closing statement (xxiv. 57): "While He blessed them He was parted from them." Writes from others' impressions (cp. Zech. vi. 12). See Him entering the world as you did, growing up in it, working for his daily bread. He is a Prophet, too, bearing a message from God.

In John the portrait is "The Son of God," head over all things. Symbol, "the Eagle." Gives no genealogy; but says, "In the beginning . . was God." Writes for the world. Opening question (i. 38): "Where dwellest thou?" Closing statement, "Abide in Me and I in you." Writes from personal impressions (cp. Is. iv. 2). Combines all the features of the other three. Tells you that Christ's sphere is the world, and his love is for the world; that his miracles were the will of God, not merely of compassion. He says, "Come and see," "Reach hither thy hand," "Come and dine," inviting to intimacy of fellowship.

Caravan Mission to Village Children.

THE annual meeting of this Mission was recently held in the Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate Street. The room was crowded with an enthusiastic audience, comprising the active workers, and many who follow up their work by correspondence with the children reached and influenced by the itinerant missionaries. Mr. Bishop, of the Children's Special Service Mission, was in the chair.

Mr. Harrison and Major Mackinlay reported on the work in Sussex, conducted with the aid of a van and tent. Two hundred and thirty new members were obtained for the Scripture Union, and five new branches started, with five meetings established for Christian children.

Messrs. Fred Glover (Somerset), Frank McLaine (Kent), J. H. P. Cutting (Suffolk), Rowe (Essex), and Ingram (Bedfordshire), all spoke of their work in similar matter. Satisfactory results appear to have followed the efforts of all the evangelists.

Other speakers were Messrs. Hewlett (who spoke of the correspondence feature, and appealed for earnest Christians to undertake systematic correspondence with the children), Goodman, and Spiers. The latter gentleman is hon. treasurer, and resides at Meran, Polworth Road, Streatham.

He First Loved.

If the heart is cold and lonely,
And the friends are parted far;
Ask thy soul this question only,
Can a Christian cease to wonder—at His love?

How He loved the erring woman
Bowed with sin and dumb with shame!
Greater love is not in human—
Can a Christian cease to wonder—at His love?

On the cross He died to save thee—
Still He bears those brands of love—
All thy many sins forgave thee;
Can a Christian cease to wonder—at His love?

E. V. K.

Kingswinford. — The Unsectarian Mission, initiated and conducted by Mrs. Dunn, continues to prosper. Numbers of people, including some of the worst characters in the district, have professed conversion. The present hall, which was formed from a coach-house and stable, is much too small to accommodate those who desire to attend. It is proposed to enlarge the building to twice its present size. The villagers are contributing generously towards the cost, but their means are small. Communications may be addressed to Mrs. Dunn, Moss Grove, Kingswinford, Dudley.

Wandsworth Road, S.W.—Another season of blessing in open-air work has just concluded at this centre. It is now a good many years since Mr. John Soames commenced operations in the neighbourhoods of Battersea and Clapham. Since Good Friday upwards of 200 open-air gatherings have been held, and thousands of Gospel tracts distributed. During the winter months the Mission aims at feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, as well as instructing the ignorant. The secretary is Mr. E. Moffatt Soames, Howard Street Gospel Mission, Wandsworth Road, S.W.

Dr. Scofield at New Court.

DURING the absence of the pastor, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, in America, the pulpit at New Court has been occupied, for the greater part of the time, by Rev. C. I. Scofield, D.D., pastor of the First Congregational Church, Northfield, Mass.

Dr. Scofield is Mr. Moody's pastor. The students at the Northfield and Mount Hermon seminaries (numbering nearly 1,000) attend his ministry, so that it may be said he preaches to one of the largest congregations of young people in the world. And he is well fitted to do so. He is a rare combination of strength and tenderness, dignity and kindly familiarity. His appearance suggests the sturdy Puritan, a man among men, without the slightest trace of either the cleric or professional. To converse with him is to discover the man of large heart and broad sympathy. His perfectly natural way of talking about spiritual things reveals the reality of his submission to the Divine will, while his whole nature seems to be sweetened and inspired by the love of God shed abroad in his heart. To know him is to love him.

During part of September, and throughout the present month, he is preaching every Sunday and Wednesday evening in the New Court Church. The congregations have been very large, and special interest has centred in the week-night service, when he has given himself up to his favourite work of exposition and teaching. On Wednesday evening last his subject was and his text Luke xi. 2, "And He said unto them, 'When ye pray, say, Our Father.'" Christ, said he, gave many promises as encouragements to prayer. He thought it necessary to pray Himself, and that fact emphasizes the importance and usefulness of prayer. But this is the Master's only statement of a philosophy of prayer, and He bases it upon relationship.

All people have moral relationship with the Creator; the believer and the unbeliever are alike responsible to Him. But while this is true, the Christian has an absolutely different relationship to that of the world—one symbolized in the bonds of love uniting parent and child—and may it not be that God instituted earthly relationship in order to illustrate that existing between the regenerate and God? Her Majesty the Queen is sovereign, and, in a sense, mother of her people; but, however much she may love them, there is the inner circle of her own family where her love is naturally more deep and true. The pastor loves his people, and is ready to sacrifice much for them, but in his home there is closer relationship still. So all belong to God, but the Christian has entered into a relationship in which he is a child, and God is "Our Father."

There are other philosophies of prayer. It is said that God is a decree maker—that everything is arranged from the beginning. Those holding this doctrine agree to pray, but claim that the good thereof lies in reflex influence upon those praying—that to think it possible to influence God or events is childish. Yes, for the child, by his request, expects to produce action on the part of the Father, and if the foreknowledge of God is asserted, remember that the petition is included therein.

IT IS CHILD-LIKENESS,

Another theory is that of law. Men discover nature's workings, and crowd God out. To discover a law of nature is only to find out God's usual way of doing things. That is not to say that He will never do otherwise. A man holding a book in his hand suspends, within limits, the operation of the law of gravitation. Who shall say that God cannot do as much as man? There is great danger of being so occupied with these secondary considerations that the first is pushed back out of sight, and God is not recognised. Let the disciples of law remember that it also touches affection—there is a law of love. The mother must go to her child. It is the compulsion of a natural law. Travelling from Chicago to New York by the Pennsylvania, Limited—one of the fastest trains in America—the passengers were surprised to find themselves side-tracked, together with several other trains. Presently an engine and a single coach went by at highest possible speed, and then they proceeded on their journey. At the next station they learned the reason of their delay. The son of the president of the railroad had met with an accident at Pittsburg, and the father had side-tracked even the Pennsylvania Limited, in order to reach his boy at the earliest possible moment. Shall God do less for his children in the hour of their need?

God is more than creator, artificer, and maker of creeds—He is a Father. The universe is but the garment that He wears, the inheritance of the sons of God. Someday they will explore every part of it, but in the meantime prayer remains the greatest factor in all power and blessing.

Destructive Criticism.

NOTICING recent critical discussions upon Holy Scripture, Mr. James Barton, of Dundalk, writes to a Dublin contemporary:—

These addresses, with one exception, put forward the sceptical views of the "higher criticism," as it is termed, treating them as if they were deeply interesting investigations, and reliable to a large extent, whilst the claims of Scripture to have been "given by inspiration of God" were ignored to such an extent that the single speaker who dared to stand up clearly for God's Book felt himself looked down upon as a fossil, and, whilst statements of the most destructive criticism were being made, our two Archbishops, and I doubt not, a large number of others who did not agree with these views, by their presence and their silence gave assent.

Who arranged to have these addresses given to the Church of Ireland? What good will be effected by setting the less cultured portion of the Church to puzzle over these attacks upon the certainty of those Scriptures upon which they have leaned as their basis of certainty for time and for eternity? Will these addresses help vital Christianity or the knowledge of what God has revealed to us? Is this Congress not likely to raise in many minds questions which those minds have not the means of proving or studying sufficiently to form a sound opinion? And is it not giving a help forward to that party who desire to see the laity give up Bible study and receive instead the opinions of their clergy?

If our glorious Lord and Master had stood as when on earth in that assembled congress, would not his words, as of old, perhaps have been heard? "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken!" "One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." "The Scriptures cannot be broken." "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." "The Scriptures must be fulfilled."

Thousands of souls who have found Christ Jesus as their Saviour, Friend, and Lord, have been told at this congress to give up the full acceptance of the Book from which our Lord continually quoted; on the promises on which He leaned and we lean, have been told that they cannot take the Bible to be what it professes to be—and will not some tremble to realize that if the Christ of God was mistaken in his views of Old Testament Scriptures, where is there certainty of anything? He had studied and fed his soul upon the Scriptures, met Satan with them, and tells men they "err not knowing" them; but now they are informed that He leaned upon much that was legend.

Why do I force myself to write thus? To raise through your columns a warning cry through the land to those whose hearts may be disquieted and disturbed, and to say to them, "Fear not, brothers and sisters, to stand with Jesus and his words as to the Old Testament Scriptures and the reality of its miracles. Fear not to rest with certainty where He rested; you rest upon a rock, which the wisdom of this world has always endeavoured in vain to move. Fear not, He will in his own good time and way clear up all difficulties, and, until He sees fit to do so, you and I will be satisfied to lean restingly on Himself, his Grace, and his Word.',

HOLIDAY HOME FOR POOR AND SICK CHILDREN.

This Home, situated in a most charming part of Epping Forest, which has for several years past been of incalculable benefit to many hundreds of poor little waifs and strays, many of them half famished and pent up in the narrow and stifling courts and alleys the whole year. To continue this much needed work during this season, an earnest appeal is hereby made for help to the Christian public. Last year over 500 were taken for one or two weeks and over; 3,000 for a day. Donations in any form will be gratefully received, and can be sent to the treasurer, at the Bank, 54, Lombard Street, E.C., to the Office of The Christian, or to the Secretary, 25, Brighton Road, Stoke Newington, N.

JAMES ATKINSON, Secretary.

Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland.

This Society continues to Spread the Word of God in the homes of the people, and never found a more open door, but funds are much needed to extend the Work.

Contributions will be thankfully received at the Offices, 27, Lower Pembroke Street, Dublin; or 9, Paternoster Row, London; and at the Office of The Christian.

"Little French Cousins."

PERHAPS the readers of the Children's Page would be interested to know a little about work going on amongst their little French cousins, who look so eagerly from week to week for the "Bible Searcher." Well, my dear young friends, you must first cross the Channel with me to sunny France, then on to the gay, beautiful city of Paris.

We pass out through one of the city gates beyond the barrier into Levallois Perret; and there, in a very quiet street, we come to a large gate, and, passing through a square court, with beautiful shrubs and a nice plot of flowers, we come to the home of one of the little families (the name given to small children's homes there). We now ring for admission, and, being early visitors, we find ourselves just in time for breakfast, 7 a.m. being the hour for that meal. The children have been out of bed for fully an hour, and already a good part of the morning's work is done.

All have their little part to do, and splendid little workers some of them are. We proceed to the dining-room, and receive a cordial welcome from the kind directresse (or maman, as the children call her), who out of love to our heavenly Father and his little ones came from Scotland three years ago to assist in this good work. A loving, painstaking mother she makes to these little ones, sparing no trouble, either in sickness or in health, to fit them for the battle of life, and guide their feet into the narrow way.

There are ten children, including Eda, who is cook, and who takes a big sister's care of the little ones. All are bright and happy, going to and fro to school, taking all their troubles and joys to their kind maman, who at morning and evening prayer opens up to them the spiritual truths contained in the portions for the day, and tells them the lovely Bible stories with which we have been familiar from our earliest years.

Uncle Tom's questions are eagerly looked for from week to week; and, after these have been translated into French, they take great pains to be correct in their answers, and eagerly look to see how many names have got "stars." They have many little friends who make garments for them, and along with these are constantly giving them nice little treats.

This good work is carried on through the liberality of Mdlle. De Neufille, whose kindness to these little ones is unfailing, and who, before commencing this work, interested herself and took many children for months to the seaside, where they had grand times, bathing and getting strong. Her reward shall be great in that day when she shall receive, from "The Friend of little children," the words, "Well done!"

The least of these little ones is very precious in the Lord's sight. This work was commenced in Paris twenty-five years ago by Mdlle. Hocker. You would have been pleased to see her little family, which numbers fifty. She still works bravely on, and it must rejoice her heart to know that others have followed her good example.

Light amid the Shadows.

A SOFT breeze was playing among the gay laburnum blossoms, sending its fragrance around the venerable man who sat on the rustic garden seat. Seventy summers had passed over his head, yet he thought this one the fairest. Flowers seemed brighter than ever, birds sang sweeter, and the very air held blessing.

Donald Rafton was old, they said; he could only say his heart was full of youthful vigour, and rich with heavenly grace of long and steady growth; he was anxious and determined to be still in harness, abounding in the work of God.

The seaport town held many strange characters. Men who appeared lost to all that was good and noble. These found a friend in Rafton.

"Not the righteous—sinners, Jesus came to call." And to such he felt drawn for very love of the Saviour who died for their salvation. Years of work in classes, meetings, and personal conversations had only increased his enthusiasm for souls, and that afternoon he had returned from holding a large meeting, where soldiers, sailors, and stray working men had been gathered to listen to the ever new story of redeeming love.

Then he began thinking of the coming harvest time for the Christian worker; and visions of faces that had sparkled with gratitude for what he had done for them made his heart rejoice. While he pondered thus, a gentle drowsiness crept over him, and the sights around grew dim. The hum of bees and song of birds became silent, and other sounds too wonderful to be described (he said) broke on his ears. He never told what he had heard or seen; but said, as in God's word, "He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love."

His sister returned from a visit, and found him there, unable to move. He made signs to her to have him carried into the house, for he was suddenly paralyzed. For days he lay partially unconscious, then he began to know what had happened. Sight was almost gone, and power had left one side. Speech imperfect, though returning. Beside him sat the faithful sister, his life's companion. Presently, she answered a rap at the door, and disappeared for a minute.

Two sailors stood within the hall; one was rough and weather-beaten, and seemed to tremble as he stood. "Is he bad?" was all he uttered first.

"My brother has been paralysed; but he is conscious now," she answered.

"Would you say to him, 'Jack Scrivener brings him a message of light amid the shadows.' That's all; and I'll wait, please."

Going slowly back to his room, the sister wondered at the strange man and his words, which she repeated to her brother. He listened, and asked her to say it again.

"Jack Scrivener!" he said, plainer than anything he had uttered since his stroke. "All these years I have prayed for that young scamp — now a man. Bring him to me, Catherine. He was in my Sunday class thirty years ago."

Then she remembered the story Donald had told her of that wicked lad, and how he ran away in disgrace.

While she talked with the companion sailor, Jack stood beside the old Sunday school teacher.

"Jack, I'm entering the shadows, I can hardly see you."

Bending over the bed the burly man said:

"Thank God I am in time to tell you your words and prayers have not been in vain. Thirty years since you told me of a Saviour who is mighty to save. I scorned your words, and ran headlong into sin, yet all down the years I never ceased to hear your voice pleading with me. When face to face with death some months ago, I seemed to hear you calling me to flee for life to Jesus. Now I come to tell the glad news, I am a saved soul; saved to be your crown of rejoicing, and to save many more, I pray."

Over the aged face a new joy spread, like unto harvest joy, for another soul gathered in. Labour in Christ's vineyard here was over, increasing prayer for the wanderer was assured, and Donald Rafton knew the dawning was near of that promised shining which would last for ever and ever (Daniel xii. 3).

About Books.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

The Young Crusader (1s. Church of England Temperance Society) will be of service to Band of Hope workers, as well as interesting to the children of our homes.

All the well-known features for home reading appear in the new volume of Home Words. (2s. Office: 7, Paternoster Square). The illustrations are numerous, and of a superior order.

The tenth volume of Bubbles, the now popular coloured periodical edited by Dr. Barnardo, is a book to delight the heart of youth. From the dainty outside cover, right to the end of its 336 pages, there is a wealth of colour and of story-lore that will charm everybody. (Coloured boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 5s. Office, 158, Aldersgate Street, E.C.)

Among annuals for young people, a prime place must be given to The Boy's Own Paper, of which the twenty-first volume is now completed, and The Girl's Own Paper, which is only one year younger. Each of these contains 840 pages of stories, and articles, and sketches by writers of eminence, fully illustrated. Here is reading for the winter months for the young people of our households. (8s. each. R.T.S.)

For persons of riper years there are our old friends The Sunday at Home and The Leisure Hour (7s. 6d. each. R.T.S.). Both are as rich as ever in contents, appealing to the intelligence and the heart. The latter monthly begins an entirely new series next month, and will exhibit various improvements in style, Sir Walter Besant contributing the leading story. The influence of these periodicals has ever been for good, and they deserve hearty commendation.

What would our homes be without such publications as those of J. F. Shaw & Co? The annuals bring brightness with the recurring season, and the young are always eager for them. Our Darlings has stories as well as other readings (3s. and 5s. according to binding); Little Frolic, in large type, is an established favourite in the nursery (2s. and 3s. 6d.); Sunday Sunshine is also a capital book for children, alike interesting and instructive in contents (1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.). All these books are admirably illustrated, and suited for the purposes of presentation.

There are no annuals more attractive than those issued by Messrs. Partridge. For the little ones there are The Infants' Magazine and The Children's Friend, both of them old acquaintances (1s. 6d., 2s., and 2s. 6d., according to binding). For elders there are The Family Friend and The Friendly Visitor, the latter in specially bold type (same prices). The British Workman (1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.) is as bright as ever; and the Band of Hope Review (1s. and 1s. 6d.), as useful, and certainly more convenient, in its present size of page. All these volumes are admirably illustrated, and so produced as to promise continued popularity among all ages and classes.

STORY BOOKS.

In Roses (2s. Hodder & Stoughton), Miss Amy Le Feuvre gives us a simple, neatly-written story, which will be read with profit and pleasure by young people and those who have the care of children.

Time Tries (1s. 6d. Nisbet) is a characteristic tale by Emma Marshall, contrasting the quiet content of a modest work-girl with the frets and discontents of the spoiled child of wealthy parents.

An entertaining temperance story for young or old, by Florence Moore, is entitled Patty, the Punch and Judy Girl (1s. 6d.). A very suitable gift-book. A village temperance story, by Miss M. J. Hagen, entitled Blot or Blessing (1s.), illustrates the evil which may arise from inducing a pledged abstainer to break his promise, and emphasizes the importance of influence, either for good or bad. (Church of England Temperance Society.)

Mr. Alfred H. Miles adds two more handsome volumes to his "Fifty-two" series. They are: Fifty-two Stories of Heroism in Life and Action for Boys, and Fifty-Two Stories of Heroism in Life and Action for Girls. The former has contributions by G. H. Henty, G. Manville Fenn, David Ker, Robert Overton, and others; the latter includes pieces from L. T. Meade, Sarah Doudney, Grace Stebbing, and others. Both volumes are illustrated. (5s. each. Hutchinson.)

Princess and Fairy (2s.) conveys, in a style likely to be relished in the family circle, some useful instruction in natural history. To reassure such as may object to fairy tales, it may be remarked that the Princess is a sick girl, the fairy her attendant, and the fairy land the realm of nature. The illustrations are excellent. The Spy in the School (3s. 6d.) is a characteristic story of school-boy life. Fix Bay'nets! or, the Regiment of the Hills (5s.), is a story by G. Manville Fenn. Needless to say, it is a tale of marching and fighting, of valour and woe, of horror in deed combined with honour in name. (W. & R. Chambers.)

A number of presentation volumes, suitable for the young, have been issued by S. W. Partridge & Co. Armour Bright, by Lucy Taylor, aptly introduces biblical teaching, and is simple and evangelical. In Friendship's Name, by L. Phillips, is a capital story for boys. The troubles of poor Dick provide excellent reading, and should prove stimulating to many a young mind. Kathleen, by Julia Hack, is intended primarily for girls, but is well calculated to help those who have responsibilities in training young people. (1s. 6d. each.) Bessie Drew, by Amy Manifold, is another girls' story of good tone, if not quite so full of religious teaching; and another pleasantly written tale of a similar kind is Roy's Sister, by M. B. Manwell. Boys will read with avidity Edith Kenyon's Lost in the Backwoods, with its vivid accounts of adventure in the pine forests of North-Western America. The name of Mrs. Craik on the title-page of Cola Monti is a guarantee of pure style and lofty moral, and the book is, on the whole, worthy of its author's reputation, in spite of occasional phrases which give it a somewhat archaic flavour. (1s. each.) Cripple George (9d.), a bright story, with lessons of stimulus and encouragement, of a poor lad's progress in life.

Among the books for the young just issued by Partridge & Co. are: Dapple and Dobbin's Picture Book, Pussies and Puppies, and Skipping Time, a story book in prose and rhyme. (1s. each). Under the Oak Tree and Tibby's Tales (6d. each) are not so large, but they are of a like bright and cheery character.

Kenooshao, a Red Indian tragedy. This is a thrilling account, by Rev. G. Barnley, of an actual tragedy by North-American Indians, and its retribution. The author was formerly a missionary to the Crees of the Southern Department of Hudson Bay territory. The book contains good illustrations, and the incidents are told in a vividly impressive manner. (1s. C. H. Kelly.)

Woman's Work is the organ of the women's branch of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. It is always filled with original matter sent by workers direct from the field. It represents a society which has fifty English lady missionaries, 160 native and Eurasian Zenana workers and Bible women, five centres for medical work, 18,000 girls under Christian instruction. (1d. monthly. Wesleyan Mission House, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C.)

A charming volume of musings is The Harvest of a Quiet Eye, by Prebendary J. R. Vernon. Surveying things natural and spiritual, the author attracts the intelligent reader at many points of interest, and he combines wise counsels with his restful meditations. The book has for some time been out of print. We welcome a new edition, in a form indicating the volume as in every way suitable for presentation purposes. (5s. Religious Tract Society.)

A forthcoming work which is likely to excite considerable interest is The British Empire and Alliances; or, Britain's Duty to Her Colonies and Her Subject Races. It is from the pen of Dr. T. E. S. Scholes, and issued by Mr. Elliot Stock. Political discussions are kept in strict limitations; but the lessons which history and present social conditions teach are suggested in the terms of wisdom and caution. The book is calculated to assist in the formation of a sound judgment on some of the most perplexing national and international difficulties of our times.

Messrs. Nelson & Sons' "New Century Library" marks an important development in English literature. The first volume, The Pickwick Papers, has just appeared. The special features of the series are that the volumes are of pocket size, measuring 4¼in. by 6½in., and only half an inch in thickness (including the cover), while the type is a large and beautiful long primer. Each volume contains from 800 to 900 pages. (2s. net.) This compactness of form is rendered possible by the use of the "Royal" India paper, which is said to be the thinnest printing paper in the world. The works of Scott and other standard authors are promised in the series, and the volumes will doubtless be welcomed alike for pocket and library use.

A pathetic interest attaches to mission work in Equatorial Africa, and a special honour seems to gather round the name of men who have "taken their lives in their hands" in order to proclaim the Gospel to dark and degraded races in "the Dark Continent." A substantial contribution to the literature of its subject is made in the Letters of Henry Hughes Dobinson, late Archdeacon of the Niger in the diocese of Western Equatorial Africa, compiled under the direction of his sister. (Seeley & Co.) After the slight biographical sketch come the letters, which are full of information and sentiments of profound human interest. The book is admirably illustrated.

Zenana Bible and Medical Mission.

A MEETING was held on October 17, at Morley Hall, George Street, Hanover Square, to bid farewell to a number of lady missionaries who are either proceeding or returning after furlough to their work in India. Lord Kinnaird was to have presided, but he was prevented owing to indisposition, and his place was taken at very short notice by Rev. H. E. Fox, who gave a brief address, in which he spoke some earnest words of encouragement to the members of the outgoing party.

Rev. A. R. Cavalier introduced the missionaries, pointing out that they numbered fourteen, and stating that of the total number eleven were returning after furlough and three were new missionaries. He dwelt upon the urgent need for more lady workers amongst the women of India, and said that it was a sad feature of their meeting that he was only able to introduce to them three additional workers. Two of the ladies returning, and one of the new missionaries, were qualified lady doctors.

After brief addresses, descriptive of work, from some of the missionaries present, Lord Overtoun added a few sympathetic words. The valedictory address was delivered by the Bishop of Honduras, who based his remarks upon the words, "Jesus only."

Noon Prayer Meeting.

THE noon meeting at Aldersgate Street on Monday last was notable for a number of fervent testimonies of a revival character. After Dr. C. I. Scofield, had given the first of a series of addresses on prayer, Rev. J. Wilson, of Woolwich, in an apt word on the power of example, told how a number of newly-converted young people to whom he had spoken, ascribed their spiritual awakening to the consistency of Christian fellow-workmen.

Mr. William Grove sent a cheering message respecting his Gospel Mission at Portsmouth. The veteran evangelist had never before witnessed such a glorious spiritual break among Sunday school scholars. Next, Mr. Ned Wright's familiar voice was heard in words of humble thankfulness for blessing on a recent mission, and Mr. Barry Wake, of the Open-Air Mission, added a breezy reference to work amongst pleasure-seekers at the recent great provincial fairs.

Mr. Leonard Weaver was able once again to speak of continued blessing upon the London tent work. In spite of the dense fog, the attendance had been very large, and the conclusion of the Sunday's services witnessed a never-to-be-forgotten scene. Amid deep solemnity, many had risen at the word of invitation, pressed to the front, and yielded to Christ. Among the many seekers they had joyfully observed the son of a well-known evangelist. Another interesting "tent" testimony from Mr. David Haxton pictured a pathetic scene where several rough labouring men, who originally acted boisterously towards the preacher, eventually became penitent. Tears coursed down their grimy faces, and they sought salvation.

The meeting concluded with prayer by Mr. Monro Collings and Mr. R. C. Morgan on behalf of the bereaved relatives, British or Boer, of those who had fallen at Glencoe and Elandslaagte, and that the war might come to a speedy termination.

Ealing Convention.—The eighth annual convention recently held at Ealing was a time of deep spiritual blessing. Each afternoon and evening the hall was filled with earnest and attentive audiences. God was graciously pleased to comfort, instruct, and refresh his people. Rev. H. S. Thwaites spoke from the first and last verses of Psa. cxxxix. The leading thought in Rev. J. G. Train's address was "fellowship with God and the furtherance of the Gospel," and in the evening Rev. C. G. Moore spoke of the "true centre of things, and of living there." On the following days Revs. W. H. Griffith Thomas, Dr. Hanson, and G. H. C. Macgregor gave addresses, the last-mentioned concluding with a fervent appeal for unconditional surrender to the will of God.

Billingsgate Christian Mission is an agency that amply vindicates itself. The need is unquestioned, and the work is unexceptionable. Year by year the story of progress is told in booklet form by the secretary, Mr. Alfred Walters; and the twenty-first such annual report is now in our hands, and entitled, "Go Forward." These words indicate the policy of the Mission, and we trust many will read the pages and become friends of the work. A medical mission is now associated with the more general operations; and, by preaching the Gospel and healing the sick, the workers follow in the Master's steps, and are privileged to witness the "signs following." Efforts are now being made to extinguish the debt on the building, and in this the assistance of the Christian public is solicited. Copies of the very readable report may be had by addressing Mr. Walters, at 19, St. Mary-at-Hill, E.C.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C. Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

ONE of Mr. Henry Varley's recent articles in our columns has been reprinted in booklet form, with the title The Resurrection and Priestly Assumption. (6d. per doz.; 3s. 6d. per 100. Morgan & Scott.) Several friends who realized the strength of the argument urged separate publication, in the hope that some who are under the spell of sacerdotal error may be helped to see that there can be no priest in the Church of which the risen Christ, the conqueror of death, is the glorious Head. If we are risen with Christ, we have no need of a priestly functionary to introduce us to Divine favour. "We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

Three articles appeared in these columns (Jan. 25, Feb. 2, 9) under the title, "Are we Right: a Serious Missionary Question," by Rev. J. Heywood Horsburgh, C.M.S. Missionary in China. The question was: Is it right to send out missionaries to reproduce in heathen lands the various denominations represented by the societies which send out workers, and so to divide the Christian converts of those lands into parties, instead of seeking to build up a strong united Church of Christ? The position taken by Mr. Horsburgh has led to his being separated from the C.M.S. We have before us a letter written by him on the occasion of their parting with him, the principles of the Society being such that he was obliged to sever his connection with it. The letter is prefaced with an introduction by Mrs. Baxter, 33, Drayton Park, N.; who, having seen it in MS., asked and obtained permission to publish it. It is written in a most courteous and loving spirit, while it very forcibly points out the evil of transferring to the regions beyond the sectarian divisions which weaken the Church at home. The letter, under the title "Is it Worth Considering?" may be obtained for a penny from the above address.

A report reaches us that a lady of rank, well known for her interest and sympathy in all good work, has placed at Dr. Barnardo's disposal a beautiful house in the country, fitted up in every way for the residence of girls who are to be trained as laundresses. The place was built for such a home; but the donor, unable perhaps to continue the burden of it, proposes to hand it over to Dr. Barnardo, and to continue her own personal interest in it. Help is promised by the donor in various ways, which will make the gift a very valuable addition to the institutions. There are many institutions, often but little known and poorly supported owing to their isolation, that might be greatly strengthened by similar affiliation with an association like Dr. Barnardo's, which, as our readers know, has recently become incorporated. Three or four such instances of co-operation have recently occurred, and Dr. Barnardo and his Council are only too pleased to communicate with managers of such homes as may desire to adopt such a course.

The cables from South Africa have brought sorrow and trouble into many hundreds of homes in Britain. The death of General Symons, whose wound was received in the hour of victory, and of so many fine officers and men, has sent a shock of deep pain throughout the land, and made us ask ourselves, with a fresh emphasis, if the terrible arbitrament of war is not an outward relic of barbarism. And what we have suffered, the Boers have suffered in still greater measure. Many a homestead in the broad Veldt will never see its head returning from the war, and many a wife and mother will go mourning to the end of her days. There is more trouble and tragedy to come, for the "fighting blood" of both sides is up, which means that many brave men will bite the dust ere peace return.

It is something of a relief, in view of the terrible losses already inflicted in the Natal campaign, to learn that both sides have shown a chivalrous kindness to the enemy's wounded, and that the Boer prisoners have expressed admiration of the humanity shown to them. The account of captors and captives fraternising round the British camp fires after the battle of Elandslaagte is gratifying reading. It is also good to hear that the firing of the Boers on companies of the Red Cross contingent attending to the wounded on the battlefield was due to misapprehension, for which regret has been expressed. Unquestionably the kind of treatment shown to the wounded and the captured will have much to do with the willingness of both sides, when the war is over, to forgive and forget. Soldiers respect two qualities in an enemy—courage during a fight, and mercifulness after it. The knowledge that both qualities have been shown by the combatants in this war is one of the "streaks of light" on a very dark horizon.

A very significant lesson may be drawn from the two forms of prayer in view of the war, which have been recommended by the Archbishops for use in the Episcopal Church. In neither of them is victory for our own arms supplicated for; but in the first, while a confession is made of the sins and forgetfulness of God on our own part "in the time of our wealth, which have partly led to this present strife," the prayer is put forth that God may grant, in his own good time, a righteous issue and the blessings of peace. The second form prays for protection for our soldiers, and comfort for those left behind. It would be difficult to suggest lines of supplication in more entire harmony with the spirit of the Gospel. In earlier times all nations boldly prayed for success, and both armies naturally did so. It is a sign of real advance in humility and in self-distrust, that we have ceased to arrogate to ourselves necessarily the right in our conflicts, and that we should pray rather for the supremacy of right than for conquest for our own arms. It is a suggestion we may well follow in our private as well as our public prayers.

Now that the Church Congress, the Baptist and Congregational Unions are well over their autumnal sessions, and other Churches are settling down for the winter's campaign, we may wisely reflect upon the source of all real success. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." We have no objection to wise organization, to definite method, to judicious arrangement; but such things are mere channels—nothing more. The work of the Church is carried on by the living power of God. Men are impressed, led to decision, and quickened for service by the might of the spirit of God alone. Man cannot create the wonderful energy that makes the desert blossom as the rose; he can but use that spirit of life which God has already provided. With us, for us, in us, by faith, is the all-powerful living Spirit of God. Every man who achieves anything for Christ is a co-worker with God.

The announcement has been authoritatively made that the aged Bishop of Liverpool will resign his See at the end of the year. The sole reason for this is the inevitable disabilities of old age, and no shirking of the great battle in behalf of Evangelical Protestantism of which Bishop Ryle has been a foremost champion throughout his long and honoured career. He has had the courage to stand out of late years in a very small but dauntless minority on the bench of bishops. In spite of the somewhat contemptuous references of the Church Times to him as a "controversialist of the extreme type, a follower of Puritan tradition," and to his "enthusiasm for vague Protestantism," he will take his place in the historic roll of the leaders who have been honourable and chivalrous in dispute, unbending in principle, and transparently Evangelical and Biblical in his views. May a successor be found to him who will not set himself to undo his splendid work for the pure and simple Gospel.

We can scarcely understand how the leaders in the sacerdotal controversy—e.g., the Bishops of Durham, Bristol, St. Albans, and the Archbishop of York—regard with so much complacency the present crisis in the Church. The facts of the case surely do not warrant the optimistic expressions so freely used in the Diocesan Conferences. There is still much uncertainty as to the result of the conferences of the "nonconforming" clergy in the diocese of London with their bishop in regard to submission to the Archbishops' "opinion." With this power in their hands the grief is that the bishops should have allowed the present "drift" to reach such serious proportions.

The Archbishop of York complains strongly of those clergymen who refuse to obey the Lambeth pronouncement, or who will only obey it during the lifetime of Drs. Temple and Maclagan. He very justly says:

> To use a convenient and exact term, having refused to obey the order of their diocesan Bishop, given in accordance with the provisions of the Prayer-book, they had determined simply to be a law to themselves in matters of ritual, and to recognise no authority capable of exercising legal control. In any earthly kingdom such a condition of things would be recognised as being literally a state of anarchy, and it could not be otherwise in the Kingdom of Christ.

The lawlessness of self-will may sometimes be mistaken for the law of conscience; it is a desire in religious things to do as we like. Such conduct, based on such a foundation, will neither bring honour to God nor good to ourselves. There must be a modus vivendi in the body of the faithful which individual members ought willingly to accept, or else quietly go their own own way and take the consequences. Free Churches are not ignorant of anarchy sometimes on the part of one or more members who imagine they are justified in doing what is right in their own eyes irrespective of every one else's judgment, and in defiance of very plain injunctions in the New Testament.

The Bishop of Manchester has spoken some useful words to Cambridge men on "Ordination and the difficulties that beset it," pointing out how excessive devotion to athletics and the attractions of a money-making and luxury-loving age hinder men from seeking the highest and best, the heavenly and spiritual. The world, in one form or another, is and always will be a hindrance to the spiritual, and must be overcome through faith in the Son of God. The young men of this age must make their choice, as men of God have had to do in every age. If the Bishop was fairly reported, we think he failed to press home the supreme motives for devotion to Christian work in the ministry of the Word; for while he promised, in the North at least, a fair stipend and good, attentive congregations, he seems to have said nothing of the love of Christ and of the man who is called being under a necessity to preach the Gospel, and under "a woe" if he fails to do it. None but the grander motives will produce an effective ministry.

Monsignor John Vaughan, in a sermon at St. John's, Islington, has been exalting Romanism at the expense of Protestantism in a way that must raise a smile in anyone who can compare Britain to-day with what she was before the Reformation, and with what she is, in contrast with typically Romanist countries like Spain and Italy. He likened his own Church to the sun in the skies, and the Reformation was the quenching of its light, and, in its stead, the setting up of a gas-lamp of English manufacture. His words here deserve quoting literally:—

> Well, the lamplight is found too weak. Occasionally it blinks and splutters. Sometimes, and generally at the most critical moment, it goes out altogether for a while, and leaves the country in total darkness.

It is clear that what is wrong here is just the meaning of the terms. All depends on what is spiritual light and darkness. If we are to take the condition of Italy, Spain, or South America as a commentary, we can only say that, if light means the knowledge of the truth, and the love of truth, we are not suffering very deeply from the "darkness" of Protestantism.

It is satisfactory to find the Secular Press awaking to a knowledge of the objects and ends of Rome, and to find other influential journals following the example of The Times in dealing boldly and fearlessly with the subject. Recently, in an able notice of Canon Pennington's "Counter-Reformation in Europe," the Saturday Review, heading its article "The Society of Jesus," gives a remarkable summary of the character of the Jesuits; and, referring to "the perennial and portentous suspicion" with which the Society is regarded, attributes that, in a large measure, to the deep repugnance of the Christian conscience provoked by the principles and methods of the Jesuit body.

Our contemporary quotes from one of the standard formularies of the Society a number of illustrations of their rules, not the least striking of which are these:

> When it seems to me that I am commanded by my Superior to do anything against which my conscience revolts as sinful, and my Superior judges otherwise, it is my duty to yield my doubts to him, unless I am constrained by evident reasons. I ought to be like a corpse, which has neither will nor understanding; like a crucifix which is turned about by him who holds it; like a staff in the hands of an old man who uses it at will for his assistance or pleasure.
> A sin, whether venial or mortal, must be committed if it is commanded by the Superior in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The reviewer credits them with having, in the Vatican Council, finally crushed constitutional Catholicism, and with the erection of "the fabric of a spiritual despotism vested in an infallible Pope;" and he adds that they perpetuate the moral standards of the sixteenth century, and that "the portentous extremes to which the worship of the Virgin Mary has advanced is their achievement," and that "the confessional is worked on the principles of their casuistry."

Numerous reinforcements for the foreign mission field have left the homeland this autumn, and are on their way to different centres of service. The C.M.S. has sent out a considerable contingent. The China Inland Mission has not been behindhand with a loyal band of volunteers. The London and the Baptist Missionary Societies have each despatched companies of willing workers. A few days ago, nine Presbyterian missionaries formed another detachment, chiefly for China and India. Thus it is that the great Head of the Church calls and qualifies, and then goes with his servants in the person of the Divine Spirit, that they may lack nothing in their toilful but honourable labours.

Many Sunday school teachers, mainly in our big cities, deeply lament the limited benefit which their scholars—who, in a great number of cases, have no religious influence at home—derive from their one hour's association with them on the Sunday afternoon. To many young Christians it seems that the labour expended upon preparation and on teaching is waste of both time and energy; and some are led to abandon their classes through discouragement and apparent unsuitability for the work. Of course this is a mistaken view to take of any effort put forth for God; but we have known some who have discontinued active service for Christ on this account, and we fear that not a few good workers may thus have been lost to the Church.

We would suggest to all our readers who are Sunday school teachers that our "Young People's Page" might do good service in this direction. Arrange to meet the children, either at your home or in a class-room, one evening in the week; induce them to bring pencil and paper with them, and let them write at your dictation the questions given in the "Bible Searcher." Study the questions with them for a few weeks, and let them in their leisure at home write out the answers each week, bringing them to the succeeding meeting for your examination. After a few weeks' instruction in this way, they might be left to find the answers without your assistance, and when competent encourage them to join The Christian "Bible Searcher," and to compete for the quarterly prizes given by the children's editor, "Uncle Tom." The rules will be sent to any boy or girl on application.

We have known exercises of this kind to be much appreciated by the parents of scholars, and some cases have come to our knowledge where an interest in eternal things has been awakened in the hearts of parents who have for long been indifferent to the claims of God: and who can estimate the influence which such a course would have upon the lives and characters of the scholars?

A correspondent, who has received "The Christian" Almanack, 1900, says he has seen it "with pleasure."

> It is one of my favourites. The picture is a good one, the information is useful; but the gem of it all are the daily texts. Old and familiar as many, if not most, of them are, they somehow all look new. They are taken out by an uncommonly skilful hand, by someone who knows the Bible as well as great scholars know their classics, and who manages to quote so that the text shall merit attention and provoke inquiry. It sets the mind a-thinking at once, and you go off on new and suggestive lines.
> It would be worth a preacher's while to have it handy for the sake of good texts to choose from. They are not a mass of aimless quotations. Sometimes the same subject is kept before the mind for a whole week, but each day's text turns it round, and sets it in a fresh light; and still additional freshness is imparted by the use made of the marginal readings and the Revised Version.

The sympathetic reception given by the Home Secretary to the Burial Reform deputation gives some hope that the remaining disabilities under which Dissenters suffer will soon be relegated to the ever-lengthening list of reformed abuses. This question, only half settled in 1880, needs one more effort, and the equality of treatment to all that is aimed at will be secured. That reform is seriously required, is seen in the fact that men of such diverse opinions as Lord Cranborne, Mr. Carvell Williams, Mr. Jebb, and Mr. Talbot, attended with the deputation, and joined their voices in demanding that chapels built in public burial grounds, out of the rate-payers' money, should be "unconsecrated," and for use of all, and that a parochial clergyman should be bound to read the Church Service at every funeral when requested to do so, or to provide a substitute. The Home Secretary has promised to introduce a bill at the earliest opportunity, on the lines of the above suggestion, which is a compromise which all the members of the deputation have pledged themselves to support.

The influence of the open Bible upon the life and development of England cannot be fully estimated, its divine power having coursed through so many and such diverse channels; but a singularly interesting and noteworthy summary of the moral change effected by it during the years between the middle of the reign of Elizabeth and the meeting of the Long Parliament, has been given by John Richard Green in his "Short History."

> "England became the people of a book, and that book was the Bible," says the historian; and after pointing out that, "as a mere literary monument, the Bible remains the noblest example of the English tongue," he adds: "But far greater than its effect on literature or social phrase was the effect of the Bible on the character of the people at large. Elizabeth might silence or tune the pulpits; but it was impossible for her to silence or tune the great preachers of justice, of mercy, and truth, who spoke from the book which she had again opened to her people. The whole moral effect which is produced nowadays by the religious newspaper, the tract, the essay, the lecture, the missionary report, the sermon, was then produced by the Bible alone; and its effect in this way, however dispassionately we examine it, was simply amazing. One dominant influence told in human action, and all the activities that had been called into life by the age that was passing away, were seized, concentrated, and steadied to a definite aim by the spirit of religion. The whole temper of the nation felt the change. A new conception of life and of man superseded the old. A new moral and religious impulse spread through every class."

Dr. Scofield on Prayer.

IN a series of stimulating addresses delivered last week at the noon prayer meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., Dr. Scofield dealt with the subject of Prayer.

Basing his remarks on Matt. vi. 1-6, Dr. Scofield began by describing the circumstances under which our Lord spoke, and showing that He was emphasizing the need of humility and sincerity as opposed to the self-advertising practices of the Pharisees. There is a great difference, the speaker urged, between praying in public and praying to the public. No good purpose is served by prayer of the kind once described by an American reporter in the words: "Rev. Dr. —— made one of the most eloquent prayers ever offered to a Boston audience." The Pharisees sought — and obtained—the praise of men, and in that praise "verily they had their reward." But

WHAT A PITIFUL PRIZE IT WAS!

Passing to the consideration of prevailing prayer, and its effects upon the individual and the world, Dr. Scofield drew an illustration from Moses and the glory which shone upon his countenance when he descended from the Mount. God, who saw in secret, manifested openly that his blessing was upon his servant. As Dr. Bonar had said, when the Jews charged Stephen with speaking blasphemous words against Moses, God's reply was to cover his servant's face with glory, even as He had covered that of Moses, until "they saw his face, as it had been the face of an angel."

In giving some practical suggestions in connection with his subject, Dr. Scofield said that nothing is well done that is not done systematically. A life unpunctuated by regular periods of prayer misses much blessing. Let the day be commenced with prayer, let us keep the morning watch, not speaking with others until we have been with God, and his unction is upon us.

It is sometimes urged that people can find but little time for prayer, but it is an old saying that if we want something done for the Kingdom, we go to a busy man, not to an intellectual or spiritual loafer. The man who is busily engaged in the things of God is the one most likely to find time for prayer, which is the great unused factor of power.

The question of having a place in which to engage in prayer secretly, is also important. It is true that God can and does make a sanctuary for his saints in the car, the office, or the drawing-room. Nevertheless, our Lord was specific in his direction, "Enter thou into thy closet." In those words Christ still emphasized the importance of as against the publicity of the Pharisees. He had found great scrupulousness regarding externals, combined with spiritual deadness, and his words of introspection were to bring us from outward things to inward—"Shut thy door." Remarking on the results of prayer, Dr. Scofield said that the measure of the real spirituality, of the joyfulness and helpfulness of any life, is the measure of the time devoted to prayer. It is of the highest importance that Christians should be people who seek private communion with God. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty"—that is the key idea. In John x. our Lord says, "I AM the Door," and then follows the significant remark that his people shall "go in and out and find pasture." If we fail in the "going in" we cannot "go out" to manifest Christian character and effort.

Dr. Scofield made a pointed personal application from the words, "When thou prayest." He pointed out that a Christian never has a greater need to pray than when he feels least like praying. Moreover, God does not answer our state of ecstasy or otherwise, but our prayer. As to the attitude of the soul in approaching God, true reverence is associated with a godly, not a slavish and abject fear. The Almighty is not to be regarded as a being sundered from us by a terrible distance, for we are made nigh by the Blood, and given the right of entrance into his presence.

The prayer of faith means the prayer of confidence in God. 1 John v. 14, 15, defines it: "This is the confidence that we have in Him, that if we ask anything according to his will, He heareth us." The limitation is that it shall be "according to his will;" and we would have it so. It would be an ill arrangement had we an absolute control of affairs. On one occasion a number of friends discussed this question, and stated their various views of what they would do had they the power. Mr. D. L. Moody, who was present, on being asked to describe what action he would take, replied,

"I SHOULD RESIGN."

We must be willing to leave matters for God to arrange how and when He sees best. Coming to the root of the matter, the confident, tranquil faith that "grasps hold," is that which is saturated with the Word of God. Christ said, "If ye abide in Me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you."

Dwelling on the question of prayer which appears to remain unanswered, Dr. Scofield said the assurance that God "will reward thee openly," does not necessarily mean that an immediate affirmative reply will be forthcoming. Illustrating his point by personal reminiscence, the speaker recalled how, when young in the Christian life, he was much exercised on the subject; but received comfort from a wise pastor, who advised him to keep, for a time, a small book, entering on one side thereof a brief note of things asked of God, and leaving space for the date of answer. Dr. Scofield adopted the minister's advice, and found that very little time elapsed ere he was able to record many answers. This method acted helpfully, as a kind of prop, until he waxed strong, and no longer required its aid.

The Irish Revival:

Personal Testimony.

By GEORGE C. NEEDHAM, Evangelist.

THE first movement of spiritual life which swept over the Kerry mountains broke upon our valley with the suddenness of a tidal wave. The Revival in the north was in its incipient stage. The story of its advent had not yet reached us. So that when the interests of the soul took hold upon our people simultaneously, like the surprised Israelites when the manna fell, we likewise exclaimed, "What is it?"

Our awakening came through a passing visit from Henry Grattan Guinness. We knew little of conscience work until then. The late deeply-lamented Mr. Richard J. Mahony opened his castle for an evangelistic service. He had secured young Guinness for the occasion. It was a night to be remembered. Protestant families from our own and neighbouring parishes, with a sprinkling of Roman Catholics, filled the spacious and stately hall. On a raised daïs at one end stood the pale-faced youthful evangelist, his long, black hair resting on his shoulders.

Every feature of that Gospel meeting was a surprise. To most of us present, children and adults, it was the first religious service we had witnessed outside the routine worship of our parish church. The magnetic voice of the preacher, the explosive succeeded by the most pathetic and tender pleading; his earnest manner, and appalling solemnity, moved us to the depth of our being. Strong men wept, many trembled with agitation, while all were under a strange spell. We knew not its meaning. The Spirit was breathing as he listed, but of his gracious operations we were deplorably ignorant. His sovereign grace was to us unknown; He was leading us by a way we knew not.

As the preacher announced his text, its very recital was a revelation. His words took hold upon our hearts, and we were as young trees, bowing low before the mighty rushing wind.

Many that night felt the terror of the Lord before entering into peace with God. My own case represented that of others. I was in a maze, not having found the clue. A preparatory work before the great revival was done through that visit of Mr. Guinness. The bones in the valley were shaken. There was "a sound of a going." Drops from heaven fell here and there while clouds were collecting in mass for the great downpour.

In 1861 the Revival had come. In the choice of instruments God was sovereign. There were men and women of social position co-working with the common people. A rugged sailor was most zealous in his fiery ministry. He came, not from the wilderness, but from the sea; yet like the Baptist he warned us to flee from wrath to come. He spoke in parables. Our Egyptian ears understood not the language of Canaan. Yet his words were as goads to our seared consciences. With a few who were feeling after God, if haply they might find him, this sailor man held a cottage prayer-meeting. Other homes were offered, and prayer meetings followed in nightly succession. Whole families were thus drawn together. Sealed lips were opened. Converts began to testify. The country was in a blaze; the fire burned with glowing heat.

One never-to-be-forgotten evening my youthful feet were led to one of these prayer services. For some time I was ill at ease. There was unrest in my life which I understood not. "Conviction," "conversion," "regeneration" and being "saved" became current language, but were, to me, strange words. The meetings consisted of prayers, without the book, of hymns and testimonies full of

APPEAL TO THE UNSAVED.

The outburst of spontaneous prayer, fraught with petition, and rich in diction; the fervid singing of old hymns, and the apt quotation of Scripture on the part of young and old who had never been trained as public speakers, amazed and moved me. My heart was enlisted in sympathy with the spirit of the service. The atmosphere was congenial. A testimony from a boy eleven years old was peculiarly appropriate to my state of mind. It reached my heart with irresistible power. It refreshed me as water does the fevered body. His story was simple. On a previous evening, on his way home from meeting, this lad had felt his load of sin. Instantly, as if he had seen Him with his bodily eyes, the Lord Jesus became very real to him. He believed Jesus died for him and rose again. When he thus believed his burden was taken away. His soul soared heavenward, like a bird, in happy freedom. The bright eyes, the glowing cheek, the fluency of speech, made their impression. His words concerning Christ on the cross found me. This was the thought which mastered me: Jesus died for my sin. He bore my punishment. He paid my debt. He removed from against me the sentence of condemnation. He cancelled my guilt. Just then I could not thus express it, but I believed the great fact.

I had now seen the Lord. Was this indeed a vision? I saw the loving Saviour on the cross crimsoned with his sacred blood. With bowed head and face of ashen hue, He hung there.

MY HEART TOOK IN

this great reality. Then there swept over me a wave of undescribable sorrow, for it was my sin which crucified the Lord of glory. Yet even as I looked upon Him, a sweet sense of pardon filled my soul. I found the clue of the maze. The next moment, I too, a bashful, timid, country boy, who had never even publicly declaimed in school, became a joyful public witness of salvation through the blood of the Lamb.

In ten thousand souls, aye, and many more, throughout Ireland, the Holy Spirit wrought similarly. That was God's revival. He originated it. He promoted it. It was God who worked. It is God who still worketh. Shall we ever have another such revival? Not necessarily its peculiar characteristics, but its supernaturalness—its sovereignty. Are there not intercessors, who have power in prayer? Shall we not belt the world with prayer? From every continent, from every island, let the inwrought fervent cry arise from our souls: "O Lord, revive thy work!" May a Breath of Life from heaven soon come!

The Shepherd of Israel.

ZECHARIAH XI. 1-17; XIII. 5-9.

THESE two passages surely belong together, and, together, they give some remarkable foreshadowings of the ministry of the Messiah to his flock of the chosen people, as well as to those other sheep of which He spake, as not of that fold, but which He must bring, that they should become one flock, one Shepherd (John x. 16).

Five hundred years before Judas sold the True Shepherd for thirty pieces of silver—the price of a slave—and then, seized with remorse, flung the price of blood upon the Temple pavement, that scene had been enacted in the streets of Jerusalem, freshly risen from their ruins. There is prophecy in action, as well as prediction; and the Holy Spirit often led the prophets to embody in striking deeds the conceptions of the future which had been impressed on their own minds.

At the time of which we write the Jewish people seem to have been specially unfortunate. Joshua and Zerubbabel had both passed away, and the rulers and priests who had succeeded them were actuated by the most violent passions. They resembled fire devouring the cedars of Lebanon, or the axe by which the oaks of Bashan are felled. They slew the flock for the fleece, and the people became a prey to their rapacious appetite for self-aggrandisement. "They that sell them say, Blessed be the Lord, for I am rich, and their own shepherds pity them not." Hand was raised against hand, the rich plundered the poor, the rulers (his king, verse 6) smote the land with their violence and injustice, and every weaker one was delivered over to the OPPRESSION OF HIGH-HANDED WRONG.

It was under such circumstances that Zechariah felt called upon to become the shepherd of Jehovah's harried flock, and to stand in the breach which should have been filled by faithful and righteous men. Whether Israel generally recognised his pastoral authority does not appear, but he realized strongly the call of God, and fed the flock of slaughter, verily the most miserable of sheep. (Verse 7, R.V. marg.)

Two staves were in his hand: the one a club to beat back the beasts of prey, the other the crook, with which to extricate any of his charge that might be entangled in pit or thicket. The one was called Beauty or Grace, the other Bands or Union. These were the rod and staff of which David had sung in earlier days, and they represent God's perpetual attitude towards his sheep. He ever deals with them in abundant grace; He is united to them, as they should be united to each other, by the bonds of everlasting Love.

Three shepherds, which probably stand for the threefold office of Priest, Prophet, and King, had already failed in the difficult work of restoring order to the disturbed and distressed land. There had been between the Divine Spirit and them. "My soul was weary of them, and their soul also loathed me."

After a brief effort to reclaim Israel for its true Shepherd, Zechariah renounced the attempt, saying, "I will not feed you; that that dieth, let it die; and that that is to be cut off, let it be cut off; and let them which are left, eat every one the flesh of another." He broke his staff of beauteous grace, and cut it asunder, as though the tender love of God had withdrawn from its long wrestle with indomitable pride and self-will. As he did so, the poor of the flock that gave heed unto him, knew that he was acting in accord with the word of the Lord (verse 11).

Then came the crucial test. The prophet challenged the people to appraise his services, to give him their estimate in money value. "I said unto them, If ye think good, give me my hire; and if not, forbear." This incident may have taken place in the Temple, as he stood with his remaining staff in hand, face to face with those that held priestly office, though they lacked the priestly heart. In contempt and scorn, they weighed out to him thirty pieces of silver, the price of a slave. "There, prophet of God," they seemed to say, "take that! Thy services are as as those of some obscure menial employed in the lowest service!" A goodly price indeed for a man's prayers and tears, for a heart of compassion, and a life of absolute self-surrender! Cast it unto the potter, said the inner voice; and, as for this people, they shall pass into the hand of rulers, who shall eat the flesh of the fat, and drive them along paths so rough and flinty that their hoofs will be torn in pieces; a prediction which had a terrible fulfilment in the days of Antiochus and of Herod the Great.

Thereupon the prophet also broke in pieces the other staff, Bands, that the brotherhood between Judah and Israel might be broken in symbol, as afterwards in reality. How evidently that brotherhood is broken to-day! The Jews among us are the descendants of Judah and Benjamin, but where are the ten tribes?

In the following paragraph (vv. 15-17) there is a further evident reference to the terrible reign of Antiochus, whose cruelties towards the Jews instigated the heroic uprising of the Maccabees and their adherents, and led to deeds of faith and prowess, which will be for ever

FAMOUS IN THE ANNALS OF THE WORLD.

Five centuries passed, and Jehovah made one last effort to reclaim his wandering sheep, who were "distressed and scattered, as sheep not having shepherd" (Matt. ix. 36). Full of grace and truth, fresh from the bosom of the Father, Jesus was sent to gather the flock, which had been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. It was already a flock of slaughter when He began his ministry. The dark shadows of that awful storm of disaster and destruction, which was, within a period of forty years, to sweep Mount Zion bare, had already commenced to brood ominously over the devoted race. If his gracious offices had been recognized and accepted, that slaughter might have been averted. With his staff of grace and his crook of love, the Good Shepherd might have brought his flock from out the dangers that threatened it, and realized the ancient prediction of Ezekiel: "I will feed them with good pastures, and upon the mountains of the height of Israel shall their fold be; there shall they lay down in a good fold, and on fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel." But

THEY WOULD HAVE NONE OF HIM.

He would have gathered them as the hen her brood, yet they would not. Therefore He was compelled to break his rod and staff, and abandon them to the results of their sin. He was compelled to abandon his earnest endeavours, and, quitting the Temple, uttered the ominous words, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord"—a prediction which probably refers to the period described in the last chapter of this book. As Jesus withdrew from the Temple, the last effort of Jehovah to save Israel as a nation was frustrated; the greatest of her prophets had failed, and the last barrier to the catastrophe of descending judgment was removed.

It was at this juncture that the nation was challenged to appraise the worth of the Saviour's ministry. Between Judas and the priests a monstrous bargain was struck. "They weighed unto him thirty pieces of silver." This meagre dole of the priests stands in grim contrast to the priceless gift of Mary's ointment, at which Judas cavilled; but for this, and so little as this, the Messiah was sold, betrayed, and done to death.

Rejected by his own, the people whom He ardently longed to save; forsaken by his chosen followers, the Good Shepherd went forth alone to meet the sword. Not the sword of Caiaphas, or the priests; not the sword of Pilate, or the Romans; not the sword of impending justice—but the sword of righteous retribution for the sins of Israel, and the sins of the world. Jew though He were by birth, He was more. The Son of Man, the last Adam, the Lord from Heaven—such are the designations placed on his head, like many crowns. It was as the representative of the race that He went to receive into his own heart the penalty which, like the sword of Damocles, hanging by a hair, impended not over Jerusalem alone, but over the world. He had heard the mysterious summons sounding through the courts of the Temple, and along the corridors of time, "Awake, O sword, against my Shepherd, and against the Man that is my Fellow, saith the Lord of Hosts. Smite the Shepherd."

Great Missionary Conference.

THE year 1900 is to be marked in Christian annals by a notable gathering of missionaries—one of the most notable gatherings the world has ever seen. In April, next year, an Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions will convene in New York City.

It is hardly necessary to mention that the Conference represents no single denomination, no one country, no one continent, but the whole world of Protestant Christendom; and so the name given to the great general councils of the ancient Christian Church is fitly used to describe it. In a larger sense than was true of the famous councils at Nicæa and Constantinople, at Ephesus and Chalcedon, this assembly will be ecumenical.

Every foreign missionary society connected with the various divisions of Protestant Christendom the wide world over, has been invited to send delegates to New York, and the invitation has been accepted with rare unanimity. One day's discussion will be devoted to the full consideration of woman's work in foreign missions, one to the discussion of the relations of students and other young people to this great enterprise, and six to a survey of the present state of mission fields and statement of results, a discussion of principles and methods, a consideration of new problems, and the broader relations of this great enterprise.

An average of six different meetings daily, each two hours or more in length, will barely suffice to give to the more essential topics a place in the programme and discussions. Men of great ability, and of wide repute in both hemispheres, specialists of note in missionary authorship and administration, missionaries of wide experience from many lands, will be present and participate in these sessions, and will give to the discussion a unique and unrivalled interest.

An announcement of the Conference, intended to call public attention to its character, significance, and promise, and to awaken general interest in its proceedings, has been prepared for general publication, and is now in the hands of the Press. Every church and pastor of every name, the whole world through, should awake to the fact that this Conference is coming, take note of the time and place of the sessions, prepare for it, enter into it as far as may be, and gather from it impulse, and knowledge, and faith, and prayer. This brief outline is gathered from a Report of the General Committee by Rev. Judson Smith, D.D.

Cape Town Y.M.C.A.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

With reference to our article in last week's issue on the work and needs of the Cape Town Young Men's Christian Association, the following testimony to the value of the institution has been received by Mr. Sprigg, the general secretary, from a mother whose son is in South Africa; and we have pleasure in publishing so encouraging a letter.

"WHEN I saw your address in The Christian to-day, I felt I must send you my 'mite' towards your Extension Fund as a thank-offering for what the Association has been to my boy. If I were only a South African millionaire you would at once have the money you are requiring, and I earnestly hope that others may be honoured to do what I am unable. If people in England knew the inexpressible boon the Y.M.C.A. at Cape Town is, they would be pleased to help it.

"Far away from home, home ties, and love, my son has found help and kindly friendship at 'The Gateway of the Dark Continent,' from you and your helpers, and how he would have done without it I do not know.

"Christian parents in the homeland do not realize what the Y.M.C.A. is to England's sons who are away from home, and its love, and wise restraints from evil; or at what a loss they would be without the Y.M.C.A.

"Having lived in South Africa, I know something of its temptations for young people, and I am thankful to God for such a truly working branch of the Y.M.C.A. as that at Cape Town.

"With all my heart, as the mother of one who has benefited from the Y.M.C.A. at Cape Town, I desire for you a brilliant success in obtaining money, and you will have it if Christian people only understand the absolute need there is for such an institution as the Y.M.C.A., and the incalculable benefits it offers those who arrive strangers in a strange land, and what a home it makes for them when there.

"I pray the Lord to bless and prosper you most abundantly."

The Y.W.C.A. in India.

"WE have proved God answers prayer." Such is the message that comes from some of God's servants in the distant land of India. Miss Agnes Hill, the travelling secretary of the Indian Y.W.C.A., has recently been holding a week's mission in Madras, and has been greatly used and blessed by God in the conversion of many souls. Prayer is asked that those who have given themselves to Christ, may be strengthened to stand and to withstand amid all the temptations that surround them, and shall we not also praise too for all that God hath wrought?

With reference to the work in Madras, Miss Hill writes:—"I do wish we had a larger Home here in Madras, as fourteen is the limit of our capacity, and two of them must be workers. We are expecting God, who doeth such wonders, to bless our Rs. 2,500, and make it Rs. 25,000; then we can expect to have a suitable home! Multiplying by ten is not so great a miracle as feeding 5,000 on a few loaves and fishes. Our Lord did the greater. Can He not also do the less?

"In my recent tour along the east coast, I found great need for two workers — young women wholly given up to the Master, and skilled in his Word and sealed by his Spirit, to come out to work among the English-speaking women at Cuttack and Vizagapatam—those who are willing to be spent that others may be saved. It will not be easy work, but we are not looking for easy places. Some young woman who is willing to live simply and just as a friend of the people, will find her reward. Who will come for these places? And who will provide for them?" Towards the support of one we have a promise of £50.

From Bombay the news reaches us this mail that the plans for the new building, funds for which were secured in Great Britain last year, will soon be in the hands of the committee. The temporary premises of the Home are full, and a room has been secured for the winter's work. It is hoped that the foundation-stone will be laid on November 30, and Miss Reynolds, general secretary of the World's Y.W.C.A., is to be asked to perform the ceremony.

Jhansi still calls for our help, and we desire to thank one reader of the letter about the work there, which appeared recently, for a gift of £5 towards the £75. They have asked us to send this month. Friends are invited to the farewell meeting of two workers on Thursday, November 3, at 26, George Street, at 3.30.

Offers of service will be received by Mrs. Hatt Noble, and contributions by the treasurer, Miss Morley, at the offices of the World's Y.W.C.A., 26, George Street, Hanover Sq., W.

Notes on Korea.

THE little peninsula of Korea lies almost a bridge across to Japan. Korea follows the constitution of England in the new formation of her laws and customs.

A treaty was made between Korea and England in December, 1897. A British man-of-war is stationed in the harbour at Chemulpo.

A railway has been made from the Port of Chemulpo to the capital city of Seoul. Telegraphs are being laid, and good, wide roads are being constructed in Seoul.

The ladies of nobility in Korea weave at home the finest quality of silk, and it is dyed in the most exquisite shades of light pink, light green, and other colours.

The Progressive Ministry is gaining the day in Korea. There is now a new system of education, and English is taught in the high schools. His Excellency Prince Min speaks English well, and visited England at the time of the Jubilee. His heart is open to receive the Gospel. He is the new Minister of Korea in Washington, D.C., America.

There are thirty young men of the nationality of Korea at present in America. These seek education of all kinds, and there is a very general desire among them to learn Christianity. Six of these Korean lads are in the Howard University, Washington, D.C., and are receiving free education by the kindness of the president, Dr. J. E. Rankin. Daily these lads read the Bible with Mrs. Rankin.

One Korean, M. T. Kang, of noble birth, is studying at the Christian Alliance College, Nyack, New York, until he returns to his country. Friends support him, and help him on his way. He will be a valuable Christian worker in Korea. Mr. Kang's good influence has been felt among the other Koreans in Washington, and several have been led by him to give themselves to God. His great friend, Mr. Tom Ze, is the secretary to the Korean Legation at Washington.

The Korean race have most tractable qualities. They are gentle, teachable, and refined, showing gratitude for all that is done for them. They are most diligent in the hard task of acquiring the English language. The "Korean Evangelists' Fund" was originated in Korea by Rev. S. A. Moffett, to enable any native person who is qualified to help him in his blessed and active evangelistic work in North Korea.

Glorious opportunities have arisen in Korea for true missionary work, and a native church is forming in that land.

"Stores" Prayer Union.—The seventh annual meeting was held on Tuesday, October 17, in the Lecture Hall of the Sunday School Union, Mr. J. E. Bignall presiding. The report gave expression to thankfulness for spiritual blessing amongst the members of the Union, and consequent witnessing for God in the midst of fellow employés. Gospel addresses were given by the chairman, Mr. R. Bannister, and Mr. Tom Elliott, the "Happy Shoemaker." Communications respecting the Union should be addressed Mr. W. G. Green, C.S.S.A. Ld., 1, Hatfield Street, S.E.

Among Zulu Kaffirs.

IN the report of the twentieth year of his unsectarian mission among the Zulu Kaffirs of the Ixopo and Ipolela divisions of Natal, Rev. E. S. Clarke tells us some interesting things. After working with Major Malan at Elusolo, and also among the Amice tribe, where the name of Jesus was not known, he and Mrs. Clarke commenced work for God among the Umkolisa people, and there for more than twenty years they have witnessed for Jesus.

Writing of this station during the past year, Mr. Clarke shows the great need there is for the spread of God's Word among the poor people. "We have had a trial of faith, owing to the persecution of the native converts. One dear woman, converted in 1895, brought to the mission one of the younger women from the kraal. She became a Christian, and her husband threatened to kill her. He and his father made a savage attack upon her life. After suffering great ill-treatment, she escaped and sought protection at the mission. The two men were punished, and, strange to say, afterwards, the husband attended the mission meetings, and now allows services to be held in his kraal. Thus, out of darkness comes light.

The unconverted African has a great objection to his wife wearing European clothes, and this is never insisted upon by the missionaries, as it is a cause of contention; but when God changes the heart the women long for a change for the better in their personal surroundings, and gladly throw off their dress of skins and clay for the cleaner apparel of the Christians. It is sad to read that Mr. Clarke has had to make a complaint to the magistrate during the year, with regard to white people selling intoxicating drink to Kaffirs, and encouraging them to bring their horses together for racing purposes on the Sunday, at which times they learn to gamble, &c. Thus, stones of stumbling are put in the way of the weaker brethren.

The Jesuits in Spain.

THE following is taken from some notes on Seville by Rev. Don Emilio Carreno, in a recent circular of the Spanish Evangelization Society:—

"The multitude of friars and priests who have returned from our lost colonies of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines has awakened the slumbering popular feeling. The religious question, therefore, has once more come to the front. The chief cause of all our misfortunes is now seen to lie in the excessive power and influence that, under the protection of our rulers, religious communities have acquired. Everything that brings liberty or progress is kept back, owing to the irritating privileges which they enjoy. Thus, in many towns where serious riots have taken place, the crowds aimed their fury at the Jesuits, who are the life and soul of the system that governs Spain.

"Let me give an instance. At the façades of their private houses many Jesuits have placed a small plate bearing an image of the heart of Jesus, with the inscription, 'I shall reign.' This is done to provoke the people. The latter, in retaliation, pull down the plates, and threaten to put in their stead others with an image of the Republic, bearing the ominous words, 'I shall return.' Although, in Seville, this means of inciting the people to rebellion has not yet been tried, other means just as unscrupulous are employed by the Jesuits."

The secretary of the Spanish Evangelization Society is Mr. A. C. Dawson, M.A., 5, Morningside Gardens, Edinburgh.

Ecuador.—Mr. J. A. Strain, American Missionary in Guayaquil, Ecuador, in connection with the Gospel Union, Kansas City, U.S., writes the following:—A law, called that of the "Patronato," has just been passed by the Ecuadorian Congress, taking from the priests all burial fees, all marriage fees, in fact everything but certain fixed mass fees, and putting them on a salary. It is regarded as a great triumph for the party of Reform.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 5. 2 Chron. xi.

WHAT a strange mixture of character in this Rehoboam! There was much in him which attracted godly people around him. The priests and Levites resorted to him from all Israel, and those who set their hearts to seek the Lord came thither also. For a glad three years of consistent piety there was unbroken prosperity. Then a blight came over the promise of his reign, like the overcasting of a summer sky, which can only be accounted for by the self-indulgence that enervated and sensualised the king. "He sought many wives."

How clearly history and experience warn us against self-indulgence, against making provision for the flesh to fulfil its lusts, against relaxing the girdle of self-restraint from about our loins. No man or woman can afford to do this, even though there may be an outward semblance of rightness and custom. What may be right for neighbouring kings and princes may be reprehensible in Rehoboam—and in you.

I heard the other day of a ship which on two nights was nearly wrecked because of the aberration of the compass. The captain could not understand how it had become so perverted, until he saw one of the sailors putting an apparently copper light in the binnacle, near the compass. He knew that this was really made of iron, though coated with copper. And it was this iron which had affected the needle. So under what seems harmless and legitimate, there may be some terribly hurtful agency, which will ruin your moral life, and injure the peace and power of your reign.

MONDAY, November 6. 2 Chron. xii.

God will sometimes use political combinations and war to chastise a nation which has forsaken and trespassed against Him. Whatever may await our world in the future, there is no doubt that the judgment of nations is already on foot, and that the awards of the Son of Man are being executed. It has seemed to some of us as though God must have a controversy with our own country of Great Britain, for the many wrongs inflicted by her on the native races, for her arrogance and pride, her impurity and drunkenness. And probably it would have gone much harder with her had it not been for God's own people, who are as salt in the midst of her corruption, and whose prayers are constantly ascending on her behalf.

Shishak's invasion was due to God's judgment on Rehoboam and his people. And at the risk of being accounted an enemy of his country. Shemaiah did not hesitate to lay stress upon this fact. "Thus saith the Lord, ye have forsaken me, therefore have I also left you in the hands of Shishak." Whatever be the obloquy that such a course may involve, it will be absolutely necessary that God's servants utter, in the present crisis, no uncertain note about the iniquities which have soiled, and are soiling, the fair honour of our country, and bringing down on us the judgments of God.

Yet if we humble ourselves, and if some good things are found in us, if the people of God do not cease to sigh and cry for the abominations which are being wrought in our midst, there will yet be a respite, some deliverance will be granted, and God's wrath will not be poured out upon London by the hand of the invader. It may be that we shall have to recur to the teaching of this chapter in coming days; so let us mark it, and carry its lessons in our heart.

TUESDAY, November 7. 2 Chron. xiii.

A very notable incident is recorded in this chapter. Apparently Jeroboam was the aggressor, and Abijah remonstrated with him and his hosts in an address, which is preserved here for us, and which, probably, in the still atmosphere, and with the sounding-board of the mountains of Ephraim, must have been heard by listening thousands. He alluded to Judah as being permanently the kingdom of the Lord, the shelter of his priests, the centre of his worship. He insisted that his people and he kept God's charge, whilst Jeroboam and Israel had repudiated it. He insisted that God was with them at their head, and warned Jeroboam that they could not prosper in such a conflict.

In the meanwhile, the ambush was creeping up from behind, and when the king had finished his harangue, Judah found themselves on an islet amid waves of wrathful foam. Then they cried unto Jehovah, and "they prevailed, because they relied upon the Lord, the God of their fathers."

It would be impossible to set forth the moral more obviously or impressively. When the war of spite or hate of human and Satanic opposition breaks out against you, when you are beset behind and before by your difficulties, be sure that you are right with God, and that your conscience is void of offence; then enter the battle with calm and unruffled composure. Rely not on human aid, but lift up your heart to the Most High. Fight by crying directly to Him. Look not north or south, east or west, but heavenward. Shall I lift up mine eyes to the mountains, whence help may come? No; I must look beyond them, to the God which made heaven and earth.

WEDNESDAY, November 8. 2 Chron. xiv.

Be sure to take away the strange altars, and high places, and all else which is grievous to God, in thine heart, thy home, and, so far as in thee lies, in thy church. So only canst thou have rest. Oh, if people only realised that the true secret of security and rest lies, not in outward circumstances, but in the inner condition of heart and life! When a man is right with God, He gives him rest; and when God gives rest, who can make trouble? Rest in the Lord, and fret not thyself.

It is good for a man when, like Asa, according to the R.V., he cries, "Lord, there is none beside Thee to help; between the mighty and him that hath no strength." There are times when there is no visible defence between us and the foe. So far as human vision can detect, there is just a clear piece of open ground between the lion and the lamb, with nothing to prevent the immediate attack and destruction. And yet, somehow, the long-expected attack is postponed. Day after day passes and the besieger does not take the unwalled villages. Sennacherib's forces are baffled as though a river were engirdling the city walls; when in point of fact Jerusalem alone, of all great cities, has no river at all. Why is this? Ah, God Himself goes forth at the head of his hosts. Our foes fall on the bosses of angel shields, and are broken before their arrest.

It is quite impossible to read these sacred stories without believing that God's angels, in mighty squadrons, are allied with his believing people. There were other combatants on the battlefield than were patent to the eye. To these the victory was attributable. And there is no doubt that we might have the aid of the same celestial allies, if we would fight by faith, and cry unto the Lord our God.

THURSDAY, November 9. 2 Chron. xv.

God's great deliverance of Judah from the Ethiopians stimulated Asa and his people to further devotion and consecration. He deposed his mother from the throne, cut down the obscene image that she had made, put away the abominations out of the land, and gathered the people to a solemn covenant and compact. The breath of revival was felt throughout the land, and the result was a serene tranquillity and repose. Repeatedly, through these chapters, we are assured that God gave his people rest.

We are told that at this time Asa's heart was perfect with the Lord his God, as the result of the solemn covenant into which he had entered. Have you ever entered into such a covenant, which has left God and his service the supreme object of your existence? For that is the meaning of the perfect heart. I quote from a letter I have received recently: "It came to me so strongly that I had to go out in the woods and have it out with the Lord. The point was, Could I trust Him for always? Would I not again hunger and thirst? Would I not again wake with that sense of God being far off? Would I not again be my old self? But was not Christ able to keep me? I couldn't feel anything, but I could believe in Omnipotent Power, I could believe that He would be evermore in me the Power of a holy life, I was to be alive unto God. So there, among the pine trees, I took the step once and for ever, and for ever He has saved me. Do I dare write it? Yes, for it is all of Him. Have I really laid hold of anything tangible? Yes, I have. The emotion has passed away, but the consciousness of having found a new secret remains. I have definitely died with Christ, and henceforth nothing shall divide my heart with Him."

FRIDAY, November 10. 2 Chron. xvi.

A chapter of surpassing interest! It would have seemed impossible for Asa to go back on the record of the previous chapter; but he did, and we may learn the instability of all human goodness, apart from abiding fellowship with Jesus Christ. You may set your watch by the town clock, but you must wind it up every evening also. The one holy covenant into which a man enters with God will not be enough to keep him, apart from his daily abiding in the True Vine.

At the beginning of his reign, Asa stood alone against a mighty host, and was more than a conqueror; at the close, he called in the aid of Benhadad against an enemy of inferior calibre; and, though he scored a victory, it was accompanied by the grave expostulations and gloomy prognostications of the prophet. Why this contrast? It is evident that there had been some serious declension, due perhaps to the insidious corroding effect of his prosperity and success.

Oh that God would keep our hearts perfect towards Himself from youth to age, never turning right or left, nor seeking from creature aid that help which He waits to give! "His eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth to show Himself strong on the behalf of those whose hearts are perfect toward Him." It is as though we must learn that it is not so needful to cry to Him for help as to be absolutely simple and true in our obedience and faith. God is always on the outlook to succour those He can, as the air is always waiting to rush in to fill any vacuum. Only be single-hearted towards Him, and God will haste to show Himself strong in thee and for thee.

SATURDAY, November 11. 2 Chron. xvii.

The first ways of David. Then, presumably, the last were not equal to the first. See to it that your life is not a search for a lost chord, and that its early promise is not over-cast by the darkening clouds. To walk in God's ways secures God's companionship, and the establishment of your kingdom, i.e., of your influence for good in the world. To such, also, God is able to entrust riches and honour in abundance.

Some shrink from public positions, with the wealth of different kinds which they bring, as though there were something in them hostile to the Divine life in the soul. This is a great mistake. Public position hurts when it is sought and used for your own profit and emolument; it is harmless enough when accepted as the gift of God, and used for the service of men. How great a blessing would accrue to men if the servants of God would stand for public office, and use each throne of power, to which his Providence lifts them, as affording them a better chance of reaching out strong and efficient assistance to those who are battling in the stormy waves! See how much good Jehoshaphat did by these itinerating teachers, who made the people know the law of God.

When we are engaged on God's service, He makes Himself responsible for us. His fear falls on the people, and they make no war on us, but bring us presents (vv. 10, 11). The waves will not respect the mandate of an earthly sovereign, though he bid them retreat never so loudly; but when a man's ways please the Lord, He makes his enemies be at peace with Him, and the proud breakers die away at his feet in the sand. Happy is the man whose God is the Lord.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

SECOND WEEK.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

LAST week opened with a busy and much blessed Sabbath for many of the evangelists who are at present in the city. After preaching to a great congregation in Gorbals Free Church in the morning, Mr. HENRY VARLEY—at the request of two thousand men—gave a second of his lectures to men only, at four o'clock, in St. Andrew's Hall; and, in the evening the church was densely crowded, platform, steps, aisles, and galleries being all utilized, as he discoursed on "The Leprous King and the Cleansed Prophet" (Uzziah and Isaiah). Rev. JOHN MCNEILL preached to three congregations, drawn from all parts of the city, and Rev. ROBERT HOWIE (Govan) gave an address, in Trinity Free Church, on "Reminiscences of 1859"—reviving the story of that remarkable movement, about which he is well qualified to speak.

The Tent Hall—itself a memorial of 1874, with gracious memories of 1885, and many another time of outpouring of the Spirit—was filled morning, afternoon, and night. Mr. WILLIAM THOMSON, jun., spoke to the recipients of the free breakfast, and Mr. J. W. VAN DE VENTER gave a "Chalk Talk" to the children at the free dinner. In the evening a fitting crown was put to a week of hard and successful work by Mr. Charles Inglis' meeting. Day by day there had been abundant signs of the working of the Holy Spirit, with a breaking away from much of the usual reserve, marked by open seeking of the inquiry-room before the crowd of onlookers.

Public attention has been drawn to a very gratifying feature of the work which manifested itself on Sabbath, and proved that at least certain sections of the city are being deeply moved. It was found that churches, in the neighbourhood of the centres where the work is being carried on, experienced deeper interest and had more professed decisions for Christ than they have known for months past. In all directions, too, open-air gatherings are unusually well attended, and, from the most out-of-the-way places, come grateful testimony that "the Lord is working among us."

In the City.

A fresh start was made on Monday evening, by Mr. CHARLES INGLIS, in the Tent Hall, a new and attractive feature being introduced into the meetings of the second week through the arrival of Mr. J. R. D. MCAUSLAND, the well-known song-preacher. Mr. Inglis regarded the prospect of this help with deep satisfaction, testifying that, while mere voice exercises are but a waste of time, in his experience "singing in the Holy Ghost" has opened up many hearts which seemed to be utterly impervious to other influences.

Monday is what Mr. McNeill calls the "off-night" at most of our evangelistic centres, and so there was a smaller attendance after the Sabbath; but an excellent spirit pervaded the meeting. Immediately surrounding the hall is a slum district, and a large quota of the audience is provided by it, though Mr. Inglis makes no secret of his opinion that more might be done in that direction, if the Christians set about it as they would do in America. The other considerable element of the audience was composed of the respectable artizan class from some distance.

The Scripture reading was the Story of the Syro-Phenician Woman (Matthew xv.); and the subject of address, "The Interview between Felix and Paul" (Acts xxiv.). A wealth of illustration helped to rivet the attention of the most frivolous and casual lookers-in. At the close, a number remained to be spoken to, with the most satisfactory results. One woman, who was seated near the writer, told the common tale of being under the influence of drink. "You will never be able to keep off the drink unless you take Christ with you," was Mr. Inglis's reply to a proposal that she would try abstinence till the end of the year, before becoming a Christian. After the interview, however, she saw things in a new light.

Following a remarkably successful mission conducted during the previous week in Dennistoun United Presbyterian Church, by Mr. George Clarke, Rev. D. M. CAMERON (London) preached on Sabbath evening. Rev. Dr. GEORGE HANSON (Marylebone Presbyterian Church, London) began work in the city by preaching in St. Andrew's Hall on Sabbath evening. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, he spoke in the Dennistoun meeting.

On Tuesday evening, after a fine open-air gathering led by Mr. WALTER BUCHANAN, we found a large and deeply interested congregation in the church. Several neighbouring ministers took part in the devotional service. Dr. Hanson remarked, in opening, that on two points the Apostle Paul was inexorably firm. I. In regard to the superhuman origin of his Apostleship. It was no vision of the night, but the veritable Lord Jesus Himself who appeared to me in the way, and who then and there gave me my title to rulership in the Church, which I dare not allow any one to impugn. II. In regard to the superhuman origin of his Message. That Gospel which he preached was not something excoriated out of his own inner consciousness. It came in its integrity and fulness from God. The theme was illustrated (1) by the doctrine of the Atonement. "The idea of atonement by blood is quite familiar in the history and practice of religion. But observe the difference from the Gospel idea. The human, or heathen, idea may be expressed in these words: 'Man so feared God that he offered up all his best, if thereby he might turn away his wrath.' The Gospel idea may be summed up thus: 'For God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him may not perish, but have everlasting life.'"

"According to the human conception, man is the victim; according to the Christian, God is the victim. According to the human, man seeks by pain, and agony, and blood, to reconcile God to him; according to the Christian, God seeks by pain, and agony, and blood to reconcile man to Him."

Continuing, Dr. Hanson dealt with "(2) the conditions of salvation—'by grace, through faith;' and (3) the measure of grace, the exceeding riches of God's grace in his kindness to his children. Men talk of a narrow evangelical creed. Is that narrow? It is not merely kindness, it is grace in his kindness; not merely grace, but riches of grace in his kindness; not merely riches, but exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness, through Christ Jesus."

REV. R. J. CAMPBELL (OF BRIGHTON).

Beginning work in the city on Wednesday, Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL conducted the noon prayer meeting, giving an address on the subject of "Prayer," which deeply stirred the audience. The centre of the meetings in the North-Western Division was moved from Hillhead, westward to Belhaven United Presbyterian Church, Kelvinside. On Wednesday evening, Mr. Campbell took up the services for the remainder of the week. After reading Luke xv., he gave a most impressive and helpful address on "Prodigalism." In opening, he called attention to the fact that here, more even than in the Sermon on the Mount, we have something which, more nearly than anything else in our Lord's utterances, approaches to our conception of a sermon—even though it be set forth in the form of parables.

"We sometimes misunderstand the Master's meaning in the use of the word 'prodigal.' We think of a person who has forfeited his opportunities in this life; one who is living far from God, and, so far from gaining the esteem of the world, has lost it. We think of the drunkard, of the man who has forfeited social position by his conduct, of the man who has lived for this world, and then riches have taken to themselves wings, of the man who has gained neither God nor this world. We are in 'the far country' when we are out of touch with God, however we get there. The prodigal was well acquainted with the father's home. There was not a man in our Lord's audience who was not saturated with the knowledge of the worship of the synagogue: just as we—the children of the Covenanters and the Puritans—cannot, if we would, get rid of the knowledge of God. How near were eternal things, before we had learned to question! How intimate we were with Jesus Christ! Then came the day when we felt we had lost something. The sweet touch with God, learned through the medium of holy lives, did not develop into

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE OF GOD.

"Prodigals are hunting for power, for reputation, for outward success. Men have no time for God, and must crowd Him out of their lives; and yet they would be surprised to be told they were prodigals. There is no peace to be had thus. Is it worth while to let the world govern so much even in our relations with men? Is it not folly to let the world govern so much in our relations with God? No man is living a true life, or knows what peace means, who is in 'the far country,' when he ought to be in the Father's house, sharing the love of the Father's heart. Be done with the world, and come home to God.

"Who are the greatest miracles of God's grace? Not those who have sinned and come back again, but those who have never wanted to go to 'the far country'—those who have never sinned against offered grace. Thank God for the things you have never seen or known. Thank God, and believe that you are at one with the prodigal in your indebtedness to the great keeping power of God. We all need to come to the cross of Christ."

A change in the weather had brought heavy rain, but the audience was large and deeply interested. Leading professional men, merchants, and shipowners are finding their way to Campaign meetings, as well as the poor and the outcast. Inquiry meetings are held in the West End, as well as in the East End; and in tenderness and affection the simple Gospel is pressed home on all alike, with frank invitations to remain for private conversation.

WILLINGNESS, THE GREAT REQUIREMENT.

As Mr. MCNEILL'S fortnight in Free St. Matthew's Church (Dr. James Stalker) drew to a close, his preaching became more and more clear on two points: namely, the fulness of the time in view of the return of the Lord, and the simplicity of the gracious message committed to him as an ambassador for Jesus Christ. The audience grew in size as the days passed, and the changing character of them was evident from the continuous leading of large numbers to decision for Christ.

On Thursday evening he was specially impressive on the "ringing of the changes," in a blessed sense, on the words "Come . . . Take" in Revelation xxii. 16, 17. This "last clear, ringing, urgent Gospel call in the Bible" he described as surrounded by an atmosphere full of thoughts of the open grave and the returning Lord—"and no man can tell for sure which of these will come to him first." He showed most simply how the work of the human preacher is acknowledged in "the Bride;" but the solemnity of speaking and hearing alike lies in the fact that the Holy Spirit is the Great Evangelist.

In response to his pleadings for a willing consent—even without anxiety or excitement—one after another gave token of assent, till the hearts of all God's people were much strengthened and encouraged by the manifest working of the Spirit.

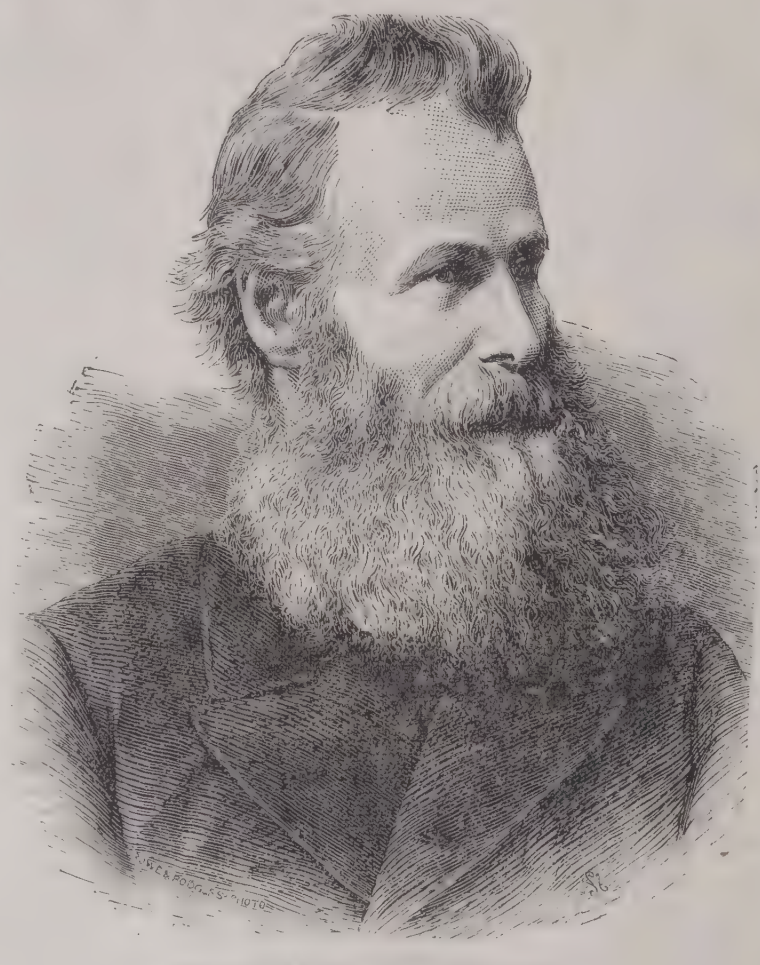
MR. HENRY VARLEY.

The mission in Gorbals Free Church was brought to a close on Friday evening, amid abundant signs of the working of the Holy Spirit. It was Mr. VARLEY'S expressed desire that the meeting should be as quiet as possible; but the feeliegs of many were too deep to be suppressed altogether, and low responses were to be heard all round. On Thursday evening alone, no fewer than 300 people had risen to tell of blessing sought or found during the fortnight.

Mr. Varley had a deep feeling that, even in this Evangelistic Campaign, the great need was to deal with God's own people, believing it necessary to get them right before men could be saved. He deprecated the omission of judgment and the wrath of God in the preaching of the truth; but the dominant note of his own discourses was "The Great Question of the Love of God." His closing words were based on 1 John iv., and he compared the message to a great orange tree near his Australian home. At one time, and on the same tree, may be seen the blossom (verse 10, the revelation of the only perfect Love), the green fruit (verse 9, the provision of a life, as well as the dealing with sin), and the ripe fruit (verse 17—"the most wonderful Scripture that I know"—the perfection of the Love, "that as his Son is in his presence, so are we in this city of Glasgow").

In saying good-bye to the city for the present, Mr. Varley's parting word to young converts was to lose no time in placing themselves under some faithful pastorate. Then he spoke of his plans, and expressed a desire, should he find himself in a position to return in the spring, to have a mission in some great central hall, where large numbers of working men might be induced to attend. A large number present pledged themselves to support him if this plan can be carried out.

Among the Children.



The workers belonging to the Sabbath School Union changed their East Campbell Street junior meeting to the United Presbyterian Church, with Mr. A. Adam as speaker. The large audiences were maintained, and an intelligent interest aroused in the subjects of the addresses. The subject on Monday was the story of "The Great Syrian General, Naaman," and as the text, "But he was a leper" (2 Kings v. i.) came out in white letters on the dark ground, the children settled down to a stirring address, admirably adapted to the requirements of the child mind.

The Children's Mission in the East End had its place of meeting changed to Wellpark Free Church, and the lantern was brought into use. On Tuesday, we saw a fine gathering of boys and girls. Beginning with a picture of "The Good Shepherd," they were led on to the story of "The Lost Sheep," and its lessons for them. Several other speakers were also engaged in work among the young.

Death of Dr. Culross.

MANY will hear with sorrow of the death of Rev. James Culross, D.D., for many years Principal of the Baptist College, Bristol. He has, for some time, been in a very feeble state, and the end was not unexpected. He passed away on Sunday last, at his residence, Hartington Park, Bristol, in his seventy-fifth year.

Dr. CULROSS was born in the parish of Bendochy, Strathmore, on November 18, 1824. He began his education in the district school, passed to Blairgowrie, and then to the ancient University of St. Andrew's. He early confessed Christ, and decided to give himself to the ministry of the Gospel. Associating himself with the Baptist denomination, he finished his theological curriculum in connection with that body. After labouring for a time at Rothesay, he became pastor of the Baptist Church of Stirling, in 1851, and there he remained nearly twenty years. Sabbath evening lectures on Gospel themes were a special feature of his ministry during some years. One result of those lectures was found in his earlier books, "Lazarus Revived," "The Father Revealed in the Son," and "Jesus Showing Mercy." These volumes were so suggestive in matter, original in statement, and beautiful in literary finish, that the author's Alma Mater honoured him with the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

In 1870 Dr. Culross accepted a call from a newly-formed church at Highbury, London, where he laboured for nearly seven years. He afterwards returned to Scotland to take charge of Adelaide Place Church, Glasgow. The office of principal of the Baptist College, Bristol, becoming vacant, by the death of Dr. Gotch, he was asked to fill it. He acceded to the request, and discharged the duties to the delight and satisfaction of his students, and only retired when compelled by reason of ill-health. The old passion for preaching still burned in the professor's heart, and scarcely a Sabbath passed in which, while health permitted, he did not occupy some pulpit. In 1887, Dr. Culross was elected President of the Baptist Union.

During recent years Dr. Culross added considerably to the tale of books from his pen. Several are issued from the Stirling Tract Depôt, and three by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, namely: "Thy First Love," an exposition of the Letter to the Ephesians; "Behold, I stand at the Door and Knock," a study of Christ's message to Laodicea; and "John, whom Jesus Loved," an appreciation of the life and work of the beloved Apostle. Mrs. Macalpine's Homes.

THE Rescue and Maternity Homes, situate in Webster Street, Greenheys, Manchester ("Hope House"), were founded by the late Mrs. Macalpine. The importance of institutions for the rescue of young women is everywhere recognized, and the annual report of this home at Manchester is able to record a successful year's work.

Seventeen women were in the Home at the commencement of the year; for some of these situations were found, and all are showing signs of doing well. The report states: "Of course, there have been the usual difficulties arising from temper, the restlessness which springs from the craving for drink, and other things with which every worker among our poor fallen sisters is so familiar. But, by the Grace of God, these have, in many instances, been overcome, and we praise God that his power to break the fetters of sin has been manifestly at work with us."

Many who had become the victims of the drink curse are now leading pure and respectable lives. Friends of the Home will learn with pleasure of the many tokens of thankfulness on the part of those who have been rescued from the bondage of sin, and to whom it seems the greatest joy of their lives to pay a tribute to the effectual working of the Home, where they gathered strength for the future.

The maternity department, under the superintendence of Miss Burne, has also proved of valuable service, although the past year has been one of unusual anxiety. The outside operations have been continued with success. The report is not issued with a clear balance-sheet, and this embarrasses, although it does not discourage the workers. The superintendent and secretary is Mrs. Coller.

The late Miss Seymour.—The death of Miss Phillis Seymour removes a devoted Christian worker, who was well-known in various branches of religious effort. Miss Seaman, of Wandsworth Y.W.C.A., writes respecting the aid given by Miss Seymour in Bible Class work, and adds "she was well-known in St. Pancras, where for eight years she worked amongst the poor. Her whole life after her conversion, was a ministry of prayer, and many and constant were the wonderful answers she obtained through faith." Mrs. Baeyertz writes in similar terms.

Bridge of Hope.—The annual meeting in connection with Miss Steer's well-known work was held on Tuesday, October 30, at the institution, in Betts Street, E. Mr. Joseph Howard, M.P., who presided, touched upon the usefulness of the work done by the Mission, and its special claims upon society. The beneficial change in that particular East-End neighbourhood was largely owing to its presence. He warmly congratulated Miss Steer upon the success of her labours. Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P., in a thoughtful address, alluded to some of the great social problems with regard to rescue work and the care and protection of children. Mr. Walter Weeden, police-court missionary, gave personal experiences of help received, especially with regard to children.

Mr. William T. Talbot-Crosbie

TO some the "one clear call" comes without warning, and, out of the fulness of active life and service, they pass at once into the perfect and eternal rest.

To others the change comes gently, imperceptibly almost. The Lord allows his servant to feel the weight of his burden, the length of his journey. He begins to wish for rest, and little by little to withdraw from life's activities, to watch more earnestly for the Coming, to long more deeply to be with Christ. Then the truth is borne in upon his spirit that death is to be his lot. Unruffled by its approach, he calmly surveys the past of his pilgrimage, tracing the goodness and mercy that have followed him all the days of his life; he gathers his beloved round him, and gives them tender words of love and hope. Peacefully he arranges his affairs, retreating the while towards the golden gate; and his soul is filled with joy in prospect of his glorious homegoing, and of "visions and revelations" of his Lord in Paradise, his very features shining in the light that seems to break through the gates to which he draws nigh.

Such was the passing of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie, of Ardfert Abbey, who "fell asleep" on September 4, at the ripe age of eighty-two. With Mr. Mahony and Mr. Bland, he was the third of the Kerry landlords whom the Revival of 1861 brought out so boldly for the Lord, to serve Him in the Gospel to the end of their consecrated lives.

Mr. Crosbie was brought to Christ as a very young man; when, being called to pass through trial of heart, he turned to the Lord, and took refuge under the shadow of his wings. After a long minority, he entered upon the management of his large estate, at that time groaning under the evil results of the Penal Laws, and at once, aided by his young wife, a sister of the present Lord Gwydyr, set to work to rearrange the farms, plant the tenants from the crowded areas upon remoter outlying and uninhabited parts, and provide the agricultural instruction for them which they sorely needed.

Then, after a few years, came the famine, under stress of which many land-owners went down with their people, after noble efforts for their rescue and relief. But, thanks to the measures Mr. Crosbie had taken in good time, the Ardfert Estate was saved; and thereafter, for one large section of his lifetime, he applied himself, at great expense, to the equipment of the farms with substantial buildings, and to the improvement of the land.

In the midst of such labours as these, the mighty breath of the Holy Ghost, first felt in Ulster, began to be heard in the tops of the trees; and, at first, through unknown men and feeble instruments, the message of the Gospel came as glad tidings to many. Every part of Kerry was affected, though only as to the Protestant population.

The homes of the three we have named became centres of a Divine energy, which spread itself in all directions. The meetings, originated then in the granary at Ardfert, have continued without intermission to the present time. Many and wonderful were the scenes of awakening there and in Tralee, under the ministry of J. Denham Smith, T. Shuldham Henry, and many others, whom Mr. Crosbie brought to Kerry, and accompanied in the work.

The effects upon himself of this spiritual movement were very great. A Christian before, he now received his call to a new life of liberty, of joy, of devotion to his Master, of separation from the world, and of service in the Word of God and the Gospel, which constituted together a complete transformation of character and new departure in the activities of his energetic nature.

He had been prominent in county, political, and fiscal affairs, taking part with special interest in the movement for according to Roman Catholics all kinds of civil and religious liberty, and for the removal of the last of their disabilities. As a Grand Juror and Justice of the Peace he had laboured for the good of the county, with an energy and capacity that fitted him to be a leader of men.

But now, so powerfully was he possessed by the reality and blessedness of his place in Christ, his heavenly inheritance, and the hope, a present and real one to him, of Christ's early return to call his own to Himself, that after full consideration, and not without many a wrench and severance of old associations, he retired from it all, resigned his deputy-lieu-tenancy and magistracy, and ceased to take his place on the bench, the Grand Jury, and the platform, and gave himself to the service of the Gospel, and the gentle pursuits of his own home farm, and the hospitalities of his Christian home at Ardfert Abbey.

Mr. Crosbie, who subsequently reverted to his father's name of Talbot as a prefix, had founded, in 1846, a herd of short-horn cattle, which never ceased to be the principal interest in secular things of his after life. But it was Christian work and service that ever held the first place in his heart, and occupied the first hours of his day, and employed the best energies of his mind and body. With Mr. Mahony and Mr. Gordon Oswald, he preached in Naples and other parts of Italy. With many younger evangelists, he worked in and around Lurgan, and, for many years, bore the principal expense of the Gospel mission there. Everywhere he went he was ready to give his testimony for Christ, and had great power and tact in personal dealing with his friends, guests, and casual acquaintances. He had great delight in the Dublin Believers' Meetings, wherein, for some twenty-five years, he was a constant attendant and frequent speaker. Mr. Crosbie had been brought up in the evangelical branch of the Church of England, and had ever sought, conscientiously and as unto the Lord, to make his appointments of only truly Christian and evangelical men to the six livings to which he held the right of presentation. But with the deep spiritual movement of 1861 came also the spirit of inquiry as to the mind of God upon many doctrines hitherto unquestioningly accepted.

Among these were infant baptism, the claims to apostolical succession, priesthood and episcopal ordination. As the result, he and his family began to meet with other recent converts, under the name of Christian only, without connection with any existing sect or denomination, for fellowship, prayer, ministry of God's Word and the celebration of the Lord's Supper; and though, in later years, the Ardfert meetings were commonly identified by the outside public with those of the Brethren, never to the end would Mr. Crosbie permit his sympathies or fellowship to be so limited. Among his papers was found the following:

> If so be that, contrary to my hope in the Lord's coming, I should fall "asleep in Jesus," I desire that my funeral should be conducted in the simplest and most unsectarian manner possible, having for many years renounced all connection with any sect, believing as I do that Christianity is a higher thing than any combination based on human theology.

He also refers to himself as:—

> A sinner saved all of grace, having no claim whatever to any merit of my own, but resting solely on the all-sufficient merits of my adorable Saviour, in whom alone I have trusted since my conversion in 1839, and who has supplied all, all my need, in spite of all my failures.

Many who have visited Ardfert know with what gracious evidences of Christ's presence and blessing the meetings, both for worship and the Gospel, have been sustained, even to the present. There, through Mr. Talbot-Crosbie's earnest, thoughtful, and often eloquent addresses, many have been converted to God, many more built up, and helped in the Christian life. Latterly his great theme was a nearer walk with Christ, a fuller discovery of his perfections, a deeper love to his person and his people, and "a life more devoted to his service."

He had entered his eighty-third year when he passed away. His illness of eight months was singularly free from pain. His mental faculties remained wholly unimpaired to the end. Blessed to the child of God as is a sudden death, there was something very stately in the perfect calm with which this aged servant of God retreated from the scene of his activity; his peaceful retrospect, his deliberate dispositions for those he loved, and his joyful and triumphant, though ever-patient, waiting for the end.

On September 6, his body was buried in a sequestered enclosure of the ancient ruined Cathedral of Ardfert, where others of the family are laid, the services being conducted by his two younger sons and son-in-law, in the presence of a large number of friends and neighbours. All Mr. Talbot-Crosbie's seven children survive him, his eldest son, too unwell to reside permanently in Ireland, having been the only one absent from the final scenes.

By his death, Ireland has lost an able and earnest worker in the interest of her people; the Church of God, a devoted servant of Christ, who, alike by ministry and walk, had been a helper of many; and his family one who, to quote another's words, "was father and brother and friend," all in one.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR NOV. 5.

A New Name.—Gen. xxxii. 21-29, Rev. ii. 17.

THROUGHOUT the Bible, name stands for nature. Names in those wise old days were not given because of their euphonious sound, but as revealing some characteristic trait. Shepherds are said to name their sheep by their defects; in many instances Old Testament names seem to have been given on the same principle. It was so with Jacob. When the angel said "What is thy name?" he said, "Jacob," supplanter. Never shrink in your dealings with God to call yourself by your own specific title, whether it be the least of all saints, the chief of sinners, or Jacob, the dissembler and cheat.

Lonely moments, when we cannot bear the presence of our dearest, may become the crises of life. It was when the voices of the women and the babble of his children were removed, when there was no sound to break the sweep of the wind across the lea, or the chatter of the Jabbok in its stony bed, that the angel wrestled with him, as though intent on throwing him, of humbling him in the dust, of robbing him once and for all of the proud self-will which had fought its way through his difficult and arduous life. Do not be afraid of solitude. Full many voices speak which are drowned in these great cities by the unceasing rush of human tides of life and deed.

The first condition of loosing the old nature is sorrowfully to confess to its possession; the next is to yield to God. He probably has a controversy with thee, and comes to reduce thee utterly to his will. The first attitude on our human side is to resist and withstand, and where this is carried to its extremity, there is no alternative than to touch the sinew of stout resistance until it shrivels as flax before flame. He touched the hollow of his thigh, and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint as he wrestled. Then, the attitude is changed. As the sense of weakness steals over the soul, it resists no more. Nay, it clings for very support around the strong form of its antagonist. With both arms clasped around the angel's neck, Jacob said, "I will not let thee go." It was when his intensity, his desire, his yearning for blessing, were only equalled by the sense of his utter impotence, that the welcome words were uttered, "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel, the Prince, for thou hast had power with God, and thou shalt prevail with men."

Be conquered by God, yield to God, submit to his will, yield especially in the one point where his spirit presses thee hard. Life is full of the approaches of the wrestling angel, only we rebut instead of allowing ourselves to be vanquished. But each time we let God have his way in some new point of our character, we acquire the new name. In other words, a new phase of our character is developed, a new touch of the Divine beauty passes into our being, and we are transfigured more perfectly into his likeness, whose name comprehends all names. Simon, the dove, becomes Peter the rock.. Alas, that Jacob did not live always on the level of his name. The next two or three chapters are filled with the old name, and there was not a little of the old life.

When God calls us by a new name, He communicates to us a new name for Himself. In other words, He gives us a deeper revelation of his character. We are more able to understand and appreciate Him; He, therefore, reveals attributes which He had concealed. Perhaps, when Jacob asked the angel's name, He whispered the mystic Shiloh, which the dying man uttered as he crossed the border-line. The Apostle in the Apocalypse, tells us that every time we overcome, and we overcome by being conquered, God gives us a white stone, in which his new name is written, in evident reference to the pure diamond of the Urim and Thummim, by which He spoke to Israel, and on which Jehovah was engraved. Each victor over sin has his own stone of Urim, knows God's will at first hand, and has revelations of God's character which only He knows to whom they are made.

C.E. Notes.

The President's meetings were held last week at Chester and Crewe. In both places an important feature was the conversational hour with ministers and officers of societies, when criticisms and hints were freely given.

* * *

The Christian Endeavours of one town banded themselves together for the purpose of providing nightly social meetings for the men of a cavalry regiment doing duty there for a week. Formerly, the public-house and music-hall were their only places of resort in the evening. The effort is to be repeated.

The movement is progressing in Scotland, and we hear of new societies being added to the Union. Rev. J. E. Houston, B.D., of Cambuslang, is President this year.

Rev. A. Trevor Roberts, President of the Swansea Union, is shortly leaving Wales for the missionary field in India.

Swansea Floating C.E. Society has done good work amongst the sailors during the past year. In addition to the writing of letters, visits have been paid to sailors in the hospital, and, as the result, many have professed to find Christ as their Saviour.

There are two Endeavour Societies in a college in Central Turkey—one of over a hundred young men, the other of some fifty young ladies.

* * *

An inmate of the Minnesota State Prison writes how cheering was a meeting conducted by an Endeavour Society in the prison chapel. He gave himself to Christ nearly two years ago, and expects soon to be free, and then intends to unite with the Church. He says these occasional meetings have helped him much.

Light in the Cloud.

"All things work together for good to them that love God." (Rom. viii. 28.)

"Clouds have silver linings,"
Is a proverb old,
If we trust in Jesus,
Ours are lined with gold.

At Peterborough Fair.

SHORTLY after arrival in this city, on October 3, we planted our now well-known standard in the market-place, and opened our Open-Air Mission work on the eve of the fair. The next morning found us at the foot of the bridge, that now historic station, where we were enabled to "hold the fort" from the first to the last day of the fair. It is a splendid position, and affords a range for "the King's trumpeters" that covers the entire crowd, which must cross the bridge to reach the ground on which the great pleasure fair is held.

Around us, from 11 a.m. to 9.30 p.m., excepting two short intervals, many of the people came, crowding the bulwarks of the bridge. By many of those true marks and signs, so precious to the evangelist, we felt conscious that on that spot we must keep on delivering the glad tidings until long after nightfall.

Perhaps one of the most interesting ascertained instances of conversion on the last day of the fair was that of the daughter of Christian parents, both of whom, accompanied by their dear child (then a happy believer) came to us at the close of the meeting to express thanks, and to join in praise to God for his manifest presence with his servants. Our thanks are due to many local helpers, and, among ministers, particularly to Rev. Thomas Barrass.

Never had the Society the opportunity of preaching the Gospel to so many of the country people visiting this famous fair as the beautiful autumn weather afforded. Communications may be addressed to Mr. Frank Cockrem, Secretary, 11, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.

Tunis.—Mr. A. V. Liley (10, Rue de la Medressa, Es Slimania, Tunis), purposes to provide a reading-room for sailors. The need has long been felt by captains of vessels. The Bible depôt is proving particularly useful.

Rebuilding the Walls of Jerusalem.

Neh. iv. 7-18.

Golden Text.—Matt. xxvi. 41.

Lesson Connection.

RECALL last lesson, and continue the story, how Nehemiah, with sad and worn face, went in to the king; how this endangered his life; the king's notice of it; his questions and final offers. Point out why Nehemiah accepted an escort, while Ezra would not have one. He went, as the governor appointed by the king, and, riding into Jerusalem with a military escort, gave him power and standing (read chap. ii. 10). How long did the journey take, and what did Nehemiah take with him? Note the wise way he went to work, not acting on what he had heard, but inspecting for himself, and then telling his plans; the resolve of the people (chap. ii. 18-20); the scorn of the enemies (chap. ii. 19).

The Work

in chap. iii. It was divided among forty-four working parties. Everyone who could, helped. Women (v. 12), nobles, priests, Levites, merchants, sons of a goldsmith and a perfumer, willing workers. Each did the piece nearest to his own house; they worked in families, and those in the country came in to help. They used up the old material with the new, and cleared away the rubbish. Everyone's name was attached to his own work. They worked amid the greatest opposition. The wall was three or four miles in length, but was finished in about fifty-two days. Every incident is a lesson. Even children can do something for Christ. In the time of war a gentleman noticed some small boys trying to dig over a field. He asked one what he was doing. "Oh, sir," said he, "father's fighting, mother's praying, and I'm digging!"

Neh. iv. 7-18.

The enemies had ridiculed (chap. ii. 19; iv. 1-3) and slandered (chap. ii. 19; vi. 6). Now they formed a general conspiracy.

Verse 7. Sanballat appears to have been the Governor of Samaria; Tobiah, a chief of a little tribe of Ammonites, who lived the other side of Jordan. Arabians, wandering Arabs of the desert. Ashdodites, from Ashdod, a Philistine city on the Mediterranean. Why were they angry?

Verse 8. Unity is strength, and the enemies know this. If we cannot destroy evil, we can hinder it often. Do what we can.

Verse 9. Prayer (Ps. l, 15; lv. 16, 22) and watching (Luke xxi. 36; Acts iv. 29, 30). The two must always go together. "Day and night." Mahomet once heard one of his men say, "I will loose my camel and trust it to God;" and he said, "Nay, friend, tie thy camel, and then commit it to God."

Verse 10-12. Discouragements now come from within; the work was hard; the workers were wearing out; friends advised badly; some richer Jews oppressed the poorer. Afterwards, the enemy tried treachery and intimidation (chap. vi.). But Nehemiah grandly replied, "I will not." Verse 13. Proper precautions.

Verse 14. He looked, saw the enemy coming, and said, "There is no need to fear." Why? (Deut. i. 29, 30; Matt. x. 28). "Remember the Lord," the antidote for fear. "Remember Jesus, the ever-living Saviour" (2 Tim. ii. 8), our antidote for every trouble.

Verses 15-18. Working and fighting, ready to lift the warning trumpet for the safety of others. All the posts were not equally important; but, by each doing his part faithfully, the whole was accomplished.

Application.

To young children, it may be applied to show how every day they are building up character, the need of obedience. Each has a work to do, and should say, "I will try," not "I can't." Each do their own little bit of work. They will find enemies, ridicule, unkindness, temptation, &c.

To older scholars.—Four things all Christians must do if they would succeed—"work, fight, watch, pray." The Christian life is a building-up process. Building character—home—church—nation. We must work together, expect enemies, be armed with the sword of the spirit. Bunyan's allegory, "The Capture of Mansoul," is a good illustration. Don't be discouraged with difficulties. God overrules. Note how He used a despotic heathen king to help Nehemiah.

Evangelical Alliance.—The annual conference opened at Bristol on Tuesday, addresses being given by Rev. F. B. Meyer, Rev. Dr. C. Moinet, Rev. Dr. Matteo Prochet, and Dr. Harry Guinness. We hope to give a report of the proceedings in our next issue.

Blackboard Teaching.

[Notes of an address delivered by Mr. J. W. Arthur, Glasgow, at Scottish National Sabbath School Convention, Stirling.]

THE time has long gone past when it is necessary to advocate the use of object-lessons and blackboard teaching in the Sabbath-school. The appeal to the ear, of course, comes first, but that to the eye is of no less importance. It is a well-known fact that what is seen impresses itself more on the memory than what is heard—"Things seen are mightier than things heard," says Simpson—and every wise Sabbath-school teacher will take advantage of this fact, and make use, not only of the spoken lesson, but of that which more readily appeals to the eye.

There are certain advantages in the use of the blackboard which it is well to bear in mind.

I. It secures attention. Once get the eyes of your scholars and keep them fixed on your lesson, and you get their attention not only for your illustration but for the truth you desire to teach them.

II. It arouses interest, and successfully to maintain this, the lesson must be developed as it goes along. To draw rapidly and efficiently before an audience is not an easy accomplishment. It needs an artist to do it, and where one succeeds a dozen would fail. It is a much easier task to prepare a lesson beforehand, with quiet opportunities of correction and adjustment, and in this the dozen can succeed. The disadvantages, however, of such a lesson, if treated in the usual way, are very great. The attention may be secured at first by the illustrations, but as there is no development, interest soon flags; and the lesson, instead of reaching its climax at the close, is apt to have its climax at the beginning and taper off in interest as it proceeds.

I have for years been a user of the blackboard, but the necessity of development in its use conflicted very strongly with the inadequacy of my artistic powers. The uncovering lesson was my way out of the difficulty.

(Mr. Arthur then showed a board, being a review of eight different lessons on the life of Abraham. The lesson was painted in chalk upon stiff black paper, and the various portions of it were covered with little strips of paper of the same colour, fixed to the board by black pins. The board was placed before the audience with only a text and part of the lesson visible, and bit by bit the teaching was developed as the different points were uncovered).

III. Teaching by the blackboard stimulates thought. The object of the true teacher should not only be to fill the minds of his scholars with what he is teaching them, but also to draw out their thought, and induce an intelligent conception of what is being placed before them. If possible, some familiar object should be chosen as an illustration, and by use of this as a symbol, the truth desired to be conveyed can be imparted.

There should be no difficulty in finding subjects for blackboard illustration. The Bible is full of pictures and object-lessons, and one can hardly go to it without finding in it a mine of wealth for illustration. Hints from books are often good; what one learns for oneself is much better. To the open mind there are to be found "sermons in stones and books in the running brooks;" but, above all, in the Word of God is

THE SOURCE OF ALL INSPIRATION.

(The next lesson showed a rock upon which was built a fortress; and then a tower, crowned on its battlements with a banner. The lesson sought to be taught was that of the 18th Psalm: "The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my high tower, and my banner, and my joy."

It is a safe rule to fix your subject well ahead, and to store the mind with Scripture about it. Keep your eyes open to all around, and your heart open to God. The Word of God is seed: it will grow in your heart, and when the time comes to prepare and give your lesson you will find a crop ready when wanted.

IV. The blackboard can be used not only for the review lesson of the Sabbath-school, but also for a Gospel address. May I say, do not be afraid to carry your blackboard lessons further than the teaching of children. Some years ago it was my privilege to address a large gathering of mature Sabbath-school teachers at a Sabbath-school Convention, on the subject of blackboards. Their interest proved to me that the board could find a place in adult meetings, especially when I saw the Principal of one of our universities as interested in the method as any youngster. Since then I have used the board frequently in all kinds of meetings.

(The third board shown was one with the text, "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." It showed the Cross as the foundation of pardon, and illustrated forgiveness as a proclamation—"Hear it!" as a gift, "Take it!" as a light, "Spread it!")

One or two hints may be of use in conclusion:—(1) Do not be afraid to begin. A start made is a great matter. (2) Let the board be attractive, using white chalk chiefly, but adding to its brightness by colour. (3) For pictures depend mainly on outline. Some of the best "chalk-talkers" use it exclusively. (4) Head your lesson with a text bearing on the subject. (5) Proceed with the subject step by step. Let there be one leading point if possible, with three or four minor illustrations leading up to it. (6) Keep your best to the last—a golden rule. Finally, do not depend on your board. It is only a board. God must be the worker, therefore wait on Him, that his truth may be received through eye and ear and hid in the heart.

Schools for Bible Study.

THE third of Rev. Hubert Brooke's lectures on Bible study was delivered on Wednesday, October 26, at Exeter Hall. The subject, the New Testament, was dealt with under four heads:

I. Composition.—1. Contains twenty-seven books, by eight writers, within the space of seventy years. Records facts occurring during 100 years, and prophecies for 3,000 years (omitting, of course, the final description of the eternal reign). 2. Is in the form of history, letters public and private, and prophecy. The writers include a tax-gatherer, a servant, a physician, a trained theologian, and two fishermen; is written in the Greek language. 3. Its divisions: (a) Historical: Gospels and Acts; (b) Epistolary: Romans to Jude; (c) Prophetical: Revelation.

II. Progressive Teaching.—1. The order of the books in A.V. best illustrates and imparts the true progress of doctrine, having the foundation of historical facts, the superstructure of doctrines, and the climax in the prophetic future. 2. The four Gospels, the basis, are a fourfold record of our Lord (Gal. iv. 4, 5; 1 Cor. xv. 1-8; Rom. viii. 34); describing Him as Son of Abraham, Servant of God, Son of Man, and Son of God (cp. Rev. iv. 7); and written that we may know and believe on Him (Jno. xvii. 3; xx. 31). 3. The Acts describe the power of the Gospel story, as applied by the Holy Ghost, and afford an example for every age of what the Gospel can and may do.

III. Progress in Epistles.—1. In these we pass from facts and examples to the principles of their use; with significant order observed. (a) Foundation principles, (b) removal of obstacles, (c) progressive stages, (d) explanations, (e) confirmations. 2. Romans gives the foundation principles: viz., man's ruin, God's remedy, life redeemed, service. Corinthians shows the difficulties of the carnal mind; and Galatians, of the legal mind, met and overcome. Ephesians illustrates the standing, and Philippians the walk of the Christian. Colossians describes the supplies in the Head; and Thessalonians, the return of the Head. 3, The Pastoral Epistles: Church Government. Philemon deals with home life. Hebrews with Old Testament shadows fulfilled in New Testament substance. Fourfold confirmation of Pauline teaching occurs in James, Peter, John, Jude. The perfect climax is reached in Revelation, which corresponds to Daniel in Old Testament.

IV. Conclusions.—1. Personal progress will be along the line of the New Testament books; containing in order the lessons for every development of the soul. 2. Every condition of the soul, in every relationship of life, is provided for in these books; if in Old Testament, much more in Old and New Testaments together (2 Tim. iii. 17) is true. 3. Study historically, for facts; doctrinally, for principles of Divine truth; practically, for personal use; prayerfully, for Divine light.

REV. GEORGE SOLTAU'S LECTURES.

In a recent lecture, Mr. Soltau dwelt upon St. Matthew's portrait of Christ. Among the points developed were:—

The Features of the Gospel.—The author, a Jew, accustomed to the use of the Pentateuch. A man of decision. Writing for the Jews, he wished to show how all the words and works of Jesus of Nazareth were in fulfilment of and accord with Scripture. They professed to know, understand, and venerate their Scriptures, therefore He must be accepted as Messiah. Key words: King, occurs 14 times; Kingdom, 17 times; Kingdom of Heaven, 32 times; Kingdom of God, 5 times; "I say unto you," 54 times. Key sentences: "That it might be fulfilled," 14 times, in connection with 5 books—Psa., Isa., Jer., Hos., Zech.; "It is written," and "It hath been said to them of old time," 15 times, referring to 8 books—Ex., Lev., Deut., Psa., Mic., Zech., Matt. There are 6 quotations from 5 books—Ex., Job, Psa., Isa., Hos.; "Have ye never read?" appears 6 times, from 6 books—Gen., Ex., Num., Sam., Psa., Isa. There are 50 to 60 allusions, taken from 8 books—Gen., Lev., Kings, Chron., Isa., Ezek., Dan., Jonah. In all 19 books are used in the structure, and 17 O.T. characters are referred to—Abel, Noah, Abraham, Lot, Lot's wife, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, Solomon, Queen of Sheba, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, Jonah, Zacharias.

The Five Proclamations.—The Gospel of Matthew may be said to be built round the five pillars of five proclamations. They are contained in v.-vii., x., xiii., xvi.-xviii., and xxiii.-xxv. They may be analysed as follows:—v., vi., vii., the new law, the King as law-giver. Keyword: righteousness. New word: Father, is introduced. Commencing with "blessed" are the poor, pure, peaceful, mourners, merciful, hungry, and harassed. x. The new mission, the King a Saviour. Key word: variance. New words: freely, confess, persecution. Divisions: 5-15, local and temporary; 16-23, after Pentecost experiences; 24-42, general features through all the dispensation. Confession, resulting in strife. xiii., the new kingdom, the King veiled. Key word: mixture. New word: mystery. xvi. and xviii.: the new association, the King (veiled) present. Key word: presence. New word: church. Divisions:-xvi. 13-28, the purpose announced; xviii. 1-14, treatment of little ones; 15-20, Church discipline; 21-35, practice of forgiveness. xxiii.-xxv., the new hope, the King a judge. Key word: manifestation. New words: woe, elect, punishment. Divisions: xxiii., woes proclaimed on those hindering entry into the kingdom of heaven; the incident of leaving the Temple, calling forth the three-fold question of xxiv. 3. Answers to first question, "When shall these things be?" in verses 3-6. To second question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" in verses 7-30. To third question, "And of the end of the world?" in verses 7-31.

Colportage.—Mr. James Rennie, of Hitchin, has just completed his 28th year of labour in our markets and villages, principally in Midland counties. During the past year he disposed of 52,153 books, 1,426 Bibles, and 30,000 tracts, and conducted 50 Gospel temperance meetings.

Ratcliff Strangers' Rest.—An enjoyable and profitable time was spent on Monday, October 16, at a special gathering at the Strangers' Rest. A large number of seamen, representative of various nationalities, were present, and the proceedings were characterized by heartiness and good feeling. The feature of the evening was a pithy address by Surgeon-General Partridge on "A Three-fold Salvation." Mr. J. Theo. Isaac, the hon. secretary, will be pleased to hear from friends willing to aid in the work. Address, 163, St. George's Street, Ratcliff, E.

Literature for Soldiers.

DEAR SIR,—We are very grateful to your readers who have contributed literature for soldiers at the front. Further supplies will be most acceptable, as large reinforcements will reach our shores in a few days.

The marked Testament, and clear-pointed Gospel booklets and leaflets, will be suitable, as well as publications such as "The Herald of Mercy," "Faithful Words," and "The Springing Well."

Packets may be sent to this address by book-post, as no time is to be lost. Yesterday troops were moved from this station to the border. After witnessing the ceremony of handing over the colours to the Mayor, in front of the Town Hall, Mr. Howe and myself visited the camp, where the soldiers were completing their preparations for the start. We had earnest, solemn talks with groups of men as well as with individuals, and distributed all the Gospel literature we had. They cannot carry Bibles with them; and the little illustrated Gospels published by the Scripture Gift Mission were eagerly received, two hands being extended for the last copy.

The fact that thousands of our soldiers have shortly to face death, many—unless God avert war—to pass into eternity, lays a solemn responsibility upon his people.

We are seeking guidance as to personal work among the troops as far as this may be possible, and ask for help in prayer that this time of darkness and distress in South Africa may be God's time to work not only amongst those who carry their lives in their hands, but also among the homeless refugees, rich and poor, who have fled to the towns south of the border.

(Mrs.) M. S. Osborn-Howe.

King William's Town, Cape Colony.

Tipperary.

WE desire to bring before the readers of The Christian, the great need of a soldiers' home in the town of Tipperary. Perhaps there is no spot in all Ireland where a home is more sadly required. The East Yorkshire Regiment, which is temporarily at Templemore, will soon return to Tipperary. God has his own witnesses in that regiment, not a few of whom have been converted lately in the Kilworth Home, where the regiment was under canvas. These men felt greatly leaving Kilworth, knowing that, when they returned to Tipperary, they would have no spot to meet together.

At a meeting held in the gymnasium at Templemore, kindly lent for this purpose by the Colonel of the regiment, the hope was expressed that a home might be erected, and one sergeant at the close of the meeting gave £5 towards this object, and we have had promises up to about £20.

Miss Williamson, of the Fermoy and Kilworth Homes is willing, if the money is collected, to undertake this home. The sum required will be about £800; and, for this amount, we think a home, containing coffee-bar, reading-room, lecture-room, kitchen, &c., and accommodation for a lady in charge, can be erected.

Tipperary is a typical Irish town, abounding with public-houses—the only places of resort, outside of barracks, for the men. Just now, when many hearts are turned towards South Africa and our soldiers there, surely the sympathies of God's children will be drawn forth in a practical way on their behalf. How many who are now either in the Transvaal, or on their way thither, have been saved and blest in the Soldiers' Homes, and our desire is that in every garrison town such places of shelter should be provided! (Miss) E. W. Thompson.

Ard-ruim, Dalkey, co. Dublin.

Troops in South Africa.

THE Army and Navy Missionary Union is exerting itself for the good of the troops at the Cape, or going thither. It is circulating among the men a list of mission workers in the various centres of South Africa, in the hope that, should occasion or need arise, our soldiers may seek help and counsel in reliable quarters. The Union exists to promote the highest good of soldiers and sailors in all parts of the world. During the last few months a great number of copies of the Scriptures have been despatched to the seat of war, and Christian literature has been widely circulated on ships and in garrisons at nearly every port from which troops have sailed. The secretary of the union is Commander J. Y. F. Sulivan, 31, Queen's Road, Tunbridge Wells.

Sir George Williams, president of the Soldiers' Christian Association, writes: "The transport of an Army Corps to South Africa, by which Her Majesty's forces in that country will be raised approximately to 75,000 men, has placed upon this and kindred organizations the responsibility of doing whatever is practicable in the way of providing for their spiritual and moral needs. In order to meet, in some measure, these needs, the council of the Soldiers' Christian Association are arranging to send a band of qualified workers to South Africa at once. It is proposed that with each worker an equipment be sent consisting of a large tent, comfortably furnished, for use as a reading and writing room by the men. The Council estimate that the outfit, passage, and maintenance of each worker for five months, including the cost of tent, furniture, &c., will be approximately £250, and as at least six men should be despatched at once, it is imperative that the Council should have at its disposal, without delay, the sum of £1,500. Communications may be addressed to the treasurer of the South African Emergency Fund, Col. H. G. Macgregor, C.B., Exeter Hall, Strand."

Limerick.

SIR,—Will you allow us to lay the following proposal to found a Soldiers' Home in Limerick before your readers?

As matters stand at present, a soldier has no place outside of barracks to which he can go, should he want food, refreshment, or entertainment of any kind, except the public-house.

Miss Sandes, whose Homes have been so successful in Dublin, Cork, Belfast, and other garrison towns in Ireland and India, has kindly consented to provide a manager for a Home in Limerick.

The Home would contain a temperance bar-room, reading-room, and room where Gospel meetings and temperance lectures would be held. That the Limerick garrison feel the urgent need of such an institution is shown, we think, by the fact that they have contributed £150 towards the project.

In all, to open the Home satisfactorily, £2,000 would be required, and, of this amount, £1,000 has been already subscribed.

It is for the remaining £1,000 that we would appeal most earnestly, as the purchase money must be paid by December 31 next.

We believe that, under God, the Home would be the means of real temporal and spiritual blessing to all in the garrison. We shall most thankfully acknowledge all contributions, and give any further information, which may be required.—Yours, &c.,

J. Shawe-Taylor (Capt. 2nd Cheshire Regt.),
Hon. Sec., New Barracks, Limerick.
T. E. Kelsall (Lieut. Royal Engineers),
Hon. Treas., 15, Barrington Street, Limerick.

Weymouth.

IT is proposed to build a Home for Sailors and Soldiers at Weymouth, to be conducted on temperance and unsectarian lines, with a resident lady superintendent. Her Majesty's Government has granted a site for this Home on the "Nothe," on the condition that the necessary funds are raised by December 1—£2,000 will be required.

The building proposed to be erected would have a bar, reading rooms, bedrooms, twenty-three cubicles, and as many hammocks as could be put up on an emergency, probably about thirty. This situation is very convenient for the Royal Artillery stationed on the Nothe. The need of such a Home would be deeply felt by any one who was at Weymouth during the late visit of the Channel Fleet to Portland Roads, which is their headquarters. The B.W.T.A. have lately opened a bar, reading-room, and twelve beds, but this, needless to say, is totally inadequate for the requirements of the numbers who come on shore.

The following officers have kindly consented to act as a committee, one to be appointed by Government—Commander Fisher, R.N., and Colonel Russell, R.E. (retired). F. E. East.

Soldiers' Home, Dorchester.

To bless "Our Soldiers."

WE hate war! with its separations and slaughter, its ill-feeling and bloodshed; but we love soldiers. God loves soldiers; and those who know Miss Perks and her sister, of the Soldiers' Home, Winchester, will not fail to see that these self-denying workers love soldiers: for soldiers they live, and for soldiers they all but die. Just now it is a sad time, and yet a glad time. These ladies are celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the work.

During these long years, in every possible way they have sought the eternal welfare of the nation's troops; in barracks, in camp, in hospital, and on board ship, they have met the men with the one grand message, "Christ died for his enemies." But the gladness is dimmed by the war-cloud; the anniversary is marred by the boom of cannon and the clash of arms.

There are partings that may be for ever, and sorrowing ones left behind who must have sympathy; and visions of sick, and wounded, and dying. Many of these have sung with us, prayed with us, and told us of their love for our precious Lord. The friends of the Winchester Soldiers' Home follow to the embarkation; further they cannot go; but letters, books, writing-cases, needle-cases, "Bugle Calls," and other proofs of Christian love, must follow them on right up to the front. Who will help, at once, for the fine fellows may soon be beyond our reach. While thousands of pounds are flowing in for the relief of the many who suffer in temporal things, and while our country is spending its millions in war materials, will not the King's stewards give for the spiritual welfare of the Queen's soldiers? Miss Perks will be glad to receive help for the wives and families of the soldiers known to her who have been killed and wounded during this war in South Africa; also for the Reserve corps, many of whose families are sadly suffering through the absence of the bread-winners.

The Welcome Home for Sailors.

THIS well-known institution has been productive of great blessing to the sailors who, from time to time, visit the neighbourhood of Canning Town. Its branches include—coffee room, dining-room, bedrooms, book-bag room, and mission rooms. Many instances might be given of fruit attending the exertions of the promoters.

A tired sailor on one occasion entered the refreshment bar, and asked to be allowed to remain under the friendly roof, which was readily granted. As he sat resting, a young man came in, who also wished to remain. Looking round the room, he discerned the old sailor, who eventually proved to be no other than his father, whom he had not seen for many years.

In various ways the men are catered for and helped, and while every effort is made for material comfort, their spiritual necessities receive chief attention. Men of all nationalities and creeds, and also those of no religion, are brought into touch with Divine truth as revealed in the Scriptures. When the meals and work of the day are over, it is usual for the Christian men to hold meetings for praise, prayer, and testimony.

The book-bag room provides bags of books, tracts, and other Christian literature, which are sent or conveyed by sailors to all parts of the world. The "home-coming" of the "Christmas boat," laden with gifts of many friends of the Home, is looked forward to with pleasure by hundreds of seamen, who are then provided with nearly every description of clothing, &c. The "unloading" is to take place about the middle of December, and information as to ways in which land folk may help will be gladly supplied by Miss R. Child, Welcome Home, Canning Town, London, E.

London Soldiers' Home, James Street, Buckingham Gate.—At the beginning of the year an appeal was circulated amongst the friends of the Aldershot mission for help in making much-needed alterations, in order to add to the sleeping accommodation. So kind a response was given that the work is now nearing completion. Although the new married quarters, and most of the fifteen new cubicles, are given, a few of the latter are still unappropriated. A contribution of £25 gives the right of naming one. Most of the cubicles in our Soldiers' Homes are thus named in memory of those who have gone. Communications may be sent to Miss Hanson, Mission Hall and Soldiers' Home, Aldershot.

The Nation's Children.

By Sir HENRY BEMROSE, M.P.*

FIRST of all, I think this movement which Dr. Barnardo has conducted for the salvation of the children of our slums appeals to all of us because of its comprehensiveness. It takes a child from the gutter—the lowest position into which human nature can fall, through parental neglect or misfortune of one kind or another—and it brings that child under humanizing and Christianizing influences, and it watches over him or her until the period of childhood is past and youth comes, and the boy or girl has to go forth into the world and meet temptation.

No fewer than 10,660 trained lads and girls have already been emigrated from these Homes—to Canada principally. Careful enquiries recently made by the Canadian Government as to the futures of these emigrants showed that only 1·38 out of every hundred of them have failed to achieve and to maintain their own independence and respectability. A work of this kind must be judged by its fruits, and not by any theory, and that fact alone will bear favourable comparison with the figures of any other institution in this country.

Then there is the careful classification of those admitted. There are fourteen handicrafts or trades followed by the boys; while for the girls, in addition to thorough training for domestic service, the arts of dressmaking and of the laundress are well taught. Very great care is taken to select exactly that employment which suits each individual best. It is quite touching, for example, to see in some of the shops—the tailor's room and the shoemaker's—a number of working cripples. I mention that to show you that the individuality of each boy and girl is carefully considered, and that those occupations are chosen for them for which they are best fitted, and which they will be enabled to follow in years to come.

There are as many as 1,500 children boarded out in country homes, and these children are visited from time to time by lady doctors and others, whose duty it is to see that they are well attended to. Then there are over 1,200 who are in cottage homes, also in the country. Altogether there are of this great national and philanthropic work.

Recollect, also, that these children are not admitted by means of votes; nor are unwilling doors opened by golden or silver keys: the only qualification is absolute need, real destitution on the part of the child. It is not only those who come voluntarily who are received here; but there are a number of agents in London and in the large towns of England and Wales, and I believe, in one case, in Ireland also, whose duty it is to visit the common lodging-houses and other resorts of the forsaken and the ne'er-do-weel, and to search out for unhappy derelict children, and to bring them under the influence of these Homes.

Then, as to the national character and importance of these Homes. Science has taught us, lately, something as to the value of what we have hitherto treated as refuse—physical refuse—but from the very beginning of the Christian era, the spirit of the blessed Gospel of our Saviour has been teaching us the unspeakable value of what the heathen nations of old scornfully regarded as human refuse, and pointing out to us that we can no longer neglect it or leave it alone. The most precious inheritance of a nation is its youth. In the young men and young women who are around us today we see our future rulers in Church and in State: we see our future workers; those who will be the princes of commerce; those who will carry the British flag throughout the world, and upon whose character will depend the maintenance of that high position which God has given us amongst the nations.

Do you remember the psalm in which the Psalmist, with a spirit of longing and of prayer, mentions what he desires for the prosperity of Israel? He mentions that the sheep and the oxen shall multiply by their thousands and tens of thousands, that there be no complaining in the street; and he goes on to say, "that our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth, that our daughters may be as corner-stones hewn out after the fashion of a palace." It is ours to train the young men that, when they grow up, they may rightly fill their places in society, and may be, wherever they go, a blessing to those around them. It is ours also to train carefully the young womanhood of our land, that they, too, may grow up and occupy positions in the world with credit to themselves and benefit to those with whom they come in contact. As Dr. Barnardo himself says in his interesting little brochure, "The Rescue of the Waif" (published at 18 to 26, Stepney Causeway, London, E.):—

My great aim (and in this I am earnestly supported by a splendid band of devoted fellow-workers) is to bring each and every child in faith and hope to the feet of our Saviour Christ Himself, whose heart of love, and voice of pity, first impelled me to this service in his name.

This has been the foundation of Dr. Barnardo's work in these ninety-one institutions during the past thirty-three years. It is this foundation on which the whole superstructure depends, and without which it could not have been reared. He has even anticipated the work of Parliament! Whilst we have had Commissions sitting, and one department after another hardly knowing what to do in its discussions of the questions of barrack-schools and boarding out, these Homes have solved the problem thirty years and more ago. If the nation were wise I think it would take a pattern from Dr. Barnardo's Homes, and the system which their founder has pursued; and I hope it would be equally careful to see that the foundation should be laid, as he laid it, in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ!

* The substance of a speech delivered at one of Dr. Barnardo's recent meetings.

Christmas Letter Mission.

YEAR by year, as Christmas approaches, we have called attention to the publications of the Christmas Letter Mission. We cannot write letters to all our acquaintances, but we can send printed communications conveying sincere goodwill, and expressing warm Christian sympathy. From the latest report of the Mission, we learn that thousands of these were welcomed last Christmas. "Have you an Italian organ-grinder in your town? If so get an Italian letter for him. Or do you live by the sea-side? Then could you not distribute a few fishermen's letters along the shore?"

The number of letters distributed last Christmas among London cab, tram-car, and omnibus men was 8,700. The letters are well read, and in many cases preserved from year to year, also the cards, and not a few of the men put them into frames. Many of the men send their cards and letters to friends in different parts of the world. A distributor writes: "There have been cases in which, through the reading of the letters, men have been led to Bible study—first, to see if the quotations were correct; and, secondly, on account of their understandings being enlightened. Only one man out of a thousand refused to accept a letter; many thank me in a most hearty way."

The various foreign branches are vigorously worked by missionaries and other friends. From India it is reported: "The letters were eagerly sought after. Everyone received them with much pleasure, and I trust good has been done. Soldiers gladly receive them. My wife and I went round the hospitals with the letters and flowers, and gave one to every lad there; they were delighted, and I think it helped also to gather the men to our meeting in hospital immediately after distribution." Year by year the letters reach new places in Italy. They were given in the following places:—Rome, Naples, Florence, Milan, Genoa, La Spezia, San Remo, Intra, Pisa, Torre Pellice, Sicily, and Elba. Also to Italians in other lands.

The Mission provides letters at a very small cost for sick and well, young and old. Specimen packet, 3d.; or a letter and card packet for 1s. 6d., from 1, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

A Grateful Memorial.

AS President of the Barbican Mission to the Jews, Prebendary Webb Peploe writes:—

The name of the late Prebendary Gordon Calthrop will long remain a fragrant memory with those who love and value Evangelical truth, and it is a source of much satisfaction that plans are in progress for erecting, in London, a monument to his memory, to advance the cause he had at heart—the evangelization of Israel.

Some years ago the Barbican Mission to the Jews, then a small Gospel Agency working amongst a few Hebrews, was at a particularly low ebb; and, owing to the ill-health of the chief worker, it was on the point of being given up altogether. Prebendary Calthrop, however, who knew the appalling needs of Israel as well as any man, was shocked at even one small agency being discontinued, and with the help of a few friends he set to work to revive it. Prediger C. T. Lipshytz, who had been associated with the former head of the Mission, was appointed director, and other changes were made. That Prebendary Calthorp was Divinely guided in what he did is seen—may we not humbly hope?—in the manifest blessing which has been vouchsafed to the Mission these last ten years. One of the first tokens of the Lord's favour was seen in the spontaneous provision by "A Friend of Israel" of a mission house and premises in Finsbury Square. This truly Christian act enabled the Mission for seven years to have a house of its own; and there the workers gathered hundreds of Jews of all nationalities into services to hear the Gospel of the Lord Jesus, and into Bible classes and other meetings to study the claims of Christ to be their Messiah and Saviour. The great day when all secrets shall be revealed will alone show the full effect of this work; but, to the praise and glory of God be it stated, the mission workers were not left without witness that God was working with them, and many lost sheep of the House of Israel have been brought into the fold of Christ.

The lease of the Mission House in Finsbury Square expired in September, 1898, and the Mission took temporary premises in Commercial Road, the very centre of the Jewish quarter, where the work is still carried on. Again we have thankfully to record the marvellous manifestation of the good hand of our God upon us. The attendances of Jews at the various services, meetings, and classes has been much larger than before, and there is a spirit of reverent inquiry amongst many, for which we are deeply thankful. Several of these Jews have definitely come out on the Lord's side, and, after due preparation and examination, have CONFESSED THE LORD IN BAPTISM.

Very humbly do we say it, but we believe the Lord is bidding us go forward; we feel, therefore, that the time has now come when the Mission should have a permanent headquarters of its own. Great care has been taken in recent years to consolidate the working of the Mission, and to bring its management into line with the requirements of the time. Its distinctive feature is that the spiritual direction of the Mission shall be in the hands of a Hebrew Christian, and that, as far as possible, all the other workers shall also be Hebrew Christians. The business arrangements of the Mission are under the direct control of the president and a committee, who also exercise supervision over the whole work.

An excellent site in the Whitechapel Road has been secured, and we are now proposing to erect a permanent mission house, which will be associated with the memory of the late Prebendary Gordon Calthorp, to whose boldness of faith and tenacity of purpose the Mission, in its re-organized form, owes to God its very existence. But before we can begin to build, we must be supplied with funds for the purpose. About £3,000 are still required, and we appeal confidently to all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, and are really concerned for the spread of the Gospel among the Jews, to come to our help.

Britain's Poor Boys.

MOST of Uncle Tom's little nephews and nieces will remember that our Saviour, when He was upon the earth, showed great sympathy for the poor. His great heart of pity went out to all who were in distress. Boys and girls who love Him, and "try his works to do," will surely feel interested, then, in the lives of those whose lot is cast in sad and miserable places.

There are very many poor lads, for instance, to whom the word "home" represents nothing but a dingy garret in a great smoky slum, and whose parents are usually to be found in a public-house or a prison. Such lads often become outcasts, selling toys or newspapers in the streets all day, and sleeping in doorways or cartsheds, or at best in some squalid lodging-house.

Many go, or are sent, to a Poor Law school; and when, subsequently, the time comes for them to leave, and seek work, their position is one of great danger, for in many instances they are sickly, as a result of former exposure or of neglect in babyhood. Having they are in such a predicament that they must sink to the level of what is called a "gutter Arab," unless some friendly hand be outstretched to rescue them.

Happily, some kind and wise people, whose hearts God has touched, have provided institutions called "Homes for Working Lads" in various parts of London, where such boys may find just the kind of help they need at such a time. Situations are found for them, and in return for a small payment they are provided with a comfortable home. One of the largest of these is Pelham House, in Spital Square, in the queer old district where once the famous Spitalfields weavers flourished. Pelham House, so called after one of the chief workers, the Hon. T. H. W. Pelham, of Deene House, Putney, is a beautiful building, standing out gracefully among a cluster of dingy houses, and gay with the green festoons of a pretty clinging plant which trails along the balcony.

To pay a call at dinner time is a highly interesting experience. The boys, smart and well-trained, come bustling in from business, evidently ready to do justice to their savoury meal. The building is, as the superintendent observes, bright and airy. The dormitories are models of cleanliness and simple comfort. There is a big asphalted gymnasium, where many of the boys have merry times these dark evenings when their work is done. For those with a taste for study, or for simple games that exercise mind rather than body, there is a splendidly fitted apartment, while a piano and other instruments are provided for the musical.

But—the kitchen! That is a place of remarkable interest to the hungry lads, as a grateful steam wreathes forth into the passages. The dining-room is full of cheery lads who, having enjoyed a liberal helping of soup, are considering whether they will take cold ham or hot steak-pie as a second course.

"Have a word with one of the latest comers," says the superintendent, beckoning forward a fair-haired little fellow in a blue guernsey. "He has come from a truants' school;" but, in answer to an expressed hope that he now," he whispers a modest "Yus." The lads, it appears, do remarkably well in their situations, and grow up into useful members of society. Upstairs, in the office, are sheaves of letters from those who have prospered, and who still remember with gratitude the Home where they received welcome aid at the outset of their careers.

The most satisfactory fact in connection with the Homes is, however, not even that they are clean and sensibly conducted, but that the spirit of the management is Christian. It is intended not merely to provide a bed and a meal, but to lead these precious young people to know and love the Saviour. Yes; these Homes for Working Lads prove a blessing to many—a refuge from the cutting winds of poverty and despair. H.

In compliance with the urgent request of readers of the "Young People's Page," the article on Trains, which appeared in a recent issue, has been published in booklet form.—Trains: A Chat with Young People, by Kate Hopkins (4d. per doz.; 1s. 6d. per 100. Morgan & Scott.) The interest and point of that talk are still in the minds of many, who will be glad to circulate it among their young friends and acquaintances.

"The Christian" Bible-Searcher.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 200).

WORD PICTURES.

1. This picture represents a scene in the wilderness. It is early morning, and the camp of Israel is astir. How white the ground is! Can it be hoar-frost? Look nearer. Myriads of tiny white seeds are thickly strewn around; and here comes a crowd of men, women, and children to gather this beautiful food in vessels for their morning meal.

(a) Give the name of this food. What did it taste like, and how much was allowed to each person?

(b) There is an allusion to this food in the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel. Name it.

2. We see the camp of Israel again. This time the scene is very different. Sickness and sorrow have invaded it, and every tent has some fevered occupant, either dead or dying from the bite of a fiery serpent. Look at yonder high pole with its brazen serpent glittering brightly in the sunlight. It is for the healing of the people. All eyes are strained in that direction, and kind hands are bringing forth the helpless sufferers that they too may look at it and live.

(a) Why was this punishment permitted?

(b) Of whom was the brazen serpent a type?

(c) Give a New Testament reference as proof.

3. Here are twelve men. Two of the number are carrrying a huge bunch of grapes between them on a staff. They have been exploring the land of Canaan, and are now relating the story of what they have seen and heard. Ten of the men are telling a dismal tale of walled cities and of giants, before whom they would appear as grasshoppers, which strikes terror into the hearts of the people. The other two are bright and courageous. They point to the beautiful fruit, give a good report of the country, and tell the people they are well able to go up and possess it.

(a) Which report gained favour? How were the people punished?

(b) What became of the bad spies?

(c) Name the two men who gave the good report.

(Children under ten do any two; under thirteen, any four; under seventeen, any six.)

About Books.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

VARIED in contents and profusely illustrated, the New Penny Magazine is very welcome in volume form. (2s. 6d. Cassell & Co.) The large amount of reading is made accessible for reference by an admirable index.

Another annual from "Home Words" Office is The Day of Days, of which the present is the 28th volume. It is still edited by Rev. Charles Bullock, and is to-day as full as ever of good and wholesome reading for the homes of the people.

The Little Folks' Christmas Volume is up to the high standard of past years; moreover, it embodies new and attractive features. There are pictures on nearly every page, together with coloured plates and numerous smaller illustrations in colour. (Boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 5s. Cassell). The volume contains serial stories by Mrs. Molesworth and Edward S. Ellis, and tales, articles, and sketches by many other entertainers and instructors of young.

The Quiver Yearly Volume has some 900 illustrations, and is a rich budget of good reading. (7s. 6d. Cassell). The contents include five serial stories and many short ones, by well-known writers; illustrated articles on specially interesting subjects, sermon papers by divines of various denominations, and notes on philanthropic and social work. "Great Anniversaries of the Year" is a singularly attractive department of this excellent magazine.

STORY BOOKS.

Messrs. W. & R. Chambers are issuing stories by good writers, in superior style alike as to illustration and binding. Recent publications of this class are:—The Unjust Steward; or, the Minister's Debt, a capital Scotch story by Mrs. Oliphant (3s. 6d.). The pages are full of animation, and the greater domestic interests punctuate the tale. Light o' the Morning; the Story of an Irish Girl, by L. T. Meade (5s.). The love of things Hibernian, by natives of the Sister Isle, is admirably portrayed. The Odds and the Evens, also by L. T. Meade (6s.) will specially interest growing children, for it tells of some who, though they were well-to-do, failed to do well and agree with one another. Young folks will welcome the tales of adventure given in Peril and Prowess (5s.). The writers include G. A. Henty, G. M. Fenn, A. Conan Doyle, and D. Ker. To name the other contributors were unnecessary.

Messrs. Cassell & Co. have issued the first part of a new penny monthly for little folks, entitled Tiny Tots.

Dr. Robert Anderson's remarkable book, The Silence of God, is now in its fifth and cheaper edition. (2s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The current issue of Footsteps of Truth contains an excellent portrait of Mr. W. Monro Collings, the evangelist, with a brief sketch of his life and work. (1d. Shaw.)

Young women may find interest and entertainment in Emma Marshall's A Good-Hearted Girl (3s. 6d. W. & R. Chambers), a sketch of life in Church of England circles.

Mr. Henry Miller's manual, A Guide to Ecclesiastical Law, for churchwardens and parishioners, with plates illustrating vestments, &c., is now in its seventh edition. (1s. nett. Shaw.)

The Life Worth Living is the title of a series of discourses by Rev. Dyson Hague, of Wycliffe College, Toronto. (1s. Marshall Brothers.) The pages are forceful in style and practical in drift.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. have issued a very attractive edition of Dr. J. H. Ingraham's well-known work, The Pillar of Fire; or, Israel in Bondage (3s. 6d.). A special feature is a series of illustrations by Victor Searles.

Some English Rivers, by William J. Forster (1s. C. H. Kelly), enables young people to take imaginary journeys, whereby they are generally interested and instructed in geography. The book is admirably illustrated.

Lovers of Scottish story will welcome a new book of Highland Idylls, by Ian Mackenzie (3s. 6d. Stockwell & Co.). The idylls are well conceived, and written in most interesting manner. The book is well bound, with uncut edges.

Messrs. Cassell are presenting, with Part I. of Battles of the Nineteenth Century (7d.), an admirable map of Southern Africa, including the Cape Colony, Natal, South African Republic, Orange Free State, and other territories.

The Leisure Hour begins a new series this month. The opening story is by Sir Walter Besant. Mr. James Bryce writes on "Reading;" W. J. Gordon describes Woolwich Arsenal; and there is a symposium on Betting. (6d. R.T.S.)

Mrs. Charlotte Skinner's new book is For Love's Sake (1s. Partridge). In ten very readable chapters, we have a display of the motive of love, and lessons founded on its obligation. The little book is admirably adapted for a Christmas "card."

Archdeacon Sinclair's eighth charge to the clergy and churchwardens of London has been published. It is entitled Church Courts (1s. Elliot Stock), and sets forth a goodly body of fact and opinion on a subject of considerable present-day interest.

Under the title of A Buried Sphinx, Walter W. Crump, M.A., presents a thoughtful study of the revelation of God as Spirit, Light, and Love. (1s. Andrews & Co.) An intrusive remark on baptism—"when the Life-germ was infused"—is the fly in the ointment.

Miss Caroline W. Pumphrey has written a short biography of the late Samuel Baker, for many years the senior missionary of the Friends' Mission in India, which will shortly be published by Headley Brothers. Mr. Baker died in February last, after more than twenty years' missionary service.

In Lights and Shadows of Forster Square, Rev. E. H. Sugden portrays the career of a poor lad, who, by an earnest and unselfish life, becomes a channel of blessing to many. Mr. Sugden writes from a distinctly Church point of view, and introduces an interesting description of a Church Army Home. (2s. Partridge.)

Two singularly thoughtful little works, by John Maynard, are Life and its Phenomena: A demonstration of the existence of God; and Happy Wedded Life: How to realize it, a book which is characterized by practical good sense, as might reasonably be inferred from the fact that it is in its fifth edition. (1s. each. Partridge.)

Founders of the Empire, by Philip Gibbs, is evidently a book intended to serve the purpose of popular instruction. There are four coloured plates, and many other illustrations; and the story, from the days of Alfred to the exploits of Nelson and Wellington, is one to stimulate a sense of patriotic privilege and duty. (1s. 8d. Cassell & Co.)

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co. issue an excellent little volume, entitled The Andrew Murray Year-Book. It gives brief readings for every day in the year, selected from Dr. Andrew Murray's various works. There is a portrait of the revered author, and the watered silk binding, and other features, suggest the special suitability of the book for presentation purposes (2s. 6d.).

The series of "Little Books on Religion" includes a number of very useful works, answering to the multum in parvo description. The two latest are Aids to Belief, by the Bishop of Derry, and The Four Gospels, by R. H. Fisher, B.D. (1s. 6d. each. Hodder & Stoughton.) These are books that deserve high commendation. They are rich in substance, and unexceptionable in style.

A volume calculated to interest young children in India and its millions, is Stories from Mother's Note Book. By Lucy I. Tonge (Church of England Zenana Missionary Society). Two publications, "Stories" and "More Stories," are combined in the third edition now before us. There are many illustrations; and the book is provided with a preface by Miss J. A. Winscombe, and an introduction by Rev. George Everard.

The Missionary Loan Exhibitions of the C.M.S. constitute a sign of the rising interest in world-wide evangelization. In order to advance the utility of such exhibitions, a capital little book has been compiled, entitled A Manual for Stewards (1s. net. C.M.S. House). The great variety of information compressed into the book, regarding heathen peoples and their customs, invests the pages with a peculiar value.

The fourth volume of Dr. Parker's Studies in Texts has all the high qualities of its predecessors. (3s. 6d. Horace Marshall & Son.) The book is full of great thoughts and helpful counsels. Those who know the preacher, hear (and see) him as they read these pages. These studies are for "the family, church, and school." Preachers and hearers are included here, and they will both profit by the publication of these rich volumes.

The Bishop of Calcutta (Dr. Welldon), in I Believe, has written a useful handbook of the Christian religion. He says, in the preface: "It may, perhaps, be described as a companion to the Creed. It is intended so to explain the truths of theology that the young may understand them, and feel them to be reasonable." Young people should derive much assistance from a perusal of this little work. (1s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.)

Louisa Clayton's volume of Gospel Addresses, entitled Heart Lessons, has for some time been out of print. We welcome a second edition, revised, and are sure that many workers will hail the same with satisfaction. The addresses are always simple, and uniformly pointed and directed to the high purpose of soul-enlightenment and blessing. The pages are eminently suited for reading at mothers' meetings and other small gatherings. (2s. Partridge.)

A second edition has been issued of A Gift of Love, a book of daily readings, chosen and arranged by Ros Porter. Here we have a Scripture passage combined with excerpts—as varied in complexion as their divergent origin would lead one to expect—gathered from a wide field of literature, poetical and prose. Love is the note throughout; hence the portions answer to the description of the title-page, "Loving Greetings for 365 Days." (2s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

Connemara, on the Eve of the Twentieth Century, by A. M. Barbour (1s. Partridge), is an account of Christian work among the peasantry of Western Ireland. With another lady (Miss Scoones), the author has for some years laboured in a quiet way among the priest-ridden people of the Sister Isle. The work has been beset with many difficulties; that is a reason why it should go on, and why others, after reading these deeply interesting pages, should "go and do likewise."

Rev. F. C. Spurr has published, through A. H. Stockwell & Co., under the title Jesus is God, a series of lectures demonstrating the Divinity of our Lord (1s. 6d.). They are obviously the fruit of much reading and thought, and take account in some degree of the questions which unbelieving criticism has raised as to the person of our Lord. For those who cannot read an exhaustive treatise on this great theme, such a handy book as this will be welcome. Mr. Spurr's lectures constitute a powerful argument, which will doubtless assist many to witness the Apostolic confession—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

Our National Education, by the Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley, vice-chairman of the London School Board (Nisbet. 2s. 6d.), is a valuable contribution to the discussion of this all-important subject in our national life. The author brings to his task a practical knowledge of the subject, not only in his own land, but abroad also. He deals with the chaos which characterizes much of our present administration, and suggests plans for the unifying and more effective promotion of a truly national education. The contents include chapters on technical, commercial, and secondary, as well as primary education; the British compared with foreign systems; the administration in general and particular; the education and training of teachers, and the outlook. It is an invaluable book for all interested in educational matters.

A new quarterly journal of health and travel, entitled Climate, has made its appearance, edited by Dr. C. F. Harford-Battersby, principal of Livingstone College. It is designed to serve as a medium for the interchange of opinion on health questions by those who have had experience in various parts of the world. Travellers, missionaries, and residents beyond the confines of civilization and its comforts, are sure to find much to help them in these pages. The first number contains articles on life in Asia and Africa, also notes of travel in Labrador. Knowledge and skill command the pages, which promise practical value as well as entertainment for a large class of readers. (6d. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons are rapidly adding to their commercial publications in English and Continental languages. Mention may first be made of The Primer of Bookkeeping and Additional Exercises in the same (6d. each). Then comes Office Routine for Boys and Girls (6d.), and The Office Routine Copy Book (3d.). The World and its Commerce is a capital primer of commercial geography. In French there are Commercial Phrases and Madge's Letters; in German, Commercial Phrases and Grimm's Fairy Tales; in Spanish, Business Letters, Easy Conversational Sentences and Advanced Conversational Exercises (all 6d. each). Larger books, for the acquisition of Spanish, are Practical Spanish Grammar and Spanish Business Interviews (1s. and 1s. 6d.). Penny weekly serials are issued on commercial correspondence in English, French, German and Shorthand, also on Bookkeeping; and on the last-named subject, young clerks will find help in Pitman's Business Transactions (1s.).

The latest issue of THE PHOTO-MINIATURE is devoted to Orthochromatic Photography, and is admirably produced. (6d. nett. Dawbarn & Ward.)

Mr. Reader Harris, Q.C., has written a useful booklet entitled MEN'S SINS, for men only, which may be read to advantage by young men. (1d. H. R. Allenson.)

The WAYSIDE series of Gospel booklets, by James Wharton, are admirably suited for general distribution. (Sixpenny packets of twenty-five. Drummond's Tract Depot, Stirling.)

Mr. J. Forbes Moncrieff has written another booklet on the stage, entitled MORE ABOUT OUR THEATRES. It outlines recent opinion on the subject from a Christian point of view. (1d. London: Kensit; Edinburgh: Stevenson.)

Messrs. S. W. Partridge have issued two children's books which will be very useful in Christian homes. They are entitled COMING TO JESUS and THE GOOD SHEPHERD. (6d. each.) The coloured pictures add to the attractiveness of these books.

A little book having charms of its own, and so got up as to make it welcome to many as a Christmas or New Year "Card," is THOUGHTS IN MANY MINDS ON ANIMAL LIFE. The thoughts have been gathered from a wide reading by H. C. F. There are blank pages for illustrations, or further "thoughts" on the claims of animals and kindred topics. (Women's Printing Society, 66, Whitcomb Street, W.C.)

DONATIONS

Received by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, to Monday, October 30th, 1899.

 Will donors oblige by stating explicitly and fully the titles of the institutions to which they wish their donations to be applied? Further correspondence will thus be obviated.

 Cheques, Money Orders, or Postal Orders should be made payable to Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C., and crossed "London City and Midland Bank, Ltd."; this will effectually prevent loss.

WILL YOU NOT HELP US?

All contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Director—
W. HUGHES, African Institute, Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

"The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts." (Hag. ii .8.) May He provide.

It is with devout thankfulness to God that I am able to announce that the Committee of the Barbican Mission to the Jews has secured an excellent site in the Whitechapel Road for a permanent Mission-House as a Memorial of its first President, the late Prebendary Gordon Calthrop.

We are anxious to build as soon as possible. Will those who honour the memory of our departed brother, and all interested in the spread of the Gospel of Christ among the Jews, kindly assist us with a contribution towards the Building Fund (£3,000 still needed), for the love of God and the sake of His people Israel?

Contributions will be gladly received by me; or they may be sent to the Secretary of the Mission, 262, Commercial Road, E.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY

14, BLOMFIELD STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Now in its second century of work. Distinguished for its Catholic basis, its famous Missionaries (Williams, Moffat, Livingstone, Morrison, Ellis, Gilmour, &c.), its Pioneering successes, its enterprising Native Agents, its self-supporting Churches, its Bible Translation Work, its Contributions to Christian Literature, its Preaching to the Masses, its Women's Work for Women, its Schools and Orphanages, its Training Institutions, its Medical Missionaries, its Hospitals and Dispensaries, and its Leper Asylums.

Funds greatly needed. Special contributions for support of "Own Missionaries," or for Native Helpers, gladly received.

Home Secretary: Rev. Arthur N. Johnson, M.A.

ROYAL NATIONAL MISSION TO DEEP SEA FISHERMEN.

Patron: HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN. This Society carries on Medical Mission Work amongst the Fishermen on the North Sea and other Fishing Grounds, and in Labrador.

HELP EARNESTLY ASKED

Requires £20,000 per annum.

Treasurer: Thomas B. Miller, Esq. (Offices, 181, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.), to whom contributions may be sent; or to the Office of The Christian.

THE MISSIONS TO SEAMEN.

Patron—

Admiral of the Fleet, H.R.H. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, K.G.

Increased funds are urgently needed to meet the expenditure involved by the recent extensions of the operations of the Missions to Seamen to several new Ports, including Calcutta, Wellington, New Zealand, Cape Town Portland, Oregon, and Hamburg, where formerly the crews of British ships were destitute of religious ministrations.

A further extension of the work amongst seagoing men in the great Port of London has recently been made by opening a Seamen's Institute opposite the Board of Trade Shipping Office at the Victoria Docks, whilst many urgent appeals cannot be responded to owing to lack of funds.

The Society maintains 190 Chaplains, Readers, Boatmen, &c., working amongst the shipping and fishing vessels in 70 seaports in every part of the world.

Sixty-nine Mission Steamers, Sailing Vessels, and Boats, and 91 Seamen's Churches and Institutes are in daily use, winter and summer.

Expenditure in 1898—£41,025 11s. 7d.

Annual Subscriptions, Donations, Offertories, Drawing Room Meeting Collections, &c., are earnestly asked for to maintain the existing sailor work, and to extend it to other ports. They should be sent to Commander W. Dawson, R.N., The Missions to Seamen, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

National Protestant League.

At a meeting in Manchester, held under the auspices of the National Protestant League, the Earl of Portsmouth expressed the opinion that a good deal of confusion arose by people not clearly making up their minds as to what is meant by the Church. That went to the bottom and root of the whole matter. What was the Church? Was the Church a national and a Protestant institution, or was it a clerical and a Catholic one? If the Church of England became a free church, she would be able to control her own affairs, like any other free churches; but the great fact of the Reformation was the substitution of civil authority and civil law for ecclesiastical law. The power of the Papacy was not destroyed in order to create a clerical institution above the control of Parliament. He hoped that out of the present movement there might grow an even closer sympathy and connection between all Protestants belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race, whose great aim and object should be, not a Catholic, but a Christian revival.

Mr. J. Mellor, Q.C., M.P.. impressed upon the meeting his belief that the danger to the Church was great and imminent. He pointed to the widespread character of the Romanizing movement in the Church of England, and appealed to any who wished to preserve the Protestant character of the Church's services and doctrines to give more earnest heed to the matter. He looked upon the ritualistic movement as a vast conspiracy. There was no other word by which it could be properly described. There was, it seemed to him, only one remedy for this lawlessness, and that was, that the clergy who deliberately broke the law, having sworn to obey it, should be turned out of the Church, and make room for more sincere and truthful men.

Personalia.

Dr. Newman Hall, we are glad to learn, has recovered from his recent indisposition.

Rev. W. J. Woods, secretary of the Congregational Union, has left London for the south coast, where he will remain until his health improves.

The health of Mrs. Frank Crossley, of the Star Hall, Manchester, has been so unsatisfactory of late, that she is obliged to seek rest. During the recent Convention Mrs. Crossley was too ill to take part in any of the meetings.

Rev. John Bradford, simultaneously with his year of service as president of the London Baptist Association, completes twenty-one years of pastoral work at Leytonstone. A united and hard-working church sets high value upon his devoted labours, and recognized the same by testimonial at the anniversary meeting last week. As pastor and organizer, Mr. Bradford is very popular. During his years of office as president of the London Baptist Association, he has done much to help the churches by friendly advice and other assistance.

Japs in London.—Miss McLean informs us that 300 Japanese men-of-war's men are expected in London next week. She will be glad to receive, by Christmas, cuffs and scarves for the merchant seamen and men of the imperial navy of Japan. Communications may be addressed to Miss McLean at the Japanese Christian Institute, Tilbury Dock, Essex.

East London Home for Blind Children.—The latest report will be received with satisfaction by those whose interest is particularly centred in this branch of philanthropy. Much progress has been made, both as regards education and manual training, and on each Lord's Day religious instruction has been imparted. The inspector's report testifies to the zeal and ability which characterizes the conduct of the school. The Home is at Northumberland House, Lower Clapton Road, N.E., Mr. J. E. Greenhill being hon. secretary and treasurer.

Metropolitan Tabernacle Rebuilding.—Last Thursday there was held in the Lower Hall of the Metropolitan Tabernacle a "thanksgiving rally." Collecting-cards had been issued several months previously, and were now brought in. Following this came a meeting presided over by Pastor Thomas Spurgeon. Each section of the school presented gifts of bank notes in aid of the rebuilding fund. The ladies' working party followed with a cheque for £115, the total gifts for the evening being £443. The secretary's statement showed a further sum of about £5,500 needed for the completion of the building.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Rev. H. G. Daniell Bainbridge, Minor Canon, has been appointed to succeed the late Dr. Troutbeck as Precentor of Westminster Abbey.

Rev. F. Bishop, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Torquay, is delivering a deeply interesting and instructive course of Sunday morning sermons of an anti-sacerdotal character, on such subjects as "Why I am a Protestant"; "Why I am Evangelical"; "Regeneration"; "The Holy Communion: What saith the Scripture?" Torquay is a town in which sacerdotalism exercises considerable influence.

Speaking upon the question of the decoration of St. Paul's Cathedral, at a meeting of the City Corporation, Mr. Morton said a great deal of money spent on the decorations had been wasted on High Church accessories utterly out of place in a Protestant cathedral. Eventually, on the appeal of the Lord Mayor, the letter from the Dean, which had caused the discussion, was referred to the Finance Committee.

Rev. Dr. G. F. Lee, for thirty-three years vicar of All Saints Church, Lambeth, preached his farewell sermon on Sunday evening last. The church is being demolished, as the site is required by the London and South Western Railway for the extension of Waterloo Station. Dr. Lee will be remembered as one of the three Anglican clergymen who are alleged to have obtained Episcopal Orders on the high seas some years ago, and is the reputed head of the "Order of Corporate Reunion."

Congregational.

Rev. Albert Swift, late of New York, will begin his ministry at Dulwich Grove Church, London, on November 5.

Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson has attended the meetings in Paris of the Evangelical Union of France, as delegate from the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

The movement in connection with the Twentieth Century Fund continues to make good progress. The following sums have been already promised:—London, £100,000; Yorkshire, £100,000; Manchester, £50,000; Bristol, £30,000; Birmingham, £25,000.

Balham Church (Rev. E. Griffith-Jones) agreed to raise a thousand guineas in connection with the Twentieth Century Fund. A third of the amount will be given to the Central Fund, and the remainder devoted to clearance of debt and completion of the organ.

In connection with the Century Fund, special efforts are to be made on Thanksgiving Day—Sunday, November 5. Rev. Stanley Rogers, hon. sec. of the Young People's branch, has prepared an address for young people, which is intended to suggest to speakers the topics on which they should touch.

The thirty-fourth anniversary of Rev. R. Allen Davies's pastorate at Ventnor, and the fortieth of his ministry, has been celebrated. Rev. W. L. Watkinson, ex-president of the Wesleyan Conference, formerly a neighbour of Mr. Davies's at Smethwick, preached on the Sunday, and gave an address on the Monday evening. On the latter occasion, Mr. T. Hankinson, J.P., presided, and addresses were delivered by Revs. H. Coley, J. Dymond, and the pastor. The congregations were very large, and the interest evinced by the people and friends was of a hearty character.

On October 26 a valedictory service was held at Emmanuel Church, Tunbridge Wells, to bid God-speed to Rev. W. Groves, M.A., who is sailing for the West Coast of Africa, to take charge of the churches in Sierra Leone, Freetown, and district belonging to the Mission of the Countess of Huntingdon's connection. On the death of the late superintendent, Rev. Trotter Williams, a native pastor, it was felt that it would be for the better conduct of the work in Africa that a white superintendent should be given the oversight of the native churches, which now number thirteen, with six Sunday schools, ten day schools, and 2,500 members. Among the ministers present were Revs. J. B. Figgis, J. Calvert (Margate), Eynon Davis, and W. H. C. Palmer, and many lay helpers from various churches. Rev. J. Calvert gave the address, and Rev. Dr. Barnes spoke to those "who tarried at home with the stuff." Rev. J. B. Figgis offered up the valedictory prayer.

Baptist.

Of the £7,000 which the Baptist Union of Ireland propose to raise as a Twentieth Century Fund, over £5,100 has already been secured.

Rev. T. J. Stockley, late of Ceylon, has accepted a unanimous call to the church at Finchley Lane, Hendon, and is to commence his ministry there on Sunday, December 3.

Enthusiastic gatherings in support of the Twentieth Century Fund have been held at Newcastle-on-Tyne. Dr. Clifford preached, in Brunswick Wesleyan Chapel, to a large congregation; and, with Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, spoke at an evening gathering at Rye Hill Chapel. Contingents were present from Tyneside and Sunderland churches.

When Rev. Dr. Booth resigned the secretariat of the Baptist Union, he continued to act as secretary of the War Trust, a position he has held for twenty-five years; but now his health is such that even this position has had to be given up, and his fellow-trustees have reluctantly accepted his resignation.

The half-yearly gatherings of the Home Counties Baptist Association have been held at Queen's Road Chapel, Wimbledon. The first day was set apart as a "quiet day" for ministers. At a subsequent gathering Rev. Archibald G. Brown preached a helpful sermon on 1 Peter iv. 2, "The rest of your time" (R.V.). At the tea-table Pastor Thomas Spurgeon gave an informal address.

A great meeting of London Baptists was held on Tuesday, last week, at St. James's Hall, when addresses were delivered by Sir Hugh Gilzean Reid (who presided), Dr. Clifford, and Revs. E. G. Gange and J. G. Greenhough. A main object of the gathering, which was convened by the London Baptist Association, was to encourage church members to face the duties and privileges of Christian life and testimony at the dawn of the new century. The needs of the Metropolis were specially urged upon attention.

Methodist.

Leeds Free Methodist Council at its quarterly meeting arranged for a great demonstration in aid of the Twentieth Century Fund in November.

A brewery company is desirous of acquiring Daniel Street Wesleyan Chapel and Schools, Portsmouth. It already has possession of the adjacent property, and seeks extension. Strong opposition is offered on the part of the resident trustees to the offer.

Mr. George Summers, Wesleyan District Evangelist, has conducted special gatherings at Chester-le-Street. The congregations increased as the mission went on. Whole families professed conversion. The evangelist's singing of Sankey's hymns had a powerful effect.

Paddington Wesleyan Circuit is endeavouring to provide a new church for Kensal Rise. The necessity for the new church is twofold—the overcrowded, badly-ventilated iron-room which has served as a church for ten years, and the rapidly-growing neighbourhood in which the new building is to be situated.

With a view to increasing the culture and efficiency of Primitive Methodist local preachers, Mrs. W. P. Hartley's (Liverpool) offer of £1,000 to aid in the formation of circuit libraries has been increased to £1,255, by which 251 British circuits out of 661 will receive £5 worth of books on condition they also provide another £5 worth from their own local resources.

At a meeting of the Liverpool Wesleyan Council, Rev. C. Garrett presiding, it was decided that the needs of Liverpool Methodism urgently require (1) the creation of an extension Fund; (2) a fund for the strengthening and extending of the work of the present Liverpool Mission; (3) the provision of a large central hall, to seat about 2,500 persons, with classrooms and offices suitable for the work of an evangelistic mission, and for large district and local gatherings.

Mr. J. M. Weston, hon. superintendent, writes on behalf of Grove Wesleyan Mission, Great Guildford Street, Southwark. The work, which has been carried on by voluntary workers for the past sixty-one years, covers a great part of Southwark, known as "the poorest parish in London." The calling-out of the Reservists and Militia causes a severe strain upon the funds, for many of those called out are the sole support of widowed mothers, while others have wives and families to maintain.

Within the past six months, £100,000 has actually been remitted to the Wesleyan Century Fund, the inflow of contributions being steady and likely to increase in volume. It is hoped that by the time the Wesleyan Conference meets next summer £700,000 will be in hand. No distribution takes place until the beginning of the twentieth century, and in leading Wesleyan circles in London there is a concensus of opinion that, by the time mentioned, the one million guineas will have been promised, if not actually paid. The interest on the large amount banked is expected to more than cover the expenses incurred in working the scheme.

The Quiet Day for the deepening of the spiritual life, held in St. James's Hall, was largely attended. The weather was most disagreeable, a heavy fog prevailing. Preb. Webb-Peploe's address was an exposition, theological and practical, of the words, "Let the peace of God rule in your hearts." Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, in the course of a forcible address, said that keeping in mind the personality of the devil, believers would be better able to distinguish between temptation and sin, and would be saved from being surprised by temptation. Rev. H. Price Hughes gave the closing address.

Presbyterian.

In connection with the Conference of Northern Presbyteries of the United Presbyterian Church, a meeting was recently held in the Institute Hall, Bailie Lawrence presiding. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Mr. Stirling, Kaffraria; and Rev. Dr. Smith, Broughton Place, Edinburgh, who spoke on "Some reasons for enthusiasm about union."

Dr. Thoburn McGaw has received the sum of £1,000 from a generous friend, as a donation to the fund for building a new church at Milfield, Sunderland. The donor attaches no conditions to his gift except (1) that a contract for the building of the church shall be entered into within the next twelve months, and shall be proceeded with in the usual way; and (2) that the committee shall make no effort to discover his name.

A two days' conference, arranged by the Church of Scotland, has been held in Inverness. It was the outcome of a proposal made by the Home Mission, Christian Life and Work, and Highland Committees, and cordially approved by the General Assembly. At the opening service, which was largely attended, Rev. Dr. Pagan preached from "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord," and gave an instructive address.

Principal Hutton, in opening the session of the U.P. Theological Hall, Edinburgh, pointed out that ecclesiastical union was useless without a deeper and inward unity of the Christian spirit, and declared that the leading barriers to co-operative, and still more to incorporate Christian unity, were those erected by priesthood and sacerdotal claims and practice, of which Romanism was the chief source and example, followed by an imitative Anglicanism.

Society of Friends.

William Hobson has just held a fortnight's mission at Close House. Nearly all the meetings were well attended. At the First-day evening lantern service the doors had to be closed, with large crowds left outside, the hall being already packed to excess. Several have professed to have given their hearts to God.

In connection with the Adult School, Northampton, Edward R. Vardon gave a lecture on "China" in the meeting-house, illustrated by lantern views. The address was listened to with marked attention, and was followed by an earnest appeal from Margaret Vardon to obey the Divine requiring, whether it may lead into missionary labour abroad or missionary-helping work at home.

Fallen Asleep.

Very suddenly, at Norton Lees Vicarage, Derbyshire, Rev. William Mercer, vicar of the parish, and eldest son of the late Rev. William Mercer, vicar of St. George's, Sheffield.—Rev. D. A. Russell, senior minister of the Second Presbyterian Church, Strabane, aged seventy-five years.—At Edenderry, co. Down., Mr. Alex. Teggart, aged ninety-two years.—At Ballee, co. Down, Rev. J. M. Fallon, M.A., aged eighty-seven years, and for fifty-three years rector of the parish of Ballee.—Sharnbrook Baptist Church, Beds., has lost a useful member by the death of Mr. John Dickens, at the age of sixty-eight. He attended the Sunday School as scholar or teacher nearly all his life; he was also organist and a temperance worker.—In the passing away, at the age of eighty-four, of Elizabeth Robinson, of the Society of Friends, wife of Wilson Robinson, of Whinfell Hall, a large circle mourn the loss of a genial and loving presence.—Rev. Alfred Rollason, after a long and painful illness, has died at Cambridge, whither he removed last year on his resignation of the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Saffron Walden. He had been twenty-seven years in the ministry.—Mr. Thomas Barter, for more than fifty years deacon of Arthur Street Baptist Church, King's Cross. His life was marked by consistency and devotion.

Notes & Comments

WE would draw the special attention of Protestant parents who are disposed to send their children to "convent schools" to the article upon that subject to be found on page 20. What is true in Canada is equally so in our own land, and Rome has very few methods more subtle than this to sow her idolatrous seed in the minds and hearts of young girls at their most impressionable age. As for her assurances of "not proselytizing," experience has proved that they are not worth the paper they are written on.

The reverses to our arms in Natal, deplorable and painful as they are, are having one salutary effect. While they deepen the determination of the nation to "see this thing through," in Lord Rosebery's words, the dreadful slaughter that is going on is so sad a revelation of the horrors of civilized warfare that a reaction of feeling must soon pass through the heart of the people at large. The desolate homes, the sorrow and mourning that have already fallen upon thousands, the certainty that here and there all over the land there are hearts stricken even unto death by the daily tragedies that are being enacted so far away, are an awful sequel to the cheers that started our troops on their way to wounds and death. This generation has seen nothing so humiliating as this vision of two Christian nations locked in a death-grip within a few months of the Parliament of Peace, from which so much was expected, but which has turned out so fruitless. The lesson is likely to be written very deeply in blood before we have done.

Is there not a call on our Churches to do something more than read the newspapers in view of the terrible war with the Transvaal? Our record may be, and doubtless is, much cleaner in South Africa than that of the Boer Government; but there is still abundance of ground for humiliation before God for the sins we have committed there as a nation. And how is the nation to keep from becoming a prey to the war-fever unless God's people do all in their power to restrain and uplift public opinion? Unless there is a strong curbing influence, this war will do untold mischief by stiffening this martial sentiment of the race; and so of Europe, for this is a passion that feeds on defeat as much as victory, and turns everything only too readily into fuel for its own inordinate pride and vainglory. It should be the earnest desire of the churches to redouble their efforts to allay passions, discountenance the spirit of revenge, and prepare for a national temper in which it shall be possible to provide for a just, merciful, and permanent peace.

The attitude taken by the leading Papal journal, the Osservatore Romano, during the present unfortunate war, deserves to be carefully noted. Before the outbreak of hostilities, the paper in question suggested that a war doubtless would be providential, and the defeat of England even more so, as such a result would simply mean "the total destruction of Protestantism." More recently, the British mishap at Ladysmith has evoked expressions of satisfaction and delight. There can be little doubt that this is the outcome of the same spirit at the Vatican, as that which made Rome the foremost of England's foes in the latter half of the sixteenth century, and which rendered it so difficult for a Romanist to reconcile Catholicism with loyalty to his Queen, or devotion to his country.

The significance of the Roman rejoicing lies in the fact that the Boers are so strongly Protestant that no Romanist can hold office under their government! The Vatican authorities, however, hate us so much that they are glad at any trouble that may afflict us, whencesoever it may arise. All this should quicken the faculty of self-examination in us as a nation, and make us see to it that our own house is set in order, and our policy righteous, and, at the same time, friendly towards all. The fact that the British Empire stands for civil and religious freedom all over the world accounts largely for the harvest of hatred we are reaping in some directions. Our passion for extending the Empire is responsible for a great deal more.

Everything relating to the condition of our army is of supreme interest to the nation just now, and Mr. Ritchie's recent speech as to the progress of temperance among our soldiers will be read with appreciation. He said that nowhere had the movement advanced as it had in the Army, and he drew the conclusion that the physical courage now shown by our soldiers must be but one side of another and higher quality they were showing—moral courage. Some years ago, it required a great deal of pluck in a young recruit to confess himself an abstainer; now it is much easier, though pluck is still wanted on occasion to say no to an importunate friend. Great credit is due to those who, both within and without the ranks of the Army, are responsible for this great reformation. Some of our leading commanders have greatly helped by their action in refusing to allow stimulants to be included in the military stores when on active service.

Dr. Edghill, Chaplain-general of the Forces, who knows the dangers and temptations of the men in the army, recently reminded some of them that it would be worse to have a brigade missing in India from a disease caused by men's sins than it would be to have a brigade missing by war. He protested against the view that, when a soldier was placed amid temptations, they had no right to expect him to live a pure life, that God had made a mistake with regard to him, and that what they had to do was to regulate vice in the best possible way; he objected to those who said it was no use living in a fool's paradise—things must be taken as they are. Against that "devilish lie" he protested with all his soul.

It was not necessary for men to sin, it was not necessary for them to lose self-control, and to sink to the level of beasts that perish, for they had proved by soldier saints, in every age and every congregation, the devil was a liar, as he was from the beginning. But they did not despair.

It is significant that, while all references to the question of reunion between the Anglican and Free Churches were received with marked coldness at the recent Church Congress, a correspondence has been proceeding between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Œcumenical Patriarch in Constantinople re a rapprochement between the Greek Church and the Anglican Communion. The organ of the former Church states that there exists an agreement between the two prelates to do all in their power to create a better understanding between their churches by supplying information as to their respective movements, and by clearing up difficulties arising out of their respective antecedents. The Church Times, so bitter towards Nonconformists, speaks of the prayerful interest felt by its supporters in this endeavour to come to an understanding with the Greek Church.

The gravity of this position can only be realized when the particular tenets of the Greek Church are borne in mind. Having almost everything in common with Romanism in its sacramental theory and its ecclesiastical machinery, it goes considerably further in the practice of image-worship, and is shamefully neglectful of the intelligence and education of its poor. It is, further, a persecuting Church of the most virulent type, as is seen in the recent treatment of the Stundists and the Doukhobortsi by the Russian Patriarch; and it is as greedy of political power as is the Vatican itself. While our "national" Church is becoming more and more alienated from the Free Churches of this country, our Primate is engaged in strengthening its relations with this superstitious, persecuting body in the East! It is well to keep this fact in mind, in view of the frequent remarks in the Anglican papers, that the crisis in the Church is over.

The House of Lords has once more put a Parliamentary veto on the erection of Cromwell's statue given by Lord Rosebery to the nation. The vote was an extraordinary one, the numbers being six to four, which, of course, takes all significance out of it for reasonable people. In view of this fact, the following tribute paid by Mr. John Morley to Cromwell, in the biography of that great man which commences in the November Century Magazine, is of great interest, coming from a source which cannot be described as extravagantly religious:—

It is hard to deny that wherever force was useless Cromwell failed; or that his example would often lead in what modern opinion firmly judges to be false directions; or that it is in Milton and Bunyan, rather than in Cromwell, that we seek what was deepest, loftiest, and most abiding in Puritanism: we look to its apostles rather than its soldier. Yet Oliver's largeness of aim, his freedom of spirit, and that energy that comes of a free spirit; the presence of a burning light in his mind, though the light to our later times may have grown dim; his good faith, his valour, his constancy, have stamped his name, in spite of some exasperated facts that it is pure sophistry to justify, upon the imagination of men over all the vast area of the civilized world where the English tongue prevails.

Recently, at the opening of a central library at Hornsey, the Lord Chancellor spoke wisely in deprecation of the taste and tone of a section of the literature with which the country is flooded, and, in view of this, we may express regret that many of our religious magazines and weeklies give such prominence to fiction, a number of them certainly pandering to, instead of endeavouring to purify and improve, the degenerate taste of to-day. Lord Halsbury also referred in scathing words to many plays now in vogue, as tainted with what he termed "the spirit of those fools who make a mock of sin." "If some of the plays now before the public were permitted," he went on to say, "it was difficult to imagine any that could not be played."

In such circumstances, we share the Lord Chancellor's doubt as to the value of a censor; for it would appear, from the results, that the censorship is confined to the actual wording rather than to the teaching and general tendency of a play. Hence our worst plays do not offend in expression, but in effect, just as some of our most pernicious fiction is almost classical in language, and insidiously corrupt in spirit and result.

The question naturally arises, how can Mr. St. George Mivart and others of his mental grasp, who have taken part in The Times correspondence, or have sympathized with it, remain within the fold of Rome? The utter stultification required from every "good Catholic" has recently again been defined by the Pope, in his address to a batch of English and Irish pilgrims, as "that docility which, devoid of preconceived notions, impassioned judgments, or rash expressions of opinion, is fully owing to him who holds the supreme magistracy and Divine mandate to govern the Church." How far this "docility" must be from the attitude in which Mr. St. George Mivart prophesies "the probable result that other millions of Catholics will, one by one, abandon Catholicity!"

A very striking and painful illustration of the unhappy conditions under which a large proportion of the population of London and other large cities lives was given in the evidence at one of the police courts during the hearing of a charge of murder a few days ago, when it was stated that the accused, sixty-one years of age, occupied one room with his wife, two girls, aged respectively thirteen and seven years, and a son aged twenty-two, the chamber being only twelve feet square. This, too, was in a district of the Metropolis which is not usually considered as an overcrowded one. Such facts speak for themselves in their direct bearing upon questions of religion and morality.

Temperance reformers have frequently just cause to complain of the treatment their memorials and protests receive at the hands of magistrates; especially are they justified in resenting the way in which Quarter Sessions will upset, in the interests of "the trade," the decisions come to by licensing sessions to close public-houses. Men who know are overruled by men who do not know. Happily this is not always the case. Thus the Quarter Sessions recently held at Winchester sustained the decision of the Aldershot magistrates to take away the licence from a notorious public-house, a licence worth as much as £4,000. The law might, no doubt, be improved in some respects; but, even as it stands, it is capable of a great deal of good. And if magistrates are often slow to act, yet the Aldershot case proves that sometimes they will act very effectually.

The manner in which Max Nordau advises young Americans who wish to become millionaires, reminds us of the irony of Elijah and the satire of Bunyan, when he describes the man with the muck-rake, raking up straws and rubbish, all oblivious of the crown above his head, but which might be on his brow.

The man who wants to become a millionaire must have no other ambition. He must hold exclusively to the one single idea. He must not dream nor give wings to his power of imagination, nor lift his eye to high ideals. He must tread along with head bowed to the earth, and step by step he must carefully feel his way, weathering storms and climbing obstacles. He must possess the instinct of a beast of prey—nothing higher.

Even any worldly man, who has eyes to see facts, can discern the emptiness of mere material possessions and pleasures, and, if he has literary ability, can satirize the folly of seeking such things; but we have never known much, if any, good come from his work. No; the soul must be offered, and must accept, a positive good before it will surrender a deluding pleasure.

It would be a good thing if some writers of novels, who picture an evil career in a young person followed by a comfortable old age, would take to heart the story the late Miss Florence Marryat told of her father, Captain Marryat. She said he much regretted in after years the "fast tone" of his first novel, "Frank Mildmay," produced when he was under twenty-one, and sorrowed that he had written it. It will never be estimated and told how much evil has been done by writers making sin attractive and remunerative. "The tone" enters into the minds of young persons unconsciously, and influences all their thought and life. Captain Marryat wisely and pathetically said, the night before he died, "Christianity must be implanted in the breast of youth; there must be a bias towards it given at an early age. It is now half-past nine. World, adieu!" Happy are the parents, the teachers, the writers, who impart that bias.

"If everybody went to church," what then would happen? inquires The Quiver. That twenty-five millions of persons would be crowded out, there being not accommodation enough for them. But the question is useless, because "everybody" cannot go, were they ever so willing. Babies and their nurses, very young children, the aged and infirm, sufferers from disease, doctors and nurses, and all who attend to the necessary wants of a household, or of the community generally, cannot go to church. The question is—How many ought to go? And of that number, how many fail to go? and why do they fail? It is said that not so many as 10 per cent. go, whether you take the metropolis or our large provincial towns; and this is at least from 40 to 45 per cent. below what it ought to be. How are we to get at this non-church-going population? The answers, we believe, are manifold; but they all are blocked by a previous question. Do the Churches really want all these people? Would they welcome them if they came? Are they adapted to their needs?

The Professor of Biblical Criticism in Aberdeen University seems to us to have taken up a sound position in his introductory letter on "The Position and Prospects of Biblical Science." He thinks the Higher Criticism has fallen under suspicion because it has largely become identified with the negative theories which are dominated by purely naturalistic presuppositions. This is not surprising, for, if the Book is relieved as much as possible of the Divine in its make and composition, the same process will be applied to every event it records. Professor Nicol thinks it remarkable that no discovery of archæology has yet been made which is inconsistent with the Biblical record, and in proportion to the correspondence of the sacred narrative with the conditions of the age as elucidated by archæology, the greater the improbability that it could be assigned to a date long subsequent to the events it professes to relate. The materials for a restatement of the historical argument are rapidly augmenting.

Although there has been so much valuable legislation affecting child-life during the present reign; 111 Acts having been passed since 1837, as compared with only ten prior to that date, very much remains to be done in regard to the amelioration of the social condition of children. In some respects other countries have led the way in the direction in which it is very desirable we should go, and the United States laws, prohibiting the admission of children to drinking saloons, and the sale of drink to children under sixteen, and their admission, without guardians, to theatres and other places of amusement of the kind, might, with great advantage, be adopted in Great Britain. A crusade in this direction certainly would be of incalculable benefit if it resulted in direct prohibitive legislation of the kind.

Some remarks of Bishop Potter, of New York, on the decline of home life in the United States, and the disastrous results in the national character which may be looked for in consequence, may well be considered in this country also. He puts the evil down mainly to two causes—first, the facility of divorce which exists in so many of the States, which, of course, is the ruin of the home idea; and secondly, the increasing tendency of families to live in hotels, which necessitates the sending of the children away to the country in a separate establishment, or to a boarding school. It is well known that the greatest nations have derived their vigour from the sacredness in which home-life was invested among them; this is specially true by the Romans and the Jews; and it is just as true of the vigorous and progressive nations of to-day. It would be well for us to learn the lesson, by retaining the sanctity of the marriage-tie unimpaired, and by fostering the home-feeling among the rising generation as much as possible.

Dr. Pentecost calls attention to the contrast between the free expenditure of men and money for what are called "imperial objects," and the small expenditure of both for the extension of our Saviour's kingdom. He points to the readiness with which the Americans sacrificed in one year 10,000 of the best, bravest, and most precious young lives of the country to free a million and a half of Cubans, and possibly 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 of Filipinos, whereas the Church maintains only a thin line of missionary pickets, not enough even to explore the heathen field. For the sake of an "imperial idea," which seems generally to be a business idea, we pour thousands of troops into heathen lands, and commerce sends its hosts of agents to search for silver and gold. Truly the contrast between the activity of the Church and the world in the regions beyond is very startling. But does it not show how imperfectly evangelised are the regions at home? The great difficulty is to bring the men and women and children who are at our very doors under the influence of the Gospel. Were Great Britain herself quickened in her deepest heart by the power of Christ, and were America also, then the ingathering of the nations would be rapid.

Points of a Good Pastor.

By Rev. T. L. CUYLER, D.D.

PROBABLY I can indicate these points more clearly if I put them in the form of a short epistle to a young minister, and some older ministers may profit by these plain, practical suggestions :—

I assume that you realize intensely that the work you have undertaken is immeasurably the highest calling this side of heaven. Your business is not to earn a living, or gratify an intellectual taste, or simply to study God's Word and prepare the best sermons you can produce. Your object is to awaken the careless, to instruct the ignorant, to comfort the afflicted, to edify believers, to make bad people good, and good people better. This blessed, heaven-appointed work will cover seven days in every week, out of the pulpit as well as in the pulpit, and unless you are a thorough pastor, you are likely to turn out a failure.

1. To be such a pastor and such a soul-winner, the first point is to have in the core of your heart a supreme love for your Master, a love for your work, and a love for the souls committed to you. The moment that your love-labour sinks into an irksome drudgery, you are shorn of your locks, and had better resign.

THOROUGH PASTORAL OCCUPATION

is no pastime for tea-table gossiping, or game-playing with the young folks. It will consume several hours each day; it will tax your patience, and will often put a severe strain on your nerves. Henry Ward Beecher once said to me: "I envy you your love for pastoral duties. It costs me more consumption of nerve force to spend an hour with a family in trouble than to prepare a whole sermon." It is our business to bear our people's burdens. Paul must have been a great pastor, as well as a great preacher, or else he would never have dared to write to his Thessalonian converts: "We were gentle in the midst of you as when a nurse cherisheth her own children; even so, being affectionately desirous of you, we were well pleased to impart unto you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because you were become very dear to us." The love that beareth all things is the first essential of a good pastor.

2. You have got to study your people just as carefully and intently as you study any book in your library—not excepting God's own book. Wordsworth's intimate intercourse with his mountains made him the sovereign poet of nature. Lifeless books are dry provender after all; your heart will need to be vitalized by constant contact with living persons. Books teach certain truths in the abstract; your people and neighbours can teach you many more

TRUTHS IN THE CONCRETE.

Some of the best sermons you preach will be those which your congregation will help you to prepare. As the prime object of your preaching will be its influence on the souls of your auditors, your chief opportunity to discover what influence it is exerting will be when visiting them through the week. It must be feeble spiritual gunnery which leaves no echo after the church doors are shut up; and if the truths are well aimed, you will find where the shots have struck by going among your people. I fear that we ministers often incur a deep guiltiness before God from not following up our Gospel warnings and invitations more closely.

3. In all your intercourse with your flock and with those outside of your flock, be a thorough democrat. The Lord's ambassador must never be a "respecter of persons." More than one minister has sadly damaged, and even destroyed, his usefulness, by toadying to the rich and the aristocratic, or by allowing himself to be regarded as the property of one or more of the influential men in the congregation. Be no man's man! Whomsoever you neglect, be sure never to neglect the poor, the unfortunate, and those who have few friends. Do not fail to remember where poor old Father A. lives, or blind Mother B., or forlorn Widow C., or bed-ridden Brother D. You will find the footprints of your Master on the doorsteps of such humble abodes. It is an invalid excuse of some pastors that they have and no knack of recognising individuals. Keep a list of everybody's residence, and study faces so that you cannot forget them. The unpardonable sin with most people is to be forgotten or to be snubbed. A pastor ought to be the most Christian gentleman in his parish; and if you do not win people to yourself, you are not likely to win them to Christ.

4. Tact is a very important point in the making of a successful pastor. For want of it, some brilliant talents have come to nought. Next to the gift of grace, my brother, seek the gift of "gumption." You will have to deal with some very disagreeable people; to them be all the more agreeable. You will encounter some crotchety parishioners; study their crotchets, and do not be baulked by them. In my first charge, the most troublesome character was a venerable and godly-minded, but most obstinate and quick-tempered, church elder. After he had aroused the whole congregation by a peculiarly irritating performance, I called on him, and when he looked for a lashing, I surprised him with such a sweet love-talk that the old man melted like wax in the flame, and he never gave me the slightest trouble afterwards. You may often fend off a church quarrel, and quench a mischief-maker, by the exercise of timely and patient tact.

5. If courtesy and tact are important points with a pastor, you will often find that courage is quite as important. It is a woful mistake to suppose that a minister wins popular favour by concealing truth, by compromise with error, to every breeze. Your people will admire courage. Let them see that God is the only being of whom you are afraid. Deal faithfully with all sinners, and do it with love. If you have grappled your flock to you, they will stand any amount of plain, pungent truth without flinching. Conscience will often require you to be unsparing in exposing sin and rebuking wrong; you must not flinch.

6. These are some of the strong points of every pastor who makes himself approved as a good workman, and a successful soul-winner. Do not minimize this last word—it touches the core. You are set to be a watchman for souls. No erudition, no pulpit brilliancy, can compensate for lack of conversions, and a low state of spiritual health in a church. Watch for the Holy Spirit; work with the Holy Spirit. Keep your door always open for inquirers, and be glad to be interrupted by any one who is seeking light, or comfort, or personal salvation. When you detect symptoms of the Spirit's presence, then call your officers together for special prayer and special work. Never defend your Bible; preach it boldly in love, the whole of it; God's Word is its own vindication. The strongest of all strong points is to have Jesus Christ in your own soul, and Jesus Christ with you in your pulpit, and Jesus Christ beside you at every step of your untiring round of labour among the souls entrusted to your charge.

The War in South Africa.

THERE is not a doubt that God is dealing with the Europeans and natives in South Africa in a very special way at this time. Advices to hand give details of a mission held in one of the villages in the Colony by members of the South Africa General Mission.

Mr. Gale, writing from Swaziland, mentions one of the girls at a kraal near by having given herself to God, and having put on European dress. She needs our prayers, for we gather that the other natives are threatening to tear her clothes off. A girl belonging to another kraal has professed conversion, which has led to her friends deciding to send her right away.

Friends who will have been watching Swaziland with special interest, and the prospects of the work in those parts, should know that it has been deemed the wisest and best plan for all the S.A.G.M. missionaries there to go to Durban, as there was a possibility of the natives rising. The workers situated in the Majuba district, i.e., Ingogo, have also had to retire on Durban.

Several of our workers in Johannesburg applied for permits from the Hon. F. H. Reitz, State Secretary at Pretoria, which would enable them to remain in that town, on the understanding that they were workers representing the South Africa General Mission, which has for its object the spiritual and social well-being of all classes of the community, irrespective of nationality or sect. These, however, were not granted, owing to the fact that our workers had taken part in relief operations.

We hear that most of the shops are entirely closed, the fronts being strongly barricaded up, but that the door of our S.A.G.M. book room is allowed to remain open and Testaments, which are in great demand for those going to the front. The police were all going to the seat of war, quite a number of the Dutch having called at the mission premises to say good-bye before their departure. A Dutch girl of about twenty was found crying in the streets the other day, and it was ascertained that her brothers had been commandeered, and that she was left without home or friends. The Mission took her in to care for.

It goes without saying that this is a wonderful opportunity for work amongst soldiers in connection with our Soldiers' Homes in South Africa. A number of the Munster Fusiliers who had lately arrived in Cape Town from Fermoy, co. Cork, were attending the meetings of our Soldiers' Home in Cape Town. One of our workers, writing from Cape Town, gives a few particulars of a Sunday spent at the docks and of a granted in an unexpected way. The ss. Gaul had arrived with 1,000 men of the Northumberland Fusiliers, the Fighting Fifth, on board. Two meetings were held for them on the Sunday, in the morning and evening. They were not allowed to go beyond the immediate vicinity of the vessel, so a very fair number came round and listened. A note was written to their colonel—Col. Money—and he kindly put the little S.A.G.M. Sailors' Rest in bounds for them, so that a few came over in the afternoon to read and write, including one of the sergeants, who is a Christian man.

In the evening the men were confined to the ship after 6.30, and the workers went alongside of the vessel, having a meeting on the quay. As our workers left, the Christian men, who were together, started "When the roll is called up yonder, I'll be there," all our helpers joining in.

As many of the missionaries will have come down from up-country, there will be abundant opportunities now for working amongst the large number of regiments which are daily arriving. We would ask prayer that there may be much blessing attending all these special meetings. In Natal Mr. Smyth, whose whole life is given over to the work amongst the soldiers in that colony, is at present labouring in the different camps.

The Shepherd of Israel.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

Zechariah xi. 1-17; xiii. 5-9.

(Concluded.)

THAT sword at the gate of Eden, had turned every way to guard the way of the Tree of Life; had threatened to pursue the transgressing pair, with its relentless edge. It was the sword of justice, the two-edged sword of the Word of God, which avenges disobedience with death. For 4,000 years it had slept in its scabbard, pacified, if we may say so, by the Divine assurance that the mercy shown to men would be reconciled with the due acknowledgment of the righteous demands of a broken law. But it could not sleep for ever. God's promise must be redeemed, and his guarantee made good; and so, in the fulness of the time, Jesus was set orth as a propitiation, showing the Divine righteousness in passing over sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God, and enabling God Himself to be just and the Justifier of those that have faith in Jesus.

When our Lord was arrested in the garden, condemned by his judges, and, finally, nailed to the cross; when his heart broke with uncontrollable and unfathomed grief; when the soldier took a spear and pierced his side—simultaneously with these outward scenes, there was the awakening of the sword of Divine justice, which pierced and laid bare his heart. "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with his stripes we are healed." We cannot penetrate the deep mystery which veils the cross, or understand how the suffering of the Shepherd could be counted as equivalent to our bearing the results of our sins. It is difficult to comprehend the

from a sinful race to the sinless Substitute. But it is impossible to read the inspired statements that describe the death of Christ without realizing that, in some way, which we shall, perhaps, understand in heaven, He met and satisfied the claims of violated law, so that it can ask no more. The quotation of this verse by our Lord Himself on the threshold of Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 31) indicates, with unerring precision, its reference and fulfilment; and we believe that because the sword was plunged in his heart, it will sleep for ever. The law is magnified and honoured, as it could not be by the destruction of a race. However much we prize the death of Christ, our Lord, as an example of patience and self-sacrifice, we must never forget that He did for us what we never could have done for ourselves in magnifying, satisfying, and honouring the CLAIMS OF THE DIVINE LAW.

It is interesting to notice how our Lord quotes this summons to the sword. The Prophet hears it addressed directly by the lips of God, "Awake, O sword, against my Fellow;" but in the thought of Jesus, it was not a dumb and impersonal agent merely, with power of automatic or self-prompted action, but an instrument in the hand of God. In his lips the quotation stands: "I will smite the Shepherd." With Him there was no vague abstraction or impersonality. It was not an attitude or quality of the Divine nature, such as justice or righteousness, that drew the sword from its scabbard, and plunged it in his heart. He even refused to recognise Judas, Caiaphas, or Pilate. Passing by all these secondary causes, He realized that the cup was mixed, the death of the cross arranged, and the sword wielded by his Father. Thus it was He bore his unutterable woe with yielded will and acquiescing heart.

In this, O child of God, learn a life lesson. In all anxieties, in troubles that men may cause to thee, refuse to consider thyself a prey of their wild will, as though thou wert a storm-driven leaf, bu tdare to believe that what God permits to come is his appointment, and that amid all the plottings and machinations of human malice runs a Divine purpose.

The infinite meaning and value of the death of the cross are indicated by the THREE SIGNIFICANT APPELLATIONS with which the Sufferer is addressed.

My Shepherd. Mark that emphatic My. It is as though Jehovah would contrast the Shepherd of his choosing with those that had been selected by human caprice. His Davids against the people's Sauls. From out of the family of man, God has drawn, and is drawing, certain who are to his Son, wrought in them by his Holy Spirit, and these are accounted his flock, and are entrusted to his pastoral care. They were the Father's; but the Father has made them over to the Son, according to Christ's own words: "Thine they were, and Thou gavest them Me, and they have known surely that Thou didst send Me." Distinguished from the rest of men, because they hear the Shepherd's voice, know, and follow Him, these enjoy immediately and intimately his pastoral care. He guides them over the wolds of time, feeding them on the green pastures, and beside the still waters, conducting them through darksome gorges and dangerous glens, defending them from lion and bear with rod and staff, and even in the realms of glory not ceasing to be their Shepherd.

This thought for the sheep committed to his custody possessed the mind of the Great Shepherd on the night in which He was betrayed, when He went forth to meet Judas and the arresting band. Placing Himself between them and the frightened little group that cowered behind Him, He said, "If ye seek Me, let these go their way." If He had been a hireling, when He saw the wolf coming, He would have fled; but because He was God's Shepherd, He stood between his own and peril, as He always will do in every dark hour that may menace us between this and the SAFETY OF THE GATES OF PEARL.

We have a strong claim on Jesus, because He is God's Shepherd, the representative of the Divine care, the custodian of the Divine honour. In every prayer for help, we may remind Him that He stands to us as the Gift and Sponsor of the Divine faithfulness. He must be to us all that God Himself would be.

My Fellow. When our Lord quoted this text in the upper room, as He rose to leave it, He stopped before He reached these words. But the omission was not due to any hesitation on his part to appropriate them. He knew that He was Jehovah's Fellow, else He would never have included the Father with Himself in the significant pronoun, We. "We will come, and make our abode with him." He counted not equality with God a prize to be grasped at. And it was the fact of his being Jehovah's Fellow that made his death of such infinite worth. Man could not have redeemed his fellow, but the Infinite Lawgiver Himself, taking to his heart the penalty of his own broken law, afforded it the greatest possible homage and satisfaction.

Surely there is a designed contrast between fellow and hosts. God is the Lord of many hosts, in heaven, and earth, and sea; but He has only one Fellow. All the Hosts of angels and nature had not availed for the work of propitiation; this He must do Himself; and He did it in the person of Jesus.

The Man. "The Man that is my Fellow.' By his tears and anguish, by the pains of death and the article of dissolution, his humanity was attested. And how real, how tender, how near they make Him to us all. No man so abject and sinful but may approach Him, when He is numbered with the transgressors, and hangs in death between two malefactors. Would you touch God through his Fellow? Then touch yonder dying Man. The gulf is bridged, the yawning chasm is spanned. By the grace of the one Man we may now receive the abundance of grace, and reign in life, here and hereafter.

Beware how you treat this blessed Man. Still men sell Him for thirty pieces of silver; tread beneath their wanton feet his precious blood; and do despite to his grace. Still they prefer their thirty paltry silverlings to his matchless worth. Would that their blind eyes were opened to see the matchless glory and beauty of Him who stands at the door and knocks.

The disciples were scattered when their Shepherd was taken. He had foreseen this: "Behold the hour cometh, yea, is come, that ye shall be scattered, every one to his own, and shall leave Me alone." And it seemed as though the hand of God was against them, to their utter undoing in the dread hours that followed. But who shall tell the woes that befell the chosen people that had rejected the Messiah. The disciples wept for but a little space, and their sorrow was soon turned into joy. But the Jews succumbed beneath the woes, which, within forty years, befell their nation. It came to pass in all the land, that two parts were cut off, whilst the remainder passed through the fire, and have been passing through it ever since. Nor can it be otherwise, until they acknowledge Jesus as their true Shepherd, and allow Him to fold them, and humble themselves to become the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand.

"Give Peace in Our Time, O Lord!"

"Thoughts of peace, and not of evil.—Jer. xxix. 11.

Hearken, O Lord! For fierce the strife is raging,
And men, like autumn leaves, around us fall;
Two nations still a deadly warfare waging,
Arise! e'en now, and hear thy children's call:
Let the wild clamour of the people cease,
Give us, O God, thy own good gift of peace!

"Peace in our time," we pray, our tears fast falling,
Hear we the widows' and the orphans' moan!
Our "brother's blood" to us from earth is calling,
A nation's prayers ascend towards thy throne:
"How long, O Lord, how long," thy people cry,
"Ere Thou wilt peace ordain, O God, Most High?"

And yet Thou reignest! Thou, the King of nations!
Thy earth beholding, Lord, with pitying eye,
Thou hearest still thy children's supplications,
And in the darkest hours we feel Thee nigh:
Our eyes on Thee, O Lord our God, shall wait—
We know Thou wilt not leave us desolate!

Thou art our Rock, our Fortress, our Defender;
In Thee we rest secure from war's alarm;
A loving Father, pitiful and tender,
To shield thy children from the reach of harm.
O Lord of Hosts! "Stretch forth thy mighty hand,"
And let the dove of Peace brood o'er the land!

The Evangelical Alliance.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE AT BRISTOL.

LAST week this Association of Evangelical Christians held its fifty-third annual Conference, extending over three days, at Victoria Rooms, Clifton. Members, delegates, and friends journeyed from the provinces; some even coming from Rome, Germany, and Norway. The programme embraced subjects of vital importance to the Christian Church of our time. In the churches and chapels of the district, on the previous Sunday, sermons were preached on the subject of "Christian Union."

Mr. R. Cope Morgan presided on the first morning (Tuesday). There was a special fitness in the Conference having for its opening topic "The Out-pouring of the Spirit consequent on the Glorifying of Christ," for the life and usefulness of the believer are absolutely dependent upon the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. Rev. Dr. Moinet, when illustrating this, emphasized the necessity of Christians continually receiving the Spirit of God, that they might continually manifest his gracious influence and character. It was because believers did not communicate to others the spiritual things they had received, that the Church of Christ accomplished so little. Christ's individual disciples were to be channels of blessing to the world, according to the Lord's teaching in John vii. 38: "He that believeth on Me . . . out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water."

In the afternoon, Rev. F. B. Meyer, speaking upon "The Holy Ghost Given to all Believers for Service," voiced the truth that is inseparable from the possession of the Holy Ghost Himself. To use this power Christians must live on God's plan, and make the glorifying of Jesus Christ the supreme object of their lives. The Holy Ghost was in the world, near, mighty; but the Church had largely lost the art of bringing the Spirit's power into daily life and work. Rev. James Charles (Denbigh) believed that the Holy Spirit in the Church was a living testimony to Jesus Christ, and, where the Spirit of God dwelt, there was true progress. Testimony was given by Rev. Dr. Prochet (Rome) to the union of Christians for aggressive religious service there under the Spirit's constraining influence.

A new feature in the Conference programme was an evangelistic service on the first evening, the suggested subject being "The Son of God—his Atonement for Sinners" (1 Pet. ii. 24). Mr. E. P. Field, General Secretary of the Alliance, spoke of the power, and wrong, of sin. Dr. Harry Guinness elucidated the supreme theme of Redemption in an impassioned address.

Words of practical wisdom were spoken on "Evangelistic Work incumbent on all Christians," "Pastoral Intercourse with the People," and "Work Amongst Men." Rev. W. S. Standen made it clear that the primary work of the Church, and the fundamental obligation of the ministry, must be evangelistic, and that it was because this phase of Christian service was so often relegated to a secondary place that and religious life amongst the people so low. Wherever a living and spiritual church exists, it is the result of a fervent spirit of evangelization. Taking the Good Shepherd as the pattern for the Christian pastor, Rev. H. R. T. Jackson, one of the secretaries of the Alliance, drew attention to Christ's sympathy, tenderness, hopefulness, impartiality, and to his gracious care in dealing with individual souls. Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield asked how it was that clergy and laity alike had not allowed themselves to be more diligent in winning men for Christ. To reclaim the head of the household, meant often the uplifting of the whole family.

"Present Day Problems" were discussed by the Ven. Archdeacon Hughes-Games. Alluding to the fierce competition in every branch of trade, he believed men were no longer content with the ordinary means of making money; and, therefore, endeavoured to enrich themselves by gambling of different kinds. The rich were living in unbounded luxury, absorbed in self-aggrandisement and self-satisfaction. The masses sought their own advantage, without due regard to what was due to the classes. The Gospel was the sole remedy for all social anomalies.

The problem of poverty was dealt with by Rev. N. Vickers. Politicians selected some form of socialism, others expounded it by the survival of the fittest. The profound economic maxim supremely adapted to its removal was, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." This was the answer for those who inquired the meaning of life—the great mystery of death and of destiny.

"Foreign Missions" attracted an enthusiastic audience. Rev. Wardlaw Thompson explained the grounds for encouragement at the present position of the missionary enterprise. At the commencement of the Queen's reign few people recognised the claims of the heathen, and those who advocated missions to them were looked upon as having fads. To-day the majority of Christians frankly admit that missionary service must be the very centre of the true work of the Church of Christ. He believed that the cumulative force of missions would go on increasing till men would be astounded presently at under the surface of the world's life, through the agency of the missionary. The influence of Christian literature upon the thought and life of the Chinese people was vividly sketched by Rev. W. T. A. Barber. Everywhere the circulation of religious books is enlightening this ancient nation.

In dealing with "The Day of Rest as defined in Holy Writ," Mr. G. F. Chambers (Eastbourne) thought that even if the hard-working man might claim some slight excuse for taking a Sunday excursion into the country, but what could be said of the prince, the duke, and the countess who must needs select that day for a boating trip or a tennis party? He advised boycotting every Sabbath-breaking trader, whoever he might be. "Sunday-fought battles," he said, "had generally resulted in the defeat of the aggressor." It was the fear of a Continental Sunday that led Rev. J. Mountain to conceive of nothing more inimical to national prosperity than the introduction into English life of the worldliness, the vanity, and the enslaving of the working classes which prevails on the other side of the Channel.

"The Faith of the Gospel in reference to the False Teaching of the Present Day" was brought before the assembly by Revs. Dr. Waller, Dr. Gritton, and A. A. Isaacs; and on the closing evening (Thursday), "Our Protestant Faith and Worship" received eloquent treatment at the hands of Revs. W. H. Griffith Thomas and W. Fuller Gooch. Very gratifying were the greetings brought to the British organization from the Blankenburg branch of the Alliance by Herr Otto Mau, and from the Danish Branch by Rev. B. Nielsen.

The conversazione, held between the afternoon and evening sittings of the day, was the occasion of pleasant intercourse between the officials of the Alliance and some of the old and new members. Pastor Mascher's sketch, then, of the persecutions and fines to which he had been subjected in Saxony on account of his Protestant work, produced a deep impression and awoke sincere sympathy. The recent deputation from the Council in London to the Minister of Public Worship in Dresden, will, it is believed, result in a considerable measure of liberty being granted to evangelical Christian communities in royal Saxony.

The Walworth Creche has, for its object, the care of "slum babies." The little ones are fed and looked after while their mothers are at work. The small charge of 2d., made for each child, does not defray the cost of food alone. The Mission hopes to be able to extend its premises. Further information may be had from the hon. superintendent, Mrs. F. Kinghorne, 26, Dagmar Road, Camberwell.

TOPIC FOR NOV. 12.

The Living Bread.—John vi. 26-35.

THE body does not need food one whit more than the soul or the spirit, and each part of our nature cries out for its specific nourishment. The body requires oxygen, nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen, with a mixture of iron, lime, soda, and phosphorus. The soul requires, as its food, thoughts of order, beauty, law, justice, and love. But the spirit cries out for God. In every age, as is attested by Hebrew sacrifice, Gothic rune, Polynesian totem, and Mexican temples, man has cried out for God—for the living God. Cut out the religious longing, the upward look, the theological conception, the sacramental rites, and you may well be said to cut out, by a cruel mutilation, the biggest and finest part of man. Religion is the one loud note of undertone which makes itself heard throughout man's history, and proves the existence of his lofty spiritual nature, as the sense of hunger is a proof of the existence and vitality of the body.

Food does these things for us. It furnishes the materials for our growth. Porridge, and milk, and whole-meal bread must be furnished to the growing child, or his frame becomes stunted. It replaces waste. The body is a building of exquisite mosaics; but the stones are ever crumbling away, and must be replaced as fast as they are perishing. Every part of our frame is being worn away every hour, and renewed as fast by the blood, which carries off the dead cells, and replaces them with reparative ones. It generates heat. Our food should be largely composed of carbon, because this element supplies fuel. We must ever keep the inner temperature at 98 degrees, and to do this must burn sweet and fatty materials.

So in all this, our Lord is a precise analogy in the physiology of the spirit. He is the food of our spirits. As we trust him, meditate on his grace and love, look to Him with adoration and affection, He enters us, and furnishes the material of our spiritual growth. Hence the Apostle bids us desire the sincere milk of the Word, that we may grow thereby; and we are bidden to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. There is also a continual waste on foot in our spiritual life. After every strenuous piece of work done in his name, there is a loss of some of the holy energy, purity, and strength, which we had possessed previously, which calls for replacement or redemption. And again, we are also needing the renewal of the heat, the normal temperature of the spirit. So Christ sends us the comfort of the Holy Spirit, who makes Him real. We are baptized with the Holy Ghost, as with fire. We feed on the blessed nature of our Lord, which inspires us. We absorb, so to speak, the fervour, passion, and warm love, which are generated in his nature.

But take care that you are satisfied with nothing less than Christ. Good health depends on our taking the right kind of food, and in the right proportions. A child may take the wrong food, white bread from which all the nutrition has been eliminated, too much meat, too little fat. There is a plant in the Australian bush called the nardoo, which tastes like bread, but cannot support human life. It satisfies the cravings of the stomach, but lacks the elements of nutrition. So many Christians read novels, tit-bits, scraps, odds and ends, and then complain of their want of joy and power. Is it to be wondered at? Jesus alone combines in Himself all that the spirit needs, as good wheaten bread combines in itself all that the body needs. You would soon starve if you lived on nothing but meat, but you need nothing but bread. Hence corn is found indigenous to every soil.

But food needs digestion, assimilation. Woe to the man who can no longer appropriate the nutrition of food. So we must learn to absorb, assimilate, appropriate the Lord Jesus. As the stag builds its antlers, so strong and heavy, out of the grass, the sedge, the rush, which it has assimilated, until these elements have been built up into that bony fabric, so let your meditation and assimilation of the sweetness, meekness, strength, and perfect beauty of Jesus, weave these into your own being, from glory to glory. Feed on Him, eat of Him, absorb Him, assimilate Him.

F. B. M.

One interesting feature of Rev. F. B. Meyer's presidential meetings is the large attendance of "C.E." ministers. This augurs well for the growth and stability of the movement. At the Edinburgh meeting, last week, the great Free Assembly Hall was crowded.

In 1898, the report from China told of 207 societies and 8,154 members. These are not all young people: for, at Ningpo, a deputation of aged women waited upon the missionary begging for a society to be organized for them, the result being the formation of the "Ningpo Old Women's Society of Christian Endeavour."

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 12. 2 Chron. xviii.

WHAT a curse riches and honour may become to a man, when he looks on them for his own emolument and enjoyment, instead of as a sacred trust for others! It was some subtle temptation connected with his riches and honour that drew Jehoshaphat into that fatal and God-dishonouring affinity with Ahab, which nearly cost him his life. "If riches increase, set not your heart upon them," but on the living God, who giveth us all things to be used as sacred talents for Himself.

How clearly does the whole incident illustrate our Lord's words—"Everyone that doeth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light lest his deeds should be reproved." Ahab hated Micaiah because he always spoke evil of him; as well hate the watchdog baying in the night because robbers are trying to effect an entrance, or the lighthouse shedding its ray on the sunken rocks, with their froth of foam. The world is not an easy place for Micaiahs. Their fare is hard, bread and water; the courtesy meted out by menials and false prophets is scant; they are hated by kings and great ones in the earth; the prison is their home. But they are blessed. They are more to be envied than Ahab, and even than Jehoshaphat.

The sinner may disguise himself, and think in such a way to escape his doom. He deceives himself, but not God. The arrow, shot at a venture, will find him out, because God has directed its course, and is executing his sentence by an anonymous hand.

MONDAY, November 13. 2 Chron. xix.

God did not leave Himself without witness. Micaiah in the northern kingdom, and Jehu in the southern, were his true prophets, who dared to speak his word before kings. How well would it be if, humbly and affectionately, God's servants, in the present day, would remonstrate with any who may be sliding into worldly affinities. How often would they succeed in warding off some threatened stroke of God's chastising wrath, for it is as true now as of old, that if men love those that hate the Lord, his rod of chastisement must fall.

Jehu's words met with a favourable response, and Jehoshaphat set himself to the ordering and administration of his own realm, and specially in the direction of justice. Human government, as I believe, is ordained by God as the expression of his Lordship, and to vindicate his righteousness. And if our judges only realized it, they have a perfect right to appeal very definitely to God for the illumination of their minds, that they may be able to pronounce his verdicts, those which are in harmony with the truth, and which He desires to pronounce. Thus, in some sense, the earthly is the expression of the Unseen and Divine.

Alas! that the sacred cause of justice has been so often perverted, and that in so many cases the earthly tribunal has been in direct collision with the heavenly. But for the victims of earthly courts there is always an appeal, as Sir Walter Raleigh reminds us.

TUESDAY, November 14. 2 Chron. xx.

In this nineteenth century after Christ, we have a great deal to learn from the fifth before Him. To-day if there are combinations against us, we ruffle our feathers, we show our teeth, we prepare ourselves to meet sword with sword, blow with blow, force with force. But Jehoshaphat set himself to seek unto the Lord, and proclaimed a fast. Some of us can just remember the National Fast-Day appointed for the Indian Mutiny, when Mr. Spurgeon preached to countless thousands in the Crystal Palace. It would be well if a similar day could be appointed at this solemn juncture. The crisis in South Africa, so seriously tangled, each side in which professes to be eager for peace, can never be settled apart from humiliation, confession, and prayer. Oh! that our gracious Queen would, through her responsible Ministers, call her people to join her in prayer. There is no such palladium for our liberties as that which God's favour provides.

How good it is when we are reduced to cry: "We have no might, neither know we what to do." For the most part, we are too strong for God. He has often to treat us, as the strong swimmer treats the drowning man, allowing him to go down more than once, till he has ceased from his struggling and renounced his own efforts. Then God steps in, and undertakes what we cannot do for ourselves.

This victory was bathed in song. In response to the words of Jahaziel, whilst the good king bowed his head, the Levites burst into song. In the morning of the battle, a white-vestured band of choristers preceded the hosts to the conflict. It was whilst they sang that the hosts were smitten. And on the fourth day the valley of Berachah resounded with songs of thanksgiving. Let us praise more the beauty of Holiness, singing in the glad anticipation of victory, and when the victory is won.

WEDNESDAY, November 15. 2 Chron. xxi.

What a son for the good Jehoshaphat! How could this be? To slay all his brethren, and many of the princes of Judah, and walk in the ways of the house of Ahab, this was an enormous wrong. But how came it about? Ah, the secret is out in the sixth verse, for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife. Men are very often what women make them; not always in good, but very often in bad. A good woman cannot make a bad man (her husband) good, as often as a bad woman will drag her husband down to her level. Oh, women, get away to the heights of holy fellowship, and descend to us who are too engrossed in the thick of the fight with holy and inspiring words! Lift us to your level, and do not allow yourselves to be dragged down to ours! Like the vestal virgins of old, keep the sacred fire of love and purity always glowing bright!

When a man gets wrong with God, it is as though the sun were displaced from his central throne. All the spheres of his life become disorganized and out of gear. We are not, therefore, surprised to find that Edom and Libnah revolted from under Jehoram's hand. It is what we might have looked for. What sore troubles befel him! How bitter his sorrows! How terrible his end! What an epitaph, that he departed without being desired! But such things are happening every day. It is an evil thing, and a bitter, to depart from the fountain of living waters, and substitute the cracked rough-hewn cistern.

But God would not forsake his covenant into which He entered with David. This held Him still, undaunted, unchanged, undeviating. And may not we entrust ourselves to that new covenant into which God has entered with us in Jesus? Sin is mighty; but there is one thing it cannot do—it cannot make God forsake, or forget, or run back from the love which He has set on those who believe in Jesus.

THURSDAY, November 16. 2 Chron. xxii.

What a terrible sentence is that. "He walked in the ways of the house of Ahab, for his mother was his counsellor to do wickedness." Mothers have much to do with the making of character. Their influence for good or evil is almost unlimited. What they are, even more than what they say, moulds young lives. If we would really regenerate society, let us go behind the training of boys and girls to the training of their mothers. A nation may well consider into whose hands its young maidens are being entrusted; and, in my judgment, nothing is more utterly senseless than to send girls, whose decision for Christ is not assured, to Paris, Brussels, or Dresden, to finish their education—unless the very strongest means are taken to ascertain that the character of those with whom they are placed is essentially God-fearing and noble.

What a chapter of disasters! Counselled by the house of Ahab, the young king walked after their counsels; allied himself with Joram; went down to Jezreel to see his relative, lying there sore wounded; and there he was trodden down (7, R.V. marg.) by Jehu, whom God had anointed to cut off the house of Ahab. And the chronicler closes with the striking aphorism, "The house of Ahaziah had no power to hold the kingdom."

Power to rule is contingent on character, and, indeed, the same may be said of all power, moral or spiritual. It is not by the calibre of their brains, or the strength of their muscles, but by the nobility and purity of their character, that men become the keystones in the arch of a nation's stability. "Ye shall receive power," said our Lord, "after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you."

FRIDAY, November 17. 2 Chron. xxiii.

Beside the historical interest of this remarkable revolution, in which the Levites played so honourable a part, there is an allegorical and spiritual aspect. For, indeed, the heart of the carnal man may well be compared to the City of Jerusalem, and specially to the Temple, which was its heart. How often an Athaliah rules where the throne of conscience should be filled by the true king! And what misery reigns throughout the precincts of any life where such a substitution is permitted!

Then come symptoms of a change. At first they are few and small, as the child Joash, and need to be cherished and nurtured. But they daily gain in strength and importance, until at last there is a vast upheaval, and the Lord Jesus is borne to the throne of dominion and power. This is the time of consecration, when the life sways to and fro between the movements of contending factions. On the one hand, the nobler part of the inner life, its moral and spiritual faculties, which may be described as its Levites, rejoice and cry, "God save the king." The singers play on instruments of music, and lead the songs of praise; whilst the old corrupt factions of the heart cry Treason, Treason, and rend their clothes. There must be no parley, no compromise, between the two. Whatever be the Athaliah of your heart, it must be had out beyond the ranges and slain. No pity may be shown, and even though the soul is moved to its foundations by the outcry and agony of the strife, it is only through such travail that the city can be quiet.

Thereafter, when the soul is adjusted to the supremacy of Christ, burnt-offerings and songs break out, like sunshine after a day of storm, and nothing unclean is allowed to enter in (19).

SATURDAY, November 18. 2 Chron. xxiv.

Jehoiada was a great statesman and a good man, and his influence was in the highest degree salutary and beneficial. It was under his influence, doubtless, that the repairs of God's house were set on foot. The people were only too glad to co-operate in its renovation and replenishment. That is a beautiful alternative rendering of the R.V. marg.: Healing went on upon the work. What a blessing is a gracious life! What healing ministries it sets on foot! The land is healed of the scars which war occasions, the body politic is healed of dissensions and strife, and the very buildings are healed of their desolations. Remember to be a healer. Go through the world not only with words of comfort, but with wise, strong measures that lay the deep foundations of prosperity and blessedness.

The influence of Jehoiada was greatly missed when he died. The old corrupt party which had been overawed and repressed by him revived, to the forsaking of Jehovah and his house, and the re-institution of the old filthy idols. Yes, we may enthrone Jesus as King, and as long as the power of a holy environment is near, we may remain true to Him; but sometimes the removal of a godly minister, or friend, and the withdrawal of blessed influences, act prejudicially, and cast us back into the miserable past. Oh, let us see to it, that we become rooted and grounded in Christ, and that we be established unto Him—welded, if need be, in the fires of suffering. Then our steadfastness will be independent of the Jehoiadas.

Disaster after disaster befell Joash. It is sad to contrast this stormy sunset with the fair dawn of his reign. Who would have predicted his ingratitude to Jehoiada—his assassination of his son, and his own in the same year, that had seen the boy stand, pure and God-devoted, by the pillar? "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

Music in Heaven.

Rev. xiv. 2, xv. 3, &c.

By Rev. E. GRIFFITH-JONES, B.A., Balham.

FOR lack of the appropriate interpretation, some of the finest imagery in Scripture is lost on the Christian consciousness. Perhaps there is no department of which this is so true as the copious references made to the state of the blessed dead in heaven. The mystery of the Hereafter is, in its details, hidden from our earthly vision. It is only when we translate the Scripture similes into their higher equivalents that they lay hold of the soul, and open out their secret meaning to the devout heart.

It is the purpose of this paper to endeavour to do this with those passages that speak so eloquently of heaven as a place in which music plays a foremost part. These passages are many, and delightfully impressive. To many, however, they are a difficulty, indeed a weariness. Those who have no "musical faculty" take no pleasure in the noblest products of musical genius, and fail to look forward with any eagerness to a future state which they imagine consists of everlasting singing and harp-playing. Entangled thus in the letter, they miss the splendid uplifting and consolation which these passages are meant to administer.

Let us consider the significance of earthly music as a help to put aside the veil that hides heaven from our eyes.

I. Let me begin with this thought—that in music we have the finest possibilities of matter used to express the highest emotions and ideas of the soul.

There are many ways by which mind uses matter as a means of expression. The universe itself is God's medium of self-revelation. His works show forth his glory, and chant his praise. Then our own bodies, and especially our facial features, give unconscious utterance to our mental states. Language is the chosen and elaborate use of signs and sounds for the purpose of acquainting each other with what goes on within. But all these means and methods are very imperfect media for sharing our subtler mental and spiritual states. The finer feelings, the lighter shades of emotion and thought, are too delicate for language. For these we make use of tones, of inflections, of rising and falling cadences of voice. And music is but the refinement of these natural and often unconscious inflections, carried into the highest pitch of perfection. That is why music has always been the chosen

VEHICLE OF THE HIGHEST RELIGIOUS MOODS.

What the tongue cannot tell in words, what language lets slip through its clumsy meshes—to that, song and instrument give relief.

> "Music! O how faint, how weak
> Language fades before thy spell!
> Why should feeling ever speak
> When thou canst breathe her soul so well?"

This is the noblest use to which matter can be put by mind.

Now, when we read of music in heaven, it indicates that the soul, which is striving in vain here for the power to realise itself and to express itself, will there come to the power of perfect self-expression. That there will be physical music in heaven we cannot, of course, conceive; for, as we know it, it is inevitably imprisoned in the material order; but, that there the victory over the environment which here we vainly strive after, will be completely won is surely suggested to us here. These rougher forms of matter that we know; these crude and undeveloped senses that we possess; this inadequate intermarriage of brain and mind which is the best we can attain to here—all will be done away with, and we shall enter on finer conditions, coming to the perfect mastery of soul over sense, of the ego over its faculties, of the spirit over its environment. Music on earth is a prophecy of this great inheritance of victory; music in heaven will be its realization.

II. And this leads us to another thought—that in music we realize the finest reward for perfect obedience to law.

The difference between mere noise and music is that the former is an unregulated, mixed and confused mass of sound without regard to sequence and harmony, while music is the unravelling of the various threads and combinations of sound, the rejection of the discordant, and the choice of such as are in true and orderly relation with one another. There is no art that demands a more earnest obedience to the laws of proportion, of sequence, and of combination. The difference between the greatest players and the poorest is simply a difference in their faithful performance of the conditions that so finely rule the world of sound Great musicians thus "stoop to conquer;" they first of all become humble and steadfast pupils in the school of nature, mastering her appointed order, and then they use her wonderful possibilities for their own ends with royal and absolute control over her resources.

Is not this

A PARABLE OF THE SPIRITUAL LIFE?

There, too, there is no victory without service, no mastery without obedience, no self control without self-discipline, and no true victory over our environment without first attaining to the victory over self. The first condition of spiritual victory is to stoop to the yoke, to bear the burden, to learn of Christ, and to follow Him, humbly and loyally, in the appointed way.

Now, on earth, we are like pupils practising the scales, slowly winning control over ourselves and our instrument, patiently plodding our way to worthy mastery over the laws of spiritual life. In heaven, we shall be as those promoted to a place in the choir of God, which is composed of such as have been faithful unto death, and have earned their place by endurance to the end, in the assembly of the just. And then, as the musician weaves celestial harmonies out of the simplest sounds, and without effort carries himself and others into ever-deepening so we shall rise into the state in which to conceive will be to achieve; to dream will be to realize; to imagine fresh symmetries of character will be to embody them—

> In loveliness of perfect deeds
> More strong than all poetic thought.

If we suffer patiently with and for Christ, in due time we shall reign with Him.

III. Once more—in music we have the finest result of perfect co-operation between many minds and voices to one great end.

There are two prime principles in music—melody, the fit sequence of sweet sounds, and harmony, their fit combination. And in order to attain to both, what an amount of co-operation—willing and perfect co-operation—there must be between many minds and wills!

First, there must be the composer, the creative mind, out of whose teeming treasures there is woven the material of which a song, a psalm, an oratorio, a symphony, is composed. The composer, however, is helpless without his instruments, properly made and tuned to concert pitch; his leader, to give the time and control the expression; his choir of well-trained minds and disciplined voices. All these must contribute, each after his order and according to his capacity, and in perfect co-operation to the finished result. I was deeply impressed with this some time ago, in listening to Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Nearly 3,000 voices and 500 separate instruments, all in time and tune, joining their skill, their voices, their passion, in one combined triumph of joyful performance. What a lesson to the human race in higher things than music!

We often speak of man as a social being, and yet how slow we are to fulfil that title! If in the state, in the Church, in the social order, in the family, we could just do our part with a single eye to help the general interests of God and of humanity, and harmoniously add our quota to the sum total of well-being, what a better world this would be!

But what in this life we have so far only reached on the mimic stage of music, in heaven will be accomplished on the scale of the universe. There we shall find no self-will, no shameful disobedience to the general good. All will work together in harmony with the will of God, and for the good of every creature. And the result there will be the reality of which music here is but the parable and the promise. Here we only stay our strife, and struggle, and brutal competition for an hour or two now and then, after which we turn away again to our selfish struggles and competitions. But in the heavenly state those who here have disciplined themselves to the will of God in the service of his Son will be joined into a perfect state, a society of the redeemed, who will live the eternal life of love in unbroken harmony. That will be an oratorio indeed, of which our earthly music is but a vague hint, a first faint suggestion.

Meanwhile, let us remember that into the celestial choir no one can enter whose life is not already disciplined, trained, subdued, uplifted, by earnest

OBEDIENCE TO THE DIVINE WILL.

Into the celestial city "they shall bring all the honour and glory of the nations," but none of their shame and their sin; for "there shall in no wise enter into it anything that is unclean, and he that doeth an abomination and a lie; but only they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." But to those who love God in sincerity, and accept the discipline of life humbly and teachably, many a glimpse of the glory that shall be revealed will come; snatches of celestial melody will visit their soul; the spiritual order will burn through the physical as the sun burns through the clouds of earth and turns them into streamers of glory, and they will have some foretaste of—

> "That undisturbed song of pure content,
> Aye sung before the sapphire-coloured throne
> To Him that sits thereon,
> With saintly shout, and solemn jubilee;
> Where the bright Seraphim, in burning row,
> Their loud uplifted angel-trumpets blow;
> And the cherubic host, in thousand choirs
> Touch their immortal harps of solemn wires;
> With those just spirits that wear victorious palms,
> Hymns devout, and holy psalms,
> Singing everlastingly."

Spiritual Sacrifices.

1 Peter ii. 5-9.

1. The sacrifice of righteousness (Psa. iv. 5).
2. Prayer (Psa. cxli. 2).
3. Praise (Heb. xiii. 15).
4. Thanksgiving (Jonah ii. 9).
5. Obedience (1 Sam. xv. 22).
6. A free heart (Psa. liv. 6, P.B.V.).
7. A contrite heart (Psa. li. 17).
8. A consecrated body in which to glorify God (Rom. xii. 1, 1 Cor. vi. 20).
9. Justice (Proverbs xxi. 3).
10. Mercy (Hosea vi. 6).
11. Joy (Psa. xxvii. 6).
12. Love (Mark xii. 33, Eph. v. 2).
13. Doing good, communicating; with such sacrifices God is well pleased (Heb. xiii. 16).

Semper Paratus.

Prayer.—Prayer is the nurse of faith. The way to build up ourselves in our most holy faith is to continue instant in prayer (Rom. xii. 12). Our prayers are then most likely to prevail when we pray in the Holy Ghost; that is, under his guidance and influence, according to the rule of his Word, with faith, fervency, and constant persevering importunity. This is praying in the Holy Ghost, whether it be done by or without a set prescribed form. Matthew Henry

From Dr. Newman Hall.

MAY I, in your columns, inform the numerous friends who are inquiring respecting my health that, after an illness of a month, I am decidedly recovering, and hope to preach next Sunday at the Wesley famous chapel in City Road?

This indisposition is to me remarkable, because it is the first during my fifty years in London which has laid me aside from preaching for more than two Sundays at a time. During that long period I have only been invalided three months altogether. My poorliness has been kindly, but mistakenly, attributed to over-work. I cannot take this credit to myself. I have never worked beyond my strength, nor as much as many of my brethren—certainly not so much as my beloved successor, Mr. Meyer; nor my predecessors, Sherman and Rowland Hill, the latter of whom preached all over the land till nearly ninety years of age, and within one week of his decease.

Preaching Christ has been the chief joy of my life since eighteen years of age. I was never injured by it—never caught cold by open-air preaching, never became hoarse by exercise of voice, never lost my sleep through the anxiety and excitement of meetings and addresses.

At this season of the year I have been accustomed to visit country churches for anniversaries and harvest festivals. On September 18 I went to Newport Pagnell, the guest of Mr. Bull, whose grandfather was a friend of Rowland Hill. He often met John Newton and Cowper there. Here it was that I was taken ill, but with my friend's help I managed to reach the train, though suffering much pain. I arrived at home, where I at once went to bed. All preaching engagements for several weeks had to be, of course, annulled.

The continued pain during a fortnight, the broken sleep, the prostrating weakness, have been as nothing compared with the disappointment of spending Sunday after Sunday in bed rather than the pulpit. But this has given me a special joy. It has been my delight every Sunday for years, when preparing to preach, to say, "Thy will be done." Nothing easier when God's will was my own delight. But now that it involved deep disappointment, I felt it an unspeakable boon from God that his grace was "sufficient for me" to say it, not reluctantly, but gladly; not in resignation, but embracing it—regarding this passing poorliness, and especially this command to cease from usual service, as his will, as much as when He called me to preach the Gospel of Christ, and say, "Come to Jesus."

So, day by day, among other Scriptures which I had stored in memory when a youth, I have repeated to myself the hundred and third Psalm, making a paraphrase of which has been a profitable recreation in waking hours. As it cannot have been in print, I append it in hope it may suggest comfort to others:

Come, O my soul, and bless the Lord,
Let all thy powers in full accord
Unite to bless his holy name,
Whose love is evermore the same.

With bounteous boons He ready waits,
At every morning's opening gates,
To pardon sin, diseases heal,
Sorrow to soothe, and grace reveal.

O bless the Lord with all thy powers,
Who guards my wakeful, restful hours,
And more and more will help thee know,
Heaven may begin while here below.

Thy soul with good He satisfies,
And youth with vigour new supplies,
That thou mayst soar on eagles' wings
To greet the sunshine that He brings.

But crown in Earth, and Heaven is Love:
Of kindred friends, of God above;
With Father's pity bending down,
His chosen children thus to crown.

Worthy more search than priceless gold
Stored up by God in mountains old;
Sweeter than honey in the comb,
My joy, my treasury, my home.

Then praise Him, all beneath the sky,
Praise Him, ye angel choirs on high;
His works, his hosts, and all mankind,
Praise Him, my soul, with heart and mind.

The late Rev. E. Rowe Evans.

QUITE a gloom was recently cast over the Principality by the somewhat sudden death of Rev. E. R. Evans, of Neath, an eloquent and popular young Baptist minister.

Ernest Rowe Evans was the third son of the well-known Indian missionary, Rev. Thomas Evans. He was born in Delhi on September 1, 1866, and educated at Blackheath College. He did not pass through the usual course of theological study, but at the early age of nineteen accepted the pastorate of the Two Locks Baptist Church, Cwmbran, Mon. He threw himself heartily into the work of building up the church, and succeeded far beyond the most sanguine expectations.

His genial manner soon won the confidence of the horny-handed sons of toil, his rare gifts were recognised, and his fame as a preacher spread far and wide. Accordingly the congregation rapidly increased, necessitating the erection of a gallery in the chapel.

On marrying Miss Brankley, a member of his church, the church voted him an increase of £50 per year in stipend; but this he nobly refused to accept until the debt incurred in enlarging the chapel was liquidated. After four years' successful work at Cwmbran, much to the regret of all classes of the community, he moved from there to Merthyr Tydvil, where there was greater scope for his exceptional energy and devotion. He remained at Merthyr three years, interesting himself in the social and spiritual life of the town, and became a great favourite, also a welcome speaker at great meetings, irrespective of denomination.

From Merthyr Mr. Evans removed to Neath to undertake the pastorate of the large and important Baptist Church in Orchard Place. This added considerably to his influence, and he was in constant request for sermons and lectures all over the country. He had a charming personality, possessed a splendid voice, which was under complete control, and his eloquence was of a most stirring character. Under his ministry the Orchard Street Church became a greater and growing spiritual power in the town.

Latterly, Mr. Evans had a lessened inclination for platform work, and reluctantly accepted engagements to deliver lectures. The reason was found in the fact that an absorbing passion for the salvation of souls took possession of him; and, at the time of his death, he was seriously contemplating resigning the pastorate that he might devote himself entirely to the work of an evangelist. The success that attended his evangelistic efforts led him to believe that God was calling him to that work more definitely than previously.

Feeling rather run down, and needing rest and change, in August last he went to Llandrindod for a few days. Returning still unwell, he remainded in bed for a while. Just then a poor dying woman sent for him to visit her. He arose and went; and, after reading and praying with her, returned home and also to bed, feeling much worse for the exertion he had made. He gradually sank, and passed away peacefully on Thursday, August 31. By his death, Orchard Place Church lost a valuable and beloved pastor, and Wales one of her most promising preachers. Mr. Evans left a widow and three children.

The Victory of Surrender

"There wrestled a man with him. . . . And He blessed him there."—Gen. xxxii. 24-29.

THESE two sentences, though widely differing, are spoken of the same person. They describe the beginning and ending of a great and important scene and a great crisis in the history of Jacob. Read carefully the intervening verses. The one that wrestles is the one that blesses, and that none other than the Lord Himself.

I. The resistance of Jacob.—"He prevailed not" (25). How often the wrestler would get a blessing to his soul if only he did not resist the Spirit. Many make up their minds to do this or that without the least reference to the Word, that is the guiding lamp to our feet. The Word says one thing, they do quite another—they resist the Lord. "Yield yourselves to God" (R.V. vi.) if you would have a quiet mind and heavenly joy in your soul.

II. The necessary touch.—"He touched the hollow of his thigh." The blessed Lord would be glad enough only to speak, but we are deaf like the adder, when we should say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

III. The earnest entreaty.—"Let me go." Why did the Lord ask this? Was it not to encourage in Jacob his tenacious clinging to the Lord instead of to himself? We need to be educated into the art of letting go and holding on. The sainted M'Cheyne says: "As long as we hold Him and do not let Him go, our holiness is secure."

Be it ours, to have in all our weakness and helplessness this: IV. holy determination.—"I will not let Thee go," &c. He clung the tighter; it was a supreme moment, a parting of the ways; was it to be Jacob or the Lord, self or surrender?

V. The humbling question.—"What is thy name?" The natural character of Jacob hitherto would have led him to reply, "They call me Jacob, but I do not deserve so discreditable a name." But no; he took the right way of this testing and owned to his natural inclination to deceive, and said, "I am Jacob" (supplanter)—a frank confession. He was willing to let go as well as hold. Are we? A sight of oneself is very humbling; pride creeps in often by the window when love comes in at the door. If our characters are not changed by our conversion, we may doubt the reality of our consecration. The blessing came to Jacob by getting down. The deepening of spiritual life in each soul depends on faith taking deeper roots down. When Satan saw the Lord (Rev. i.) he fell down as one dead. When Isaiah saw the Lord (Isa. vi.), not only was he "moved," but the very posts of the door also. There was in Jacob not only a frank confession, but the change had come; he was raised to the ranks of a prince, he was Israel. We are converted that we may be changed in life and character. We are changed in life and character to prove we are truly converted to God.

VI. "He blessed him there."—He had seen God face to face; he passed on the same man, yet not the same. The heavenly light had burst into his soul; he could do without his "present, sent to my lord Esau." A smiling face, with a thigh out of joint (the mark of God's dealing with him), he is embraced by his brother he so dreaded to meet. The present was not now to stay the anger of Esau, but as a token of love; for he saw God in his brother (chap. xxxiii. 10). Is there not a man wrestling with you, my reader? Remember, the man that wrestles is the man that will bless.

Herbert R. Francis.

THE LATE

Mr. Holt Skinner.

MANY mourned in July last when Mr. John Holt Skinner passed away. He exchanged the weariness, the restlessness, and the infirmities of age, for "the life that knows no ending," the life of glory, and "pleasures for evermore" at God's right hand.

Born at Whitby in 1802, the son of William Skinner by his wife Mary Holt, he enjoyed life to the full in his merry, happy boyhood in that quaint old Yorkshire seaport. He engaged in fishing, bathing, and swimming; or, with a companion, he could unfasten the pilot's cobble and take a sail in the harbour, causing his mother many an anxious moment lest her lively boy should meet with an accident, or be brought home drowned. He was educated at home by a private tutor, and at Ripon Grammar School, and removed with his family to Stockton-on-Tees, when his father opened a private bank in that town. He spent some years in the bank, learning habits of business and punctuality, which were of use to him through life.

Converted to God in youth, he found peace through a sermon in which was brought home to him with saving power the well-known verse—"And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." He was enabled to lead a happy, useful, consistent life in the service of God, striving by word and act, as well as generously aiding with his means, to spread the knowledge of the Gospel amongst those at home, on the Continent, or in heathen lands, who had not the spiritual privileges and means of grace which he enjoyed.

He became united in marriage in 1826 to Anne, only child of Mr. Robert Appleby, of Roseville, in the county of Durham, an earnest Christian young lady who sympathized with him in his love of pure and spiritual religion; and it was truly a marriage "in the Lord." The young couple made a bold stand for Christ, which was not a very easy matter, surrounded as they were in Stockton by many worldly acquaintances. They removed to Scotland in 1843, and during many years spent the winter in Edinburgh, and the summer in the Highlands, which he, as a keen sportsman and a fisherman, thoroughly enjoyed. He was associated with many works of charity and benevolence, taking special interest in the Edinburgh Medical Mission, and visiting continually in some of the lowest and poorest parts of that city, where, it was supposed, he contracted typhus fever, which once brought him near to the gates of death.

On purchasing the Gart House, near Callander, he realized his responsibilities towards those he employed on the estate, and towards the cottagers who were his neighbours, and commenced Gospel services for them, which he conducted himself. Amongst some of his happiest reminiscences were his meeting and intercourse with that holy man, Mr. Grant, of Arndilly.

English friends suggested that it was time for them to return to their own country, and Blackheath was named as a desirable place of abode. Thither they removed, and, being then within easy distance of London, Mr. Holt Skinner was able continually to attend the committees of many of the religious societies, in which he took the keenest interest. Christian work amongst the heathen, and work amongst our soldiers and sailors, had a warm place in his heart; but it would be difficult to enumerate the number of religious institutions and societies with which he showed practical and deep sympathy. He was a member of the Protestant Church of England, a true Evangelical, who could bear no dallying with Rome, no imitating her ceremonies, no departure from the simplicity of the Gospel.

After his second marriage, to Georgiana, daughter of Major Hugh Rose, of the 12th Lancers, he moved to the Isle of Wight, spending many happy winters at Bordighera, in the Italian Riviera, and equally enjoyable summers in Ryde, commending the religion he had so long professed by his consistent Christian walk and his peace and contentment of heart. He was blessed with remarkable health and vigour until within about a twelvemonth of his death. He endeared himself to those around him in his old age by his wonderful patience and sweetness and thankfulness.

He was truly a man of prayer and of praise, and on his sick bed, when there seemed little to make life worth living, the grateful spirit still manifested itself, as he was heard repeating, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits?" "Answer prayer, Lord, answer prayer, not as we will, but as Thou wilt," was the utterance of the aged saint. After some trying, wearisome days, the happy spirit was released on July 20; and the watchers by his side could but rejoice that the end was peaceful, and that he had been taken away to the land of perfect rest, into the presence of the King.

From a photograph by Mr. J. Moffatt, 125, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

A member of his household said: "The last word I heard master say was, Pray." It was so characteristic of the dear one. He will be missed by many. May others be raised up to help on God's work, as one by one such helpers as Mr. Holt Skinner are called away to higher service!

Mr. Skinner chose to have inscribed on his gravestone in the pretty Ryde cemetery:

> When from the dust of death I rise
> To claim my mansion in the skies:
> E'en then shall this be all my plea,
> Jesus hath lived, hath died for me.

This stanza, so full of theological significance, expressed his hope and confidence. Like the words of Scripture, the lines are good, alike for the living disciple and the dying saint.

The Regeneration of India.

By Mr. F. ANDERSON, M.A., Y.M.C.A. College Secretary, Bombay.

AS the eighteenth century came to its close, and India peered out into the future, did she for one moment foresee the changes that were to come over her life? Did she, even in a dream, see her history painted in brighter colours, herself robed in fairer garments, more ready—yes, a little more ready—for the coming of her King? Doubtless not; yet who shall say the dream has not lived? For the land in the brief space of a hundred years has moved far forward. Progress there certainly has been, and the India of to-day is far different from the India of yesterday.

What have been the elements in this progress? We think at once of constitutional government, of political stability, of judicial impartiality, of the assertion of the rights of ability against the supposed rights of birth. We observe the partial removal of those religio-social barriers which bid a man sit and work where his fathers had sat and worked before him. We name, unhesitatingly, commercial advantages, with its railways, telegraphs, canals, printing, and financial security. But we place education, the great disintegrator of a hundred hoary-headed superstitions, habits, customs, ceremonies, and beliefs of men.

Who shall measure what education has meant for India? Who shall gauge the influence of the five great Indian Universities upon the 100,000 young men who are to-day being subjected to their teaching! Can the Hindu, who has once come into contact with the histories of Greece or Rome, or of the lands of the West, attach any value to his heterogeneous pantheon, or claim a Divine sanction for the irrationalities of caste? Can the Parsee, with books of modern philosophy in his hand, submit to the puerile and disgusting ceremonials of his faith, or feed with costly sandalwood the sacred flame? Can the Mohammedan, who has read twenty pages of his text-book on natural science, believe any longer that all the Knowable or the Worth-Knowing is enshrined within the contradictory pages of the Koran? Assuredly not. O Education, great are thy works! Thou hast overthrown giants! thou has uprooted mountains! thou has ground to dust the creeds of centuries!

Thus far education; but education is not all, and can really carry us but a little way. On the religious side it is destructive, not constructive: it can pull down, but not build up; it works from without, not from within; it may reform, but never regenerate. Is this enough? "No," cries the Hindu reformer; "I charge you English with lifting the Hindu youth, by your education, out of the hell of Hinduism to sink him into the still deeper hell of agnosticism and infidelity." "No," cries the Government; "there is a causal connection between the present system of education and a growth of tendencies unfavourable to discipline and favourable to irreverence in the rising generation." "No," echoes the Indian Christian graduate; "education is the last thing to regenerate India." And if not education, what then? The Christian Church knows well enough that the Gospel, and is the decisive element in the regeneration of India.

And may we not yet further strengthen the proposition? Considering that these students of to-day are unquestionably the leaders of thought and activity in all departments of life to-morrow; considering that as go the educated thousands, so inevitably must go the uneducated millions, we may safely assert that the Gospel, applied to the educated classes, will decide the religious future of India; and this Gospel the Y.M.C.A., which seeks the salvation of all young men, is determined that, by God's help, the educated youth of India shall hear.

We are filled with gratitude when we see how God has thrust forth labourers into this field. Four of the five University cities have workers giving their entire time to the students. The American International Committee of Y.M.C.A.'s have sent men to Calcutta and Madras; Scotland maintains a man in Lahore; and it is my privilege to be working in Bombay under the English National Council of Y.M.C.A.'s. Much space might be occupied in detailing the methods of work adopted, the obvious difficulties surrounding it, the encouragements received, the elements combining to make it fruitful. These must, however, be put aside, for the immediate object of this article is to set before the Christian public of a building in which to carry on an aggressive and efficient evangelistic campaign among the 5,000 students of Bombay, and the fully 15,000 young men who have left college and are to-day engaged in professional and commercial life in the city.

We propose to erect a building which will contain a hall capable of accommodating from 300 and 400 people, a well-equipped reading room and library, and other offices, with quarters for the secretary, in order that, living on the spot, he may be accessible for personal interviews. Further, we shall add a hostel, in which from twenty to twenty-five students will reside, and thus be in direct contact with the secretary.

For the purchase of the site, erection and furnishing of the building, a sum of £7,000 is required, by no means an exorbitant sum; while we desire to secure £1,000 more to maintain the building during the first five years of its working. Towards this, we have in sight £4,300. Thus £3,700 are still needed, and of this sum £2,700 are required at once, to enable us to start operations immediately on my return to Bombay this month. Instructions have already been issued for the purchase of the site, and we are confident that God will give us all that is needed to finish the work. You ask, "What is the judgment of with reference to this work?" Rev. F. B. Meyer, who visited India last winter, writes:

I beg to assure you of my hearty concurrence and endorsement in the scheme. I hope that it will soon be crowned with success.

Rev. Dr. Fairbairn, who has also visited India, writes:

I am persuaded that the work among the educated classes in India is most vital, that it must be conducted by educated English Christians, and that it fills a distinct want in our missionary equipment in the land of the Hindus. . . . I wish you, therefore, every success in your enterprise.

Sir William Muir, whose authority in Oriental matters is unquestioned, writes:—

Your proposed building is a most admirable project. I wish I could give it material support. The small donation I can make will not be of much aid, but I send it to show my interest in and approval of the scheme.

You ask: "What is the judgment of the missionaries of all denominations in Bombay?" Their reply is most practical; they have appropriated the Bowen Memorial Fund (raised ten years ago to erect some memorial to that sainted missionary, Rev. George Bowen), amounting to £900, as the nucleus of the building fund, and the hall will be called the Bowen Hall.

What now will be the reply of the thousands of readers of The Christian to this immense opportunity of permanently influencing

THE STUDENTS OF INDIA?

Who will count it a joy to stand side by side with those who, like Messrs. E. M. and T. A. Denny, Mr. F. A. Bevan, Mr. J. H. Tritton, Lord Kinnaird, and others, have given large sums for this building? Who will help with even the smallest gift to lift the Bowen Fund out of its inactivity, and place it where it will promote marvellously the Kingdom of Christ in India? The hon. treasurer is Mr. T. F. Victor Buxton, J.P., Exeter Hall, Strand, W.C.

The Darjeeling Disaster.

THE havoc wrought by the landslip at Darjeeling has been terrible. The damage to private property—houses, tea plantations, &c.—and to the rail and cart roads, was great, and the loss of life very considerable: nine European children and between 400 and 500 natives of all ages. It has been affirmed that faulty drainage is responsible, in a great measure, for the disaster, and it is to be hoped that, in the future, house-building will be more carefully supervised.

In the Indian Witness for October 6 was published a letter, privately addressed to friends with no idea of publication. It gave details of the disaster which are truly harrowing. Rain in incessant torrents had fallen all day, and some ladies, who had retired to rest early, were aroused by a weird, rumbling noise, and, upon rising, found that the whole of the servants' quarters of the house had been blown away. The ladies removed to another house higher up the hill—a Mr. Lindeman's—but scarcely were they settled in a warm sitting room, when a fearful crash was heard, and the whole room was filled with débris.

The work of rescue was a cruel sight. There was a ruinous heap and piteous cries for help. One poor lady who was on her back, buried all but head, chest, and arm, was seen to draw three quick breaths, and then lie perfectly still. One man was under a fallen cupboard, bravely helping himself with one free hand, although in the utmost agony. Another lady lay under a heavy beam, with large boulders crushing her. And even while the rescuers were working to extract these, they were standing on ruins which covered the dead bodies of little children.

Miss Stahl and other ladies worked most heroically to rescue and extricate their unfortunate companions; they tried in vain to get help and assistance. Finally Mr. Mackay and Mr. Fleming from the manse arrived with three other men, and assisted in the work, which was carried on at great personal risk. Mr. and Mrs. Lee lost six children at a stroke (a boy having since died); now they have but one, under a year old. The funeral of the victims took place the next day. Archdeacon Stone read the service, and at the graves the hymn, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," was sung.

The Jungle Tribes Mission, in connection with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, is issuing a quarterly paper. The first number contains portraits of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Blair and Dr. Andrew M'Kaig, who join the s.s. Arcadia at Marseilles on December 7, en route for the mission field in India.

Blind at Deptford.—The eighth annual meeting of the Deptford and District Society for the Welfare of the Blind was held a few days ago. The treasurer's account was on the whole satisfactory, though compared with last year it showed a deficiency. The Society has been actively engaged during the past year, and its work has been greatly blessed. At one of its teas were twelve blind women (accompanied by four guides) from the Greenwich workhouse. The annual excursion took place on July 22, when eighty-two adults and twenty-two children were taken to Sandgate. Copies of the report may be had of the hon. sec., Miss M. Cock, 17, Tressillian Road, Brockley, S.E.

PUBLIC READING OF THE SCRIPTURES.—Neh. viii. 1-12.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Neh. viii. 3.

INTRODUCTORY.

AFTER the walls of Jerusalem had been rebuilt Nehemiah went very wisely to work to effect certain reforms needed among the people. They had been united and trained, and, inspirited by their work, and were now more ready for the changes needed in their lives. Thirteen years before this Ezra had begun the work which Nehemiah now wished to carry out (Ezra x.). Ezra seems to have employed these years in collecting, and copying, and studying the Book of God's law; and now he reappears, just at the right time, to teach it to the people. It is most likely that Ezra, not Nehemiah, wrote this and the next three chapters. At one time the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were all in one.

Just one week after the wall was finished was the great day of public rejoicing, the Feast of Trumpets (Lev. xxiii. 23-25; Num. x. 10). It was then that this great public Bible reading took place.

NEH. VIII. 1-12.

Verse 1. It is a very hopeful sign when people make up their minds, and join together in a good resolve. These Jews said, "We want to know what is written in God's book. Ezra has got 'the Book,' we will get him to read it to us." They could not keep God's law if they did not know what it was, and there was only one Bible. (Contrast with our privilege; tell of when there were only few Bibles in England, chained to the desks in churches for fear anyone should take them.) The great meeting was held in a large open space between the Temple wall and the city wall; and the boys and girls were all there, every child who was old enough to understand was taken. "The Book of the Law, &c."; here is proof that the Pentateuch was a written book, that the people knew of its existence, and that it was acknowledged to be inspired and revealed by God.

Verse 2. Ezra was priest as well as scribe. (Describe the two offices.) The word translated law means instruction. Men women, and children all need God's Word.

Verse 3. The open square of Aphel south-east of the Temple. The gate where the water was brought in for Temple use. Reading and expounding for six or more hours, and the people were attentive all the time. Some of us cannot listen for one hour!

Verse 4. A high platform, which held at least fourteen people.

Verse 5. Describe ancient books; the people stood up to show reverence to God's Word. Sunday scholars need reverence towards their Bibles now.

Verse 6. Study of the law preceded by worship and prayer. Note the postures showing increasing feeling and adoration. "Amen" means "That which is true," "So let it be." They accepted the prayer as their own.

Verses 7, 8. They read clearly and loudly, explained the difficult words, and expounded the meaning, like our Lord did (Luke iv. 16-22). It is no use reading if you do not understand.

Verse 9. "Tirshatha" means pasha or governor. The effects of understanding God's law was sorrow that they had not obeyed it. Repentance. A holy day is a day of joy and rejoicing. True religion is a joyful thing. WHY?

Verses 10-12. The results—joy, enjoyments, kindness, and unselfishness. "The joy of the Lord is your stronghold;" you are safe if religion is so real to you, forgiveness such a fact, that you rest satisfied in fellowship with God and the assurance of his constant care and personal presence.

PRACTICAL POINTS.

I. Our great privilege in having each our own Bible.

II. Proof that the Bible is God's written word.

III. The great value of meeting together for Bible study.

IV. Do we understand the truths taught in God's Book?

V. The need of prayer, and attention to our teachers.

VI. What is the great central truth in the Bible?

VII. To know God's salvation brings real joy and gladness.

VIII. If we are saved from sin through Jesus Christ, our lives should be one glad song of praise. (1 Thess. v. 16; Phil. iv. 4.)

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

THIRD WEEK OF GENERAL MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

A NEW departure was made on Monday of last week (October 30), by the commencement of a series of afternoon meetings (from one to two o'clock) to be addressed by Rev. John McNeil, in St. George's Parish Church, which is situated within about a hundred yards of the Chamber of Commerce, and in the very centre of the busiest part of the city. Seven and a half years ago, when Mr. McNeill was conducting one of his memorable missions in the city, a similar series of gatherings attracted a great deal of attention, and was followed by much blessing. He says himself that in the course of his subsequent journeyings over the world, he has had them recalled to him in all parts of the Colonies, by Glasgow men who were present, and who were helped by means of them into a new and higher life.

There was an excellent gathering on Monday, and the audiences were still larger when the meetings became more widely known. The opening address was based on the Healing of the Impotent Man at the Pool of Bethesda (John v.), and a deep impression was made as the speaker drove home, with great emphasis and pertinacity, the question, "Wilt thou be made whole?" Such meetings have, on past occasions, been among the most hopeful features of evangelistic work in Glasgow, and have left abiding results on the business and professional life of the city.

A further change in the work was the moving of each centre for evening services to another church within the bounds of the division. The evangelists who remained also found new spheres of labour; and, as some were obliged to leave on account of engagements elsewhere, several new names appeared on the list of speakers. On the whole, the average of the attendances was maintained over the whole area.

MR. RICHARD HILL AT WORK.

Among the voices heard in the Campaign, this week for the first time was that of Mr. Richard Hill, who has, however, a wide circle of friends in Glasgow. He is now holding the fort in Brownfield Parish Church (Rev. Matthew Crawford), a quaint old building situated in Brown Street, Anderston. The district is one of the most difficult fields of work in the city, being peopled chiefly by dock labourers and others of the casual class. Even an experienced evangelist like Mr. Hill could be heard, in his prayers, pouring out his soul to God, with unusual depth of feeling, on account of the drunkenness and degradation of the men and women round about.

The meetings were not large, but testimony was not lacking of blessing being granted from the very outset. When we looked in on Tuesday evening, we found the evangelist bright and hopeful, speaking words full of fatherly counsel and encouragement to the Christians present. In the special circumstances much importance was to be attached to the testimony at the street corner, as reaching the ears of those whom no invitation would induce to come within doors. In addition, a special appeal was made to each person present to fasten on one unconverted friend or neighbour, and endeavour to bring him to the meeting—this having been, in many cases within Mr. Hill's personal experience, the most fruitful of all methods of work.

The address was based on Heb. vii. 25, chiefly the word "uttermost," and was mainly addressed to backsliders. With an apology for lack of orthodoxy, these were described as coming within the reach of such a salvation, though "the worst sinners of all." The whole tone was one of winning persuasion, and it was pointed out for the encouragement of all who are in this pit that the Pentecostal sermon was preached by the Apostle Peter.

At the little after meeting, Mr. Morrison (of the Seamen's Bethel) and Mr. Hill went from pew to pew, and had a helpful and stimulating word for all—saint and penitent alike. Rev. G. L. Carstairs, an old fellow-labourer with Mr. Hill, also lent a helping hand in the devotions and otherwise.

South of the Clyde.

Mr. Hugh Paton has followed up the work begun in the Gorbals district by Mr. Henry Varley, the place of meeting, however, being removed to the Parish Church (Rev. Andrew Leiper). From the beginning, the marks of the former mission were visible in the gathering in of workers from other churches and denominations. Indeed, in every direction all barriers and divisions are disappearing, and Christians of every name are working side by side, as perhaps never before, in the great common work of the Master.

Monday evening was wet and stormy; yet, under the most unfavourable conditions, a "sweet little open-air meeting"—as one who was present called it—was held at the street corner. The gathering afterwards was not large, but the Lord was manifestly present, and the evangelist himself felt greatly encouraged and strengthened by the excellent spirit which pervaded it. In this particular case no other congregation is formally associated with the one in whose church the mission is being held; but the workers are loyally rallying round the leaders, and individuals from outside are rendering valuable help.

Mr. Paton has a habit of taking short, striking texts, calculated to dwell readily in the memory of his hearers; and on Monday he chose the words, "Christ died," from Rom. v. 8. He said himself that he was not appealing to the reason, but "trying to tug at the heart-strings." The address was a most searching one, as he brought home (1) the wonderfulness, (2) the loneliness, (3) the shamefulness, and (4) the painfulness of the death of the Lord on Calvary. It was evident from the rapt attention of the audience, and the look in their eyes, that in most of the cases the appeal—to let the words ring through their minds as they went along the streets, as they lay in bed, and as they passed to work in the morning—was scarcely needed. Mr. Paton's simple, homely style of speaking appeals strongly to his Scottish audiences, who feel at once that he is a man from among themselves. More than one was impressed by the naturalness of his reference to the circumstances under which his own conversion took place over nine years ago.

No after meeting was held on this opening evening, but advantage was taken of a request by the evangelist that any who wished to learn more about the way of salvation would come to the front for copies of a booklet, "Safety, Certainty, and Enjoyment," which he said had been helpful to not a few in his meetings in another part of the city during the previous fortnight. Among prominent workers in the audience were Mr. W. D. Dunn and Pastor David J. Findlay.

CENTRAL MEETINGS.

In the very heart of the city Rev. Robert Hamilton (Grangemouth) is meeting with encouragement in connection with a mission in Greyfriars United Presbyterian Church. The meetings grew in size as the week advanced, those who came at first returning with their friends. On Wednesday a touching request—delayed for a day through difficulty in deciphering—for prayer was presented. A man who had found salvation asked God's people to intercede for his wife, who had been unfaithful and had gone very far astray, as well as for their boy of eight. Although this was done before any address had been given, whenever an opportunity was given for others to indicate that they had burdens to lay before the Lord, it was readily taken advantage of; and the meeting was shown to contain quite a number who were there to pray for absent friends. Thereafter the preacher drew attention to the Saviour's tears for the people of Jerusalem (Luke xix. 41, 42), and showed that He is the same to-day that He was then.

Mr. Charles Inglis is now seeing his desire in a larger attendance of the flotsam and jetsam of society—from the immediate neighbourhood of the Tent Hall—at his meetings, and is proving anew the power of God to save to the very uttermost. Conspicuous among others who are lending valuable help are Mr. William Clyde, Mr. Andrew Ferrie, and Mr. David Pratt; and their testimony is that not only fresh arrivals, but some who have been in and out of the meetings for months past, are being led out into the clear light.

Preaching on "The Way" (Isaiah xxxv. 8-10), Mr. Inglis pressed home (1) the narrowness, (2) the plainness, (3) the publicity, (4) the uniqueness of it, and (5) the prospects of its being closed. When he finished, the entire gathering was turned into an inquiry meeting, and a great readiness to talk about the needs of the soul was manifested all round.

MR. MCNEILL'S WORK

Rev. John McNeil has closed his second series of evening services. This time the duration was only one week, and the scene, Blackfriars Parish Church, Dennistoun. The work in this neighbourhood has flourished exceptionally from the outset, when Mr. George Clarke preached in a neighbouring church, and these evenings have shown a still growing interest. On Friday, the weather was stormy and wet, but the great building was filled as usual. The subject was "The Story of the Passover" (Ex. xii.), and we have never heard the place of "the Blood" in the plan of Salvation explained with greater power and clearness. "The last link is the Blood sprinkled on the individual door-post, with the individual first-born behind it. The Blood in the basin saved nobody. Nobody is saved in a vague, general, sentimental fashion, mercly because Jesus has died. The Blood must be sprinkled quickly, or it will not sprinkle; apply it to your hearts, or it may be too late. The bunch of hyssop was a common article of domestic use, applied to a new purpose, and from that day it became a holy thing in Israel. The corresponding last link is faith. It is a homely thing, in daily use, to be put to a new and blessed service."

Presumably because of the length of the service—the address alone having lasted about 100 minutes—no mention was made of an after meeting, or offer of conversation with any desiring it. But many faces told of a profound impression, of hearts touched to the quick. "The Lord be with you," said Mr. McNeill, as he passed quickly down the pulpit steps; and the Lord was indeed in the midst.

The other evangelists at work in different parts of the city were Mr. D. M. Bayne (Victoria Park U.P. Church), Rev. J. Grange Bennett (Hillhead Baptist Church), Mr. Charles Galletly (Garngad U.P. Church), Rev. Dr. Robbins (Shettleston Parish Church), Rev. D. M. Cameron (Barrowfield Free Church), Mr. James Marshall (Govan E.U. Church), Rev. Thomas Wilson (White Memorial Free Church), and Mr. Arthur Klein (Hutchesontown Free Church). In every case the meetings have been encouraging, with a deep sense of the Divine presence.

JUVENILE MEETINGS.

In addition to his general oversight of the Children's Meetings over the whole area, Mr. Alexander McKeith is finding time to take a personal share in carrying out the work. On Monday evening we found him at Augustine Free Church, which is situated in a densely populated working-class locality in the far south-east of the city. The evening was cold, with drenching showers of rain and hail, but nothing deters Glasgow children when a meeting has been properly announced. Long before the hour for beginning a large audience was assembled; and Mr. McKeith's colleague in the work—Mr. John Stewart, well and widely known as "The Children's Evangelist"—displayed the powers of adaptability in which lie the secret of much success among children. No harmoniumist was available, so the children were kept singing their favourite hymns to the accompaniment of Mr. Stewart's cornet.

Mr. McKeith always asserts his belief that, wherever you have a child in attendance at a religious meeting, you have a soul either within or very near the Kingdom. So all his energies are bent to the work of explaining to them the real nature of "the single step" which many of them have to take, and experience has shown that his methods are fruitful in the best results. The story of the Pilgrim's Progress is still his favourite groundwork, and he always regards the Gospel lantern as his most useful tool.

The first meeting is limited to about three-quarters of an hour, and all energies are concentrated on working up to the dealing with those whose deeper attention has been aroused. All pressure is carefully avoided. The way of salvation is explained in a brief, simple way. Many volunteer a profession of love to the Saviour, which the workers have the best of reasons for accepting as readily as in the case of adults. Before leaving, names and addresses are taken, with particulars of Sabbath school connections and teachers' names; and this information is carefully forwarded to the proper quarters, that each case may be followed up by those best qualified to do so.

Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Raphael (Ardrossan) are taking charge of the services in Free St. James' Church. The "having of the texts"—a feature at several centres—was here entered into with great heartiness. The children had evidently been using their Bibles at home, and the verses they brought gave evidence of a real entering into the spirit of the work, as well as a close connection with the truths taught on earlier evenings. The audiences were made up largely from the immediate surroundings. At the quiet little after meetings, hearts were gladdened at the display of an interest in spiritual things.

The following speakers were also engaged in work among the young: Mr. J. W. Van de Venter, Mr. J. S. Hewlett, Mr. Thomas Pratt, Rev. William Baird, Mr. Walter C. Steven, Mr. James Wilson, and Mr. William Thomson, jun. Many Sabbath school teachers are having their hearts made glad within them by receiving outward evidence that their patient and faithful sowing of the Good Seed has been blessed by the Lord of the Harvest.

INCIDENTS AT THE MEETINGS.

An old grey-haired man, brought up in the Highlands, was led to an assurance he had not before believed possible.

At one mission a blind woman was led to the Saviour, and for some days after, she brought a fresh individual to the Church every evening, each of whom was able to make a profession of conversion.

One man, a workman about thirty-five, returned on Tuesday evening to tell of having been led to the Lord in the open-air on Sunday. He was finding joy in making the confession, the prospect which had terrors for him at first.

We sat beside a young man, not over thirty, who had been spoken to on the previous evening, but who could not be rid of his difficulties. On his return he declared that he had quite made up his mind to go on as he had been doing, and even after being pleaded with, adhered to this determination, but admitted that still he felt drawn to the meetings. Christians are praying for him.

Fighting Rome in Canada.

THE DANGERS OF CONVENT SCHOOLS.

THE great danger of the present day, not only in this country, but in our colonies, and especially in the Dominion of Canada, is the multiplication of convent schools, or institutions bearing some specious title, under the control and direction of sisters or nuns. The convent schools are simply traps in which to catch the young and turn them into devotees of the paganism of Popery. By alluring advertisements and circulars, the public are assured that Protestant children can be sent there with perfect safety, and that no attempt will be made to proselytize or interfere with their religion. But it is notorious that scarcely any girl who has been placed in one of these institutions ever leaves without the germs, at least, of Romanism having been implanted or imbibed.

Why, it may be asked, are the convent schools able to cater to such an extent for Protestant children, and to offer the low terms which induce parents to place their children in the charge of the sisters? The answer is an easy and ready one. It is the main object of the convent school to catch Protestant children, in order insidiously to turn them into Romanists. To enable them to do this, they are richly endowed, and are by no means dependent upon the fees paid. Moreover, they have to pay no salaries, for the teachers, being nuns, are bound by vows of poverty, and receive nothing The expenses, then, of a convent school are proportionately extremely low; and, being well financed, they can easily underbid Protestant schools.

Demill Ladies' College.

It will at once be seen that the convent school question is a serious and far-reaching one, and it is enhanced all the more when it is borne in mind that the convents are never thrown open to any public inspection. There is no knowing what goes on inside them. Neither is it possible, as the law stands at present, to bring any sort of control to bear upon their operations.

This question is brought before us the more forcibly by the visit to this country of Rev. A. B. Demill, president of the Demill Ladies' College, St. Catherine's, Ontario, Canada. In the Dominion the Roman Church is now building convent schools by the hundred, professedly for education, but really as mission stations, where, under the pretence of educating the girls, they would secure them and orphans from thoughtless and indifferent Protestant guardians. Mr. Demill early felt a special call to combat the inroads of Romanism, and, after a hard struggle and much opposition, he finally succeeded in erecting the Ladies' College in 1876. The institution had for its main object competition with the convent schools, making its fees as low as theirs. The success of the college was very marked from the time of its opening till 1890, when commercial depression visited Canada. In that year alone the income from students dropped £1,000. The depression continued till 1897, but in the meantime other troubles came. In 1896 the college was accidentally destroyed by fire. Thus, with one loss and another (in spite of insurance), more than £10,500 was sunk in a period of about seven years.

Not discouraged by these severe reverses, Mr. Demill, sixteen days after the fire, opened the school in temporary premises, and the classes continued for those preparing for their degrees. Shortly afterwards another property, which was intended when built for a first-class hotel, was offered at a reasonable price, and was purchased by the College trustees for £6,000. It is a brick building of immense size, capable of accommodating from 150 to 200 students. Some £2,000 has already been paid on behalf of this purchase, which also covers the installation of a heating apparatus for the premises. The loss, however, has been so heavy, that the payments are in danger of falling through, leaving the trustees liable to lose all they have paid, and necessitate the work being given up altogether.

Three Protestant schools in Canada have already been sold to Roman Catholics, because they did not pay financially. The Romish Church, by its methods, manages to make them pay. There are now no fewer than fourteen convent schools in the city of Toronto alone. In one of them, Mr. Demill says, there are over 300 Protestant girls. Mr. Demill has come to England to collect money to enable the trustees to relieve the College of debt and to carry on the work. There are, doubtless, many among our readers who will be glad to help in such a good work. Mr Demill's indefatigable courage under unusual disappointments must appeal on behalf of his cause. We give an illustration of the present College building, to which a Government charter has been granted, and which has been duly incorporated as a college. Mr. Demill's address during his stay in England is 4, Grove Road, Redland, Bristol.

The South American Evangelical Mission has for its object the evangelization of "the Neglected Continent," for this mainly relying upon united prayer and effort at home. The list of forty-five prayer circles, with which a recent report opens, is highly interesting, and much blessing must result from such a systematic remembrance of the work before the Lord. An excellent account of work "in the heart of Brazil" is given. The offices of the Mission are, Room 31, Association Buildings, 58, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool. At the end of this booklet is a list of "Letter Circles," which must go far to stimulate and keep alive interest in mission work.

The British and Foreign Sailors' Society has for many years been engaged in efforts to bring about the spiritual, moral, and social improvement of our sailors. It is proposed to add, next year, seven buildings to the home and foreign stations, for the use of bluejackets, merchant seamen, fishermen, and others. A very interesting ceremony took place recently in connection with the Society's centre at Great Yarmouth, where the foundation-stones of a New Mariners' Chapel and Institute were laid. One bore the inscription, "This stone was laid for H.R.H. the Duchess of Fife, the friend and helper of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society." About £1,500 are still needed to open the building free of debt. Communications may be sent to the secretary, Rev. C. Parkhurst Baxter, M.A., British and Foreign Sailors Society, Gleneagle Road, Streatham, S.W.

The Scriptures for France.

IN visiting Continental and other countries, it has been my happy privilege, during many years past, to take with me and distribute, as opportunity offered, Gospels, Testaments, and Bibles, printed in the language of the country through which I travelled. I had this privilege during the last French Exhibition, and again this summer in making a tour through Normandy. The books were received so readily, and appeared in many cases to be so positively unknown, that I have since been deeply pondering whether it would not be possible to obtain the co-operation of British Christians so as to provide for more extended distribution of God's Word in France.

I am fully aware that already useful and excellent work in this direction is being done by others in different countries of the world, and that preparations are now going forward for giving the Scriptures to the visitors to the coming Exhibition; but I believe that no organization exists at present with the definite object of circulating the Scriptures as a free gift among the many millions of France alone.

I feel deeply that, while we are sending the Gospel to the extremities of the earth, the nation that lies at our door, and that is thirsting for the Word of God, has the first claim upon our sympathy. A young officer, whom I met at the English service in Rouen, told me that he had never seen a copy of the New Testament before; and a number of soldiers at Dieppe, engaged in an exciting game, were shortly afterwards seen seated and attentively reading some Gospels which I had given them. Surely England, with her generous heart, will meet this great need, and send to France that glad Gospel of Light and Love that has made Britain great among the nations.

My present thought is to form a society for the organized free distribution of the Scriptures in France by itinerating French Christian agents, who would visit town and country, judiciously placing the Word of God whenever opportunity serves. Ladies and gentlemen willing to co-operate in this work will kindly address, "Bible for France," 250, Kennington Park Road, S.E.—Yours truly, C. F.

Soldiers in India.

ONE of the missionaries of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission has been spending part of her holiday in charge of the Soldiers' Home at Murree to relieve Miss Ashe, the indefatigable superintendent. She has experienced a time of memorable blessing amongst the soldiers, and writes as follows:—

"It is so interesting to know how nearly all the men who find their way to this Home are the sons of praying mothers. It gives one such hope and confidence in working amongst them. On Sunday night they thronged in, we had not even seats for the 200 or more men; and about thirty come every night to the meeting. One man said in his testimony, it had been a woman who was the cause of his fall, and by a woman's (Miss Ashe's) help he had risen.

"A fine cavalry man for whom we had been praying much came out on Sunday night. He prayed, 'Depth of mercy! Can there be mercy still reserved for me?' Directly these men have been saved themselves, they have worked and prayed for their 'chums.' On Sunday night, the men sharing one tent knelt together to praise a new-found Saviour, and by this mail letters have gone to their praying mothers telling them their boys are saved. And it is no idea with them; the grace of God is manifested.

"They are nearly all cavalry men, several of the Royal Horse Artillery, and of the Dragoon Guards, who are off to Africa. They joined hands on Sunday night round the organ, as I played, and sang, 'God be with you, till we meet again.' Five of these left the next day for the Transvaal. Talking of it, one said with a radiant face, 'It may be a bullet, but then a crown.' He was an old Christian, a splendid fellow. When they are Christians, they are fine ones.

"The prayers of those just saved have been so delightfully simple. 'Lord, grip our hands so tight that we can't get away.' 'We have had such a splendid day with the Lord.' One man, very anxious for his brother's salvation, prayed 'These men are much too good for the devil, Lord.' It is so lovely to hear of the little prayer meetings all over the hills.

"Side by side with this work, we have had large meetings for the fashionable ladies. One felt many of them knew little more than the heathen, and they were all people of influence, and might be so useful. We are thankful to know of definite cases of blessing, where ladies of position have entirely given up their previous worldliness, and declared themselves on the side of Christ."

A Swedish Convention.

WRITING from Stockholm, Mr. John Edward Nonnen says:—"We have just had our meeting for deepening of the spiritual life. It was held at Sodertelge, and there were between 300 and 400 present. We must thank God for the gracious manifestation of his power and presence. People came from all parts of Sweden, and some from Denmark, Norway, and Finland. Believers in Christ of many different sections of the visible church and different classes of society, came together. As united prayer was offered, and God, through the speakers, opened up his Word, there seemed to be only one desire among all present.

"Though the message given through various speakers was very different in wording, there seemed a great harmony in spirit, and all I met seemed deeply grateful to God; though there was, no doubt, much that was painful, both when the Spirit searched the heart, and when Rev. C. Inwood explained that walking with Christ would mean walking, as regards men, very much alone. Afterwards, our friend put it even stronger, in Stockholm, where he said that walking close to Christ would mean separation even from carnally minded Christians; but when the Christian follows close to Christ, he is richly compensated for what he loses through Christians not understanding him.

"In Stockholm, Mr. Inwood spoke of God's promises in Ezekiel xxxvi. 25-27. In the Y.M.C.A. rooms there was a deeply-interesting lecture on what Mr. Inwood saw of missions during his visit to China. One of the converts he saw baptized was the firstfruit from the town where two Swedish missionaries had been killed. A lecture was given in English on following Christ, which was largely attended by Englishmen and English-speaking Swedes, chiefly wealthy people. It must have been a great boon to many to hear the clear words of counsel and comfort. Many rich Christians have, perhaps, a more lonely life than those poorer."

The Sabrevois Mission.

THE great work which the Sabrevois Mission has accomplished in the cause of evangelical Protestantism among the French Canadians, was recently outlined in our columns by Rev. Henry E. Benoit, who now writes to us: "Of the £4,000 which the Bishop of Montreal sent me to ask of the Christian people of England, I have received £2,700. Of this amount, £1,300 is in promises, conditional upon the whole sum being secured by July 1, 1900. The principal of the Sabrevois schools wrote recently, begging me to return speedily, as I was greatly needed."

Communications may be addressed Mr. Benoit, at 3, Thanet Place, Temple Bar, London, W.C.

Among the Poor of Berlin.—In connection with the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. C. H. Schaarschmidt is developing an interesting philanthropic agency in Berlin. The poor of the city are not without friends; our Methodist friend aims to help them on evangelical lines. He is opening a shelter, and in other ways showing sympathy and kindness in the name of Christ. Mr. Schaarschmidt is known to Rev. Darlow Sergeant, and communications may be addressed to him to the care of Mr. Heilemann, 691, Fulham Road, S.W.

The Way to Zion.

IN a recent issue, Dr. Andrew Moody told a touching story of Jewish unrest and desire for a peaceful condition of life. Many of our readers were doubtless impressed by the tale of woe, so often told since the days when Israel came into the inheritance of the long foretold curse—"Among the nations thou shalt find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest; . . thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, . . and thou shalt fear day and night" (Deut. xxviii. 64-68).

Dr. Moody's pathetic story has set many of our readers thinking, and others have been devising liberal things for the relief of some of the sorrowing children of Israel. Mr. E. A. Rawlence, of Salisbury, as a student of the prophetic Scriptures and a political observer, makes a suggestion: The Soudan needs people and money. Why not colonize it with Jews? He continues:

In the latter part of Deut. xxviii. we get an awfully true picture of Israel's present condition amongst the nations; but in the last verse they are told, "And Jehovah shall bring you into Egypt again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, 'thou shalt see it no more again,' and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you." Israel has never yet been brought into Egypt "again with ships," and this wording would seem to point to the fact that some maritime power will be the means of bringing them there, and when they are there they will have to undergo their final time of trouble from the king of the North (see Dan. xi. 42, 43).

In the wonderful account of the final gathering given in the eleventh chapter of Isaiah, the chief points from which they are to be gathered are "from Assyria and from Egypt, and from Pathros and from Cush," &c. (v. 11); and v. 16 describes the gathering "like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt." Pathros is Upper Egypt, the ancient Pelores or Southern Land, exactly corresponding with the modern Soudan. Other passages to a similar effect are: Is. xxvii. 12, 13, and lii. 4 (the Assyrian being the king of the North, Dan. xi. 42). Zech. x. 10, speaks of bringing them again also out of the land of Egypt.

As to the political grounds, it is scarcely likely that the Sultan will allow any great body of Jews to settle in so revered a site as Palestine is to the Mohammedans, for Jerusalem is their second sacred city, Mecca being the first. What more likely, therefore, than that the Jews should settle on either side in Assyria and Egypt, ready to step into their own possession when the time comes?

Rev. J. T. Webster, of Budapest, writes to say that he has visited the Jews from whom the appeal for succour emanated. He found the facts as represented in the letters; the people were in deep poverty, and earnestly desirous of being sent to Cyprus to found an agricultural colony there. The Scriptures have been read in this interesting little community, and ten of the men wish to confess Christ as their Saviour and Lord. From this it would seem that the people have a more than general claim upon Christian compassion. Whether they remain where they are, or are removed to more congenial surroundings, they desire to meet for Christian worship, and doubtless many who feel for them will help to make it possible for Dr. Moody to administer assistance as may be wise and needed. Communications to Dr. Moody should be addressed Rudolf Quai 8, Budapest.

Christian Literature Society for India.—With reference to the need of an organization of this type in India, Dr. Murdoch writes: "India is the favourite hunting ground of religious charlatans, fanatics, and teachers of various subtle and seductive errors, and yet there never was a time when the people were so interested in Christ. Their religious thirst and unrest are marked and great. Much as God has enabled the Society to do in the past, there remains more to be done." The secretary of the Society is Rev. G. Patterson, 7, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.

Madras.—Rev. M. Tindall writes: "Mr. William Hill, evangelist, has been labouring for three months in the Methodist Episcopal Church, Madras, and the closing weeks of his stay there have been crowned with blessing. The praise and testimony meeting revealed how deeply the Holy Spirit had wrought in the hearts of all sorts and conditions of people, ranging from ten to sixty years of age."

Between.

IT was evening, and the children's bed-time. After fun and laughter and romping, two little children were at last tucked up in their beds, and stillness reigned, while an elder sister read the day's portion from one of Miss Havergal's dear little books for the bairns. They had been through "Little Pillows" so many times that now they were reading "Morning Bells" at night, and the subject on this particular evening was "Soldiers." Very simply the big sister tried to drive home the thought that a soldier must fight on one side or another; that he could not belong to both at the same time. She was interrupted by a little voice, as a head popped up from the bed in the corner, saying, "Oh, no, Danny; you can be between!"

Such a lot of other children, and grown-up people too, think, if they do not say, "you can be between;" but Jesus says, "He that is not with Me is against Me." Boys and girls know what it is to be with another in any school dispute—what it is to take sides, and to throw themselves heart and soul into helping on their side. Well, there is a great battle always going on in this world—a contest between light and darkness, holiness and sin, right and wrong, between the soldiers of Jesus and the soldiers of Satan, the great enemy of Jesus.

Everybody, old and young, is in one or other of the two armies. Do you know in which you are? Satan's army will be defeated, for Jesus conquered Satan on the cross of Calvary, and though sometimes now it seems as if Satan was getting the best of it, yet it will be seen, and perhaps very soon, that Jesus is the real conqueror. Then how glad those will be who have fought with Him through many a battle here! J. C.

M.E. Mission, Sironcha, C.P., India, October 10, 1899.

My Dear Uncle Tom,—I would like to become one of your Bible searchers. My name is Sydney Madden, aged eleven years. I am going to boarding school next January; at present I am living at home with my parents.

My papa is a missionary here, and we live in the jungle: and it is very lonely for us, as we are the only Europeans living here except one other lady, who is a missionary. But still I am always busy; I do my lessons every day, and I help my mamma do little things. I know Hindustani, and sometimes I talk to the people about the Love of God, and I also sell Gospels and Bibles to the people.

A few months ago I went touring with my papa; we travelled 153 miles by bullock cart over rough roads, but I enjoyed myself very much. Going along one night we came across seven big bears. They stood right in the way of our carts. We stopped, and my papa, who was riding horseback, had his rifle in a pouch hanging by the side of the horse, and he drew it out and fired among them. They got frightened, and run off into the thick jungle.

We stopped at one place called Ahiri; my papa and one native preacher talked to the people, and I also spoke to a lot of native boys about God and about keeping the Sabbath Day holy. They were so interested, and wanted me to stay with them.

I want a magic-lantern very badly, with pictures of the life of Christ; or I would like some just plain Bible pictures—the native people are very fond of looking at pictures. I could do a good deal if I had a magic-lantern; but my papa cannot afford one, as he has to spend a good deal of his money in mission work. But I feel sure that Jesus will send me one, He always does when I ask Him.

I am sending you the Bible questions by this mail. I hope you will accept me as one of your band. I like your stories very much. Good-bye, Uncle Tom. I will write again to you and tell you more about my work if you would like to hear.—From your loving Nephew, Sydney Wilber Madden.

Levallois Perret.

Dear "Uncle Tom,"—It is really very kind of you giving space in the "Young People's" page for the article on "Little French Cousins." I showed our bairns all the recognisable words, and translated most of it for them. All looked very pleased, and asked lots of questions. Louise and Ernestine are very pleased at the prospect of receiving certificates, and remark they are going to try très bien the next time for a prize. The "Searcher" has become such a pleasure for them, it would be punishment to prevent them doing the questions now.—With kindest regards, believe me, very sincerely yours, Matron of Home.

Wellington Hall.—The friends at Wellington Road Mission Hall, Stoke Newington, N., are making an effort to clear the debt, which has become a source of grave embarrassment. The committee would deplore being obliged to discontinue the week-night services in order to secure an income by letting the hall for public meetings; yet this or a more serious step they will be compelled to take if help is not forthcoming. To close the Sunday school alone, which is so well attended by the children of the district, and for whom there is no suitable provision elsewhere, would be a matter for regret. The treasurer is Mr. W. D. Merry, 54, Walsingham Road, Clapton, N.E.

The Protestant Reformation Society, in its quarterly paper, deals with questions now agitating the National Church. Rev. Dr. Waller's article on "Evening Communion" is an enlarged edition of a shorter article, which appeared in the same magazine some three years ago. Dr. Wright's contribution on "The Wearing of the Cope and Mitre," though brief, is unanswerable, and we wish we could see its teaching carried into effect. The third article, "The Progress of Rome in England," furnishes some sad reading. Readers who may need further proofs of the real tendency and teaching of Ritualism, should not fail to read this article. The seventy-second annual report of the Society shows that excellent work is in progress, and also how much remains to be done. Office of the Society: 62, Berners Street, W.

Village Work.—At Barford, a Warwickshire village, a lady has opened her house for weekly gatherings, chiefly of an evangelistic character. A friend writes: "Will any of the Lord's people, having a small unused American organ, give it for help in the Gospel work in this needy village, and pray for us?" Address Miss Archer, Barford, Warwick.

National Protestant Congress.

THE National Protestant Congress has this year been held in Manchester. It began on October 29, and was attended by delegates from all parts of the kingdom. Mr. H. J. Birch presided at the opening meeting, and, in the course of a stirring address, maintained that the great antidote to Ritualism and Romanism was personal salvation. Rev. Thomas Dickinson followed, speaking of the heavenly character of the Church of God. Rev. Dr. Marshall Randles delivered an address, dealing with the influence of the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It was for those there assembled, and such as they, to say whether the English people would agree to have the Reformation undone, and the nation taken back to the system which prevailed during the Middle Ages.

Dr. H. Grattan Guinness spoke of the earthly mission of the Church. It was for the Master to decide what the work was. They must look less to man and more to Christ for guidance in their work.

At the afternoon session on Tuesday, the chair was occupied by Mr. Thomas Hayward (Manchester), and Rev. Robert Middleton spoke at some length on "Indefiniteness in the Pulpit." What the minister was, the people would be. People could not possibly sit comfortably under preaching that was not truly, really, clearly, and powerfully definite. Pastor F. E. Marsh (Sunderland) gave an address on "Worldliness in the Pew." He deprecated the adoption by the Church of worldly means by which to carry on God's work.

The subject for discussion at the evening session was Ritualism—first, under two heads—"A Modern Innovation;" and, secondly, "A Roman Reproduction." The chairman was Mr. Louis P. Nott, who dealt with the Ritualistic ideals of worship, which, he maintained, tend to reunion with the Apostate Church of Rome, and the persecuting churches of the East. Rev. Dr. C. H. H. Wright (London) spoke of Ritualism as an innovation from the point of view of Gospel truth, and from the standpoint of the Christian Church of this country. Rev. W. C. Minifie (Bradford) contended that Ritualism was nothing but Romanism in Anglican guise.

Wednesday morning saw Dr. Goodrich in the chair. He spoke of the spirit in which positive Protestant instruction should be given. Practical Englishmen, he said, did not care much for the questions of Apostolical succession or transubstantiation; but when they perceived that the Roman Catholic Church vitiated the love of truth, corrupted the sense of justice, and ignored the sense of honour, they would awake to the fact that the dominance of the Roman Catholic Church in England and elsewhere meant the sapping of the morality of the nation, the beating down of its spirit of liberty, and its love of truth. Mr. W. A. Limbrick, organizing secretary of the Protestant Reformation Society, London, advocated popular educational lectures on Protestant truth and Roman error.

At the afternoon session, Revs. T. H. Sparshott (Wimbledon) and Alexander Roger gave addresses on Protestantism, the former dealing with its present position, and the latter with its future prospects.

In the evening Mr. Frank Spence occupied the chair, and spoke of the developments of rationalism on the continent. Higher criticism was strongly denounced by Rev. Dr. Bullinger (London), who maintained that true Christians need be in no panic over this matter, because if critics got rid of the Bible there would be a lot more left than they would believe or obey.

At the morning meeting on Thursday, the work among and by women was discussed. Mrs. Arbuthnot presided, and spoke of the Women's Protestant Union. Miss Miller addressed the meeting on "Romanism or Protestantism—which, for country, home, and woman?" Mrs. Soper dealt with "Bible Light for Romish Darkness."

In the afternoon the chair was taken by Mrs. J. W. D. Barron, who vigorously defended the rights of women to take part in controversial questions. Mrs. Arbuthnot dealt with "Personal Responsibility," and Miss Augusta Cook with "Romanism and Ritualism: their Foundation of Sand."

Mr. A. J. Fletcher presided at the last meeting of the Congress, which was largely attended. He spoke of the origin of the Manchester Protestant Thousand, and said he hoped no member would allow his Protestantism to be overridden by political passion, or put his principles aside for the sake of his politics. Revs. Thomas Connellan and Jacob Primmer gave vigorous addresses.

If debate was the order of the day, the proceedings were by no means destitute of a spirit of devotion, while they showed an earnest concern for the progress of Gospel truth.

Scottish Notes.

AT the first public meeting of the Christian Social Union, held in Edinburgh last week, it was explained that the aims of the association are: (1) to claim for the Christian law the ultimate authority to rule social practice; (2) to study in common how to apply the moral truths and principles of Christianity to the social and economical difficulties of the present time; and (3) to present Christ in practical life as the loving Master and King, the enemy of wrong and selfishness, the power of righteousness and love. Canon Scott Holland gave an address on "The Demand for Christian Citizens."

Speaking last week at the opening of new halls for Morningside Parish Church, Edinburgh, Dr. Blair said that though the work of such a congregation might not have to contend with all the baneful influences of a slum district, there was a great deal of missionary work that could be undertaken among fashionable squares and terraces.

Sabbath last (November 5) was observed as "Children's Day" throughout the Free Church of Scotland.

A new Children's Shelter has been opened in Dundee—built at a cost of £900, and fitted up for £800. The present income of £150 will only meet one-half of the requirements in future, but it is hoped that the remainder will be easily obtained by subscription.

The Scottish Y.W.C.A. hopes to despatch lady workers to visit and teach girls who are employed in the fish-curing industry at Peterhead, Wick, and Aberdeen, and also to stimulate the branch Associations, particularly those in the heart of the country. At a recent meeting on the subject, held in Edinburgh, the Countess of Moray referred in earnest terms to the urgent need for work in both of the departments referred to.

Personalia.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan reached home from America last week; and, at a special gathering at New Court Chapel, Tollington Park, received a warm welcome back to his pastoral sphere.

Professor W. R. Newell, of the Chicago Bible Institute, writes: "Our evening Bible classes are opening up with excellent promise. We have the largest and most deeply-interested classes we have ever had."

Rev. George H. Giddins, secretary of the Evangelical Continental Society, recently attended the jubilee synod of the Union of Evangelical Churches of France, held in Paris, and the annual assembly of the Evangelical Church of Italy, held in Florence. He also visited the Free Evangelical Churches in northern Spain.

Mr. Henry Thorne has met with a severe accident. While in Manchester, conducting a mission, he was knocked down by a passing horse and van, and one wheel of the vehicle passed over his feet. It will be some time before he is free from the effects of the injury and nervous shock. He asks prayer, that he may be thoroughly restored to health.

Mr. and Mrs. John Holehouse, of Newport, Mon., recently celebrated their golden wedding. More than fifty years since Mr. Holehouse drove the mail coach between Abergavenny and Merthyr Tydvil. Coming under the influence of strong religious convictions, he declined to continue Sunday driving. Subsequently, however, the authorities arranged to send the London mail by a fresh route, and gave Mr. Holehouse the contract for the mail to the north, which was despatched only six days a week.

Oxford Letter.

[BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

OXFORD has had an impressive object-lesson before her, during the last week, in the form of a huge exhibition held in connection with the C.M.S. For those who had ears to hear, each court had its distinct message, and each "Exhibit" its special call. Thousands from the outlying districts visited the exhibition, and, doubtless, in many a heart missionary interest was aroused. Not least among the benefits accruing is the blessing on the stewards, hundreds of whom were employed to assist in the courts. Many of them spoke for Christ for the first time, and as they pointed out to visitors the objects of interest.

"On what principle shall I use my freedom?" was the burden of the Bishop of Hereford's message from the 'Varsity pulpit on Sunday week. There was a splendid audience of undergraduates, and very impressively did the Bishop deny that "he liveth best who free liveth," and urged the men not to allow their habits and tone to sink to a lower standard than that of the Christian home they had left. "Join no companionship; drift into no habit which will rob you of self-respect." "Have the moral courage of your highest convictions and aspirations," was the burden of his appeal.

Very timely was the message of the Master of Pembroke at St. Aldate's on Sunday evening. For fifty minutes he kept the interest of a large congregation, taking as his subject, "The Claims of Holy Scripture." We give a few thoughts from a remarkable sermon: "Criticism may modify some views of the shell of Scripture; it can never affect its inner life." "The Bible grew; book after book won its way into the canon; the ring of inspiration was recognised." The Bible will only yield its treasures to careful research. Search (rummage) the Scriptures." The Bible claims to direct the whole of a man's life."

The annual meeting of the Oxford Auxiliary of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held on Monday. The Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, presided. His address was marked by simplicity, directness, and spiritual power. Referring to the origin and growth of the Society, he said, "God loves to build upon nothing." He gave three reasons why he supported the Bible Society. It was because it was such a friend of faith and good works. For nearly 100 years it had extended its help to all who were trying to benefit their fellow-creatures, a help chiefly felt in missionary work. The Society was moreover the friend of peace. Revs. J. Sharp, R. Wardlaw Thompson, and Dr. Fairbairn were the other speakers. Mr. Sharp remarked that President Kruger was a subscriber to the Society.

The Railway Mission.

THE Autumnal Conference of the Railway Mission in Scotland was held at Glasgow on October 28 and 29. Over thirty delegates were present from various branches, and gave very encouraging accounts of progress and blessing in the work of the Mission at their centres. Addresses were given by Rev. Dr. Whyte, of Edinburgh; Mr. W. Ferguson, LL.D., Chairman Great North of Scotland Railway; Mr. R. Nixon, Secretary of the Railway Mission, and others.

Some seventy-three branches of the Mission, have been established in Scotland, of which six are in Glasgow. The Mission has the hearty sympathy of directors and leading officials, and, through its agency, a large number of Scottish railwaymen have been won for Christ and his service. Many of these are now among the most active workers in the Mission, and are real lights on the line pointing their mates to God.

Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society.—This old-established Society has during the last few months increased the number of its pensioners to 1,550, and the expenditure on the pensions and homes has risen to £13,000 per annum. A very successful public meeting has recently been held at Brighton, where there is a home for seven pensioners; local out-pensioners in the town number forty-one. The new issue of the Quarterly Record, for gratuitous distribution, is fully illustrated, and, in addition to various articles on the institution, contains a poem by Mr. William Luff, entitled "Waiting Ones."

The Churches.

Church of England.

The Bishop of Liverpool hopes to return to the diocese on Thursday, 16th inst., and, on the following day, the preliminary examination of candidates for holy orders will take place at the Palace.

The Bishop of Durham, in opening his Diocesan Conference, remarked on the evils of overcrowding, and said that, with the single exception of Northumberland, there was more overcrowding in Durham than any county in England, the percentage of overcrowding in Gateshead being higher than in any other town in England, and more than twice as great as that in London, while Sunderland was nearly as bad.

The Bishop of Llandaff announced at the close of his Diocesan Conference, at Cardiff, that it was more than probable that that would be the last occasion on which he would preside over the Conference. He said he had not come to any definite decision as to the time of his retirement, but the work of the diocese was increasing enormously, while his physical and mental strength was on the wane. If the decline of strength continued, he should be bound to put the reins into younger and more vigorous hands.

The contributions to the Leeds Church Extension Fund, which was opened some months ago, amount to over £30,000. Already, as the result of the movement, three new clergy, out of thirty required, are at work in the city, two new buildings are on the point of being erected, grants of £2,000 each have been made towards the erection of two new churches, and fourteen sites for parish churches and mission churches have been secured in view of the needs of the immediate future.

The C.M.S. Gleaners' Union for Prayer and Work has celebrated its thirteenth anniversary. At the afternoon meeting, Mrs. McCelland pleaded in impassioned terms that the true secret of successful service, whether at home or abroad, was to realize the honour conferred upon us by the redemption of Christ. At the evening gathering in Exeter Hall, Bishop Tugwell presided, and the subject dealt with was "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." The final address, which was, as usual, of a devotional character, was given by the Bishop of Mombasa.

Congregational.

Mr. Alderman Gadd, of Exeter, has for twenty-five years filled the position of Sunday-school superintendent at Southernhay Church. His labours were cordially recognised at the close of the recent anniversary services.

The opening service of the autumnal meetings of the North Wales English Congregational Union was held at Chester Street Church, Wrexham, on the 31st ult., when Rev. Arnold Thomas preached the Union sermon. A united communion service followed, under the presidency of Rev. G. T. Sadler, pastor of the church, assisted by the ministers of the town.

Rev. Dr. R. F. Horton laid the foundation-stone of a new church and lecture hall, which is to be erected in Church Road, Harlesden. Rev. Silvester Horne delivered an address. The church, which is situated on a commanding position, is one of four for which Dr. Horton pleaded when he was chairman of the London Union. Hampstead Church (Dr. Horton's) promises £1,000 towards the cost of the scheme.

A reception of missionaries has been held in the Christian Institute, Glasgow, under the auspices of the local auxiliary of the London Missionary Society. Mr. W. S. Workman presided, and accompanying were Rev. J. Sadler, Amoy, China, and other friends. Mr. Workman said that from last year's statistics he found that £10,000,000 sterling had been spent on horse-racing, over £17,000,000 on tobacco, and £154,000,000 on intoxicating liquor, while during the same year only £1,400,000 for missionaries.

The managers of Redland Park Sunday School, Bristol, announce Jubilee services for December 3. The school was started in a cottage in 1849 as a mission school in connection with Highbury Chapel, of which place of worship nearly all the earlier officers and teachers were members. After a short time the school was removed to Highbury British School in Anglesea Place, where, too, the church was established. It grew in numbers and strength, and Redland Park Church was built, the school then becoming Redland Park Sunday School.

In the course of a recent address given at Manchester, Dr. Forsyth, of Cambridge, emphasized the importance of the centrality of Christ for the permanence of human brotherhood and Christian philanthropy. The permanent centrality of Christ—not merely of the historic Christ, but of Christ the Redeemer—was the condition of the permanence of our human philanthropies. If we were to dislodge Christ from the position He occupied, all these philanthropies would only be a subtle delusion that would lead us into a spirit of self-satisfaction, the end of which would be spiritual decay and spiritual desolation.

Baptist.

Rev. Marsack Day has entered upon his ministry at Avenue Road Church, Shepherd's Bush.

The new chapel at Hebden Bridge, built for the Birchcliffe Church, was opened last week, Dr. Clifford preaching. The edifice is capable of seating 1,000 people, and cost, including the site, £10,000; of this amount £6,950 has been raised.

The ministry of the Baptist churches in the North of England has just received two accessions from Wales by the appointment of Rev. D. Burwyn Davies, of Swansea, to Halifax, and Rev. J. Rhys Davies, also of Swansea, to the Tabernacle, Southport.

The current issue of the Baptist Magazine contains a portrait, with biographical sketch, of Rev. J. H. French of Forest Gate, a minister who combines geniality of disposition with strength of character, and who as a preacher and pastor has been blessed to many in the growing Essex suburban district.

At Wadeford, Chard, deep interest has been awakened by special gatherings conducted by Mr. G. Willstead. Open-air meetings before the services in the chapel attracted the attention of people who were not in the habit of going to any place of worship.

The church at Rochester (Rev. G. Anderson Miller) is making an endeavour to purchase the freehold of their premises, and to erect a permanent building. The option of purchase, and the school which now stands on the ground, will be lost unless the property is bought during 1899. Mr. Miller's address is 17, Rochester Avenue, Rochester, Kent.

Special services have been held at Woodside Church, South Norwood, in connection with the first anniversary of the church and the recognition of Rev. G. W. Gentle-Cackett as pastor. Rev. E. W. Tarbox preached, and at the public meeting Mr. C. Drayton and Rev. C. Ingram took part. The reports of work in various departments were of an encouraging nature. An effort is being made to raise £2,000, in order to free the church from debt and erect permanent school buildings.

Services have been held at Eccles in connection with the settlement of Mr. Henry John Morley, of Manchester Baptist College. The chair was occupied in the afternoon by Professor Ellis, of Brighton Grove. The charge to the pastor was delivered by Rev. J. T. Marshall, M.A., Principal of Manchester College; and the charge given to the church by Rev. Robert Lewis, of Liverpool. Rev. E. Morley, of New Brighton, father of the pastor, also took part. Mr. Morley begins his work in buildings which have just been erected at a cost of £4,000.

United gatherings have been held at Nottingham in support of the Century Fund. Dr. Clifford preached and gave rousing addresses. Rev. Charles Williams also took part. Referring to the new Mission House, Dr. Clifford said it was to be erected on an imposing site in the new thoroughfare that was being made from Holborn to Charing Cross, the cost, including furnishing, to be £34,000. On the front of the building there was to be a figure of C. H. Spurgeon. They would have to pay no rent, as the letting of the rooms in the basement of the building would bring in sufficient money to cover all their cost.

Methodist.

Anniversary services have been held in connection with Cardiff (London Square) Wesleyan Mission. The proceedings were full of enthusiasm. Rev. Hugh Price Hughes said that the great problem that confronted the Free Churches was the evangelization of the central districts of our large cities.

Newcastle-on-Tyne Wesleyan district is arranging for a Revival Mission in every chapel of each circuit during the winter months. The services will be conducted almost exclusively by ministers and local preachers of the various circuits, and an abundant harvest is prayerfully anticipated.

The Connexional Missionary Society of the Primitive Methodist body has promised Rev. James Flanagan another £1,000 for the new St. George's Hall, Southwark, making £3,000 from the missionary fund, on condition that the entire cost of £12,000 is raised. Only £1,000 more is needed. Mr. Flanagan has expressed his intention not to open the building until all the money is guaranteed.

Rev. F. W. Macdonald, president of the Wesleyan Conference, in a recent address, said he desired to see in Methodism a rigid, tenacious preservation of the central truths of the Gospel, with an intelligent, elastic appreciation of the times and circumstances of the age. The field of duty for their church was constantly widening, and all over the world there were no definable limits to the influence they might exercise for Christ and for humanity's true welfare.

Presbyterian.

Rev. W. F. Holt, of Birmingham, has just concluded a week's mission at Kendal. This is Mr. Holt's second visit. The audiences were large, and the people have been refreshed.

Rev. J. Kerr Craig, of Wigan, has been inducted to the pastorate of Canonbury. Rev. Z. B. Woffendale, in his charge to the minister, made reference to the special difficulties of the work to which Mr. Craig was about to devote himself, and to the need there was for adaptation in methods, if he would lay hold in any great measure of the people of London, 3,000,000 of whom never darken a church door.

At the autumn meeting of the Free Synod of Lothian and Tweeddale, held at Innerleithen last week, a conference was held on "The Training of Sabbath School Teachers," when Dr. Maurice Paterson (Edinburgh) gave the opening address. Addresses were also given by Dr. J. Hood Wilson (Edinburgh), on "Christian Work;" by Dr. Stalker (Glasgow), on "Public Spirit;" and by Rev. John Kelman (Edinburgh), on "The Secret of Christian Influences."

A congress of the Church of Scotland was held last week in Glasgow. At a debate on Church services, Dr. Marshall Lang said that there was never a time when they more required in their churches all the fire and enthusiasm that they could show. In the Scottish Church the intellectual element had been brought prominently to the front, but they should watch carefully that the intellectual should not be cultivated to the detriment of a warm Christian feeling. Dr. Donald Macleod strongly advocated a more evangelistic tone in the Church, and the provision of increased opportunities of usefulness for women workers. Dr. Norman Macleod, speaking on "The Church: its obligations to its parishes," said that what was needed most of all was a deeper sense of responsibility on the part of Church members in order to overcome that sloth, selfishness, and indifference which stopped the way.

Society of Friends.

Charles D. Terrell, with his wife and family, are at La Rochelle, where they have taken a house, and look to residing for some time; making that place a centre of Christian effort in the work of evangelization upon which C. D. Terrell has entered.

Indiana, U.S.A., yearly meeting has held its seventy-ninth annual session. The interest shown by the membership in its work, as indicated by the unusually large attendance, by the deep spirituality that marked its devotions. The progress shown by the reports of last year's work, and the new lines of work undertaken for the coming year, made it a remarkable gathering.

At the recent meeting on ministry and oversight at Bath, the question of the "right occupation of spiritual gifts" was interestingly discussed. One Friend observed that the fruitfulness of the the Society depended upon the faithful occupying of the spiritual gifts entrusted to each and all of the members, and that the teaching of experience proved that a simple duty faithfully done led on to more extensive service and the bestowal of larger gifts.

Friends at Ashford have had an acceptable visit from Charles and Annie Goddard. A series of meetings was arranged for at the meeting-house. On the first evening Charles Goddard gave interesting information about the North American Indians and the Christian work carried on amongst them. First day was fully occupied by visits to the adults and children's school, and the meetings for worship. The Gospel message was faithfully delivered.

Fallen Asleep.

Rev. JOHN M'ARA, minister of the parish of Lady, Sanday, Orkney. Mr. M'Ara, many years ago, went to Queensland. At Dalby, in the Presbytery of Toowomba, he laboured successfully for many years. In 1888 he returned to his native country, and a few years after was elected minister of the parish of Lady, Orkney, where his ministrations were much appreciated.—Rev. WILLIAM IVOR JONES, minister of St. Paul's Church, Swansea, who attended last month as a representative of the Principality, the International Council of Congregational Churches at Boston, U.S. He was in early life connected with Borough Road Welsh Church, London. Later he became pastor of Ivor Church, Dowlais, which he left in 1896 for Swansea.—Mrs. BURROW, of Kilkhampton Bible Christian Circuit, seven of whose sons and daughters were members of the Church which for many years she faithfully served.—Rev. W. MERCER, vicar of Norton Lees, Sheffield.—Rev. JOHN MILNE JARVIE. In 1851 he accepted a unanimous call to the church at George Square, Greenock, his predecessor being the late Dr. Alexander Raleigh. For forty years he exercised an influence, and fulfilled a ministry in this church, of which all Scotland knew the value.—The Baptist Church at Mount Zion, Cardigan, has sustained a serious loss by the death of Mr. THOMAS THOMAS. He was respected for his upright life and integrity of character, and was an ever ready helper of weak Baptist churches throughout the district.—Rev. G. SHAW, one of the oldest Congregational ministers in the country. After entering the ministry he was appointed pastor of Patricroft Congregational Church. Mr. Shaw subsequently became minister successively at Woodbridge, Essex, Warwick, and Redditch. He was at the latter place until owing to advancing years he retired.—At Dublin, Mr. R. T. WHITE, an earnest local preacher, and for over fifty years a prominent member of the Methodist Church.—At Eastleigh, Westbury, Wilts, Mrs. MICHAEL, in her eighty-sixth year. Her life was one of loving Christian influence in the large circle with whom she came in contact.

Obituary.

REV. JAMES KENNEDY.

The death of Rev. James Kennedy, at the ripe age of eighty-five, removes a veteran and well-known Congregationalist. He was born at Aberfeldy, in the Perthshire Highlands, where his father was a noted Independent minister. In 1838 he left for India, where he remained for nearly forty years with only two intervals. For thirty of those years, including the Mutiny period, he was stationed at Benares, and the last of his work was done at Rani Khet, in the hill country, where British soldiers as well as native tribes came under his influence. Returning from India in 1877, he became pastor of the Congregational Church at Portobello, a suburb of Edinburgh; but he finally retired from active work to live beside members of his family in London. Mr. Kennedy was the author of a very interesting volume describing his "Life and Work in Benares and Kumaon," and of several other works.

MR. H. L. HASTINGS, BOSTON, U.S.A.

Many will hear with sorrow that typhoid fever has carried off Mr. H. L. Hastings, of Boston. As the publisher of a number of valuable pamphlets and larger books, making up an "Anti-Infidel Library," and as the editor of the American Christian, Mr. Hastings exercised a remarkably influential ministry. As a lecturer he was highly esteemed, and churches and bodies of workers, of any or no denomination, were sure of his hearty co-operation in endeavours to manifest the truth of God or proclaim the Gospel of Christ. In this country, and also throughout the United States, Mr. Hastings made lecturing tours which were greatly blessed of God; while his writings remain to continue his testimony against infidelity and impurity, and to do battle against ignorance of, and indifference to, Divine things.

Y.M.C.A. Notes.

THE annual meetings of the Bristol, Hanley, and Hastings and St. Leonards Y.M.C.A.'s have been held. Interesting addresses were given both by prominent Churchmen and Nonconformists. Recent accessions in Bristol bring the Association membership up to 1,330.

At the interim Conference of the Midland District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s, held at Wolverhampton, a helpful address was delivered by Dr. J. Monro Gibson, on "Present-day Difficulties of Young Men." At an evening meeting Dr. Gibson gave a lecture, entitled "The Unity and Symmetry of the Bible."

The movement in Germany has suffered a great loss by the death, which has recently occurred, of Rev. Superintendent Krummacher, who sustained an important relation to the organization in that country. A marked impression was created at the Jubilee Conference in London by the utterances of the late pastor, and he delivered also a remarkable address in the Cathedral on the occasion of the last International Conference, held in Basle. He was widely known and esteemed by Y.M.C.A. workers on the Continent.

The Bishop of Chichester, speaking at a meeting held in the Brighton Dome, said he had had a good deal of experience in the North of England of the excellent work done by the Y.M.C.A. "There is," he remarked, "one common standing-ground between the most rabid Nonconformist, if I may say so, and the most rabid Churchman, as perhaps I may term myself—we are all able to join hands and work heart to heart together for the Y.M.C.A.

Schools for Bible Study.

CONTINUING his series of lectures at Exeter Hall, Rev. Hubert Brooke took the Pentateuch for his subject, dealing with it under four heads.

Composition.—1. Pentateuch: "Five Books." Called in Heb., "The Law," "Moses," "Book of the Law." Sometimes "The Law" is put for whole Old Testament (Jno. x. 34, xii. 34, xv. 25; Rom. iii. 19; 1 Cor. xiv. 21). 2. Writer is always named as Moses (e.g., Jno. v. 46). Allusions to his writing in Ex. xvii. 14, xxiv. 4, 7; Num. xxxiii. 2; Deut. xxxi. 9, 24. 3. He used older documents: Gen. v. 1, xiv. 1-12; Num. xxi. 14. "The book of Genesis is based upon contemporary materials, which had accumulated from the beginning, and were threaded together, under Divine enlightenment, by Moses."

Peculiarities.—1. Remarkable proportion of time to chapters: Gen. covers 2,300 years; Ex. 145; Num. 39; Lev. and Deut. about 30 days each. 2. Forms an introduction to and summary of the whole Bible; interwoven with every part of it; essential for its understanding.

Witness to Christ.—1. Series of direct prophecies, increasing in clearness: (a) woman's seed (Gen. iii. 15); (b) Abraham's seed (xxii. 18); (c) Shiloh of Judah (xlix. 10); (d) Passover Lamb (Ex. xii.); (e) Star (Num. xxiv. 17); (f) Prophet (Deut. xviii. 15). 2. Prophetic types: Adam (1 Cor. xv. 45); Abel (Heb. xii. 24); Scape-goat (Lev. xvi.); Red Heifer (Num. xix.); Brazen Serpent (Num. xxi.). 3. Typical scenes and ordinances: Paradise, Ark, Rainbow, Sarah and Hagar, Isaac and Ishmael, Esau and Jacob, circumcision, sacrifices, tabernacle, High Priesthood (Rev. ii. 7, xi. 19, iv. 3; Gal. iv. 22-31; Rom. ix. 6-13; Col. ii. 11; and Ep. to Hebrews.

Progressive Order.—Man's failure, Gen.; Divine Redemption, Ex.; Worship and Holiness, Lev.; Order and Guidance, Num.; Preparation for Inheritance, Deut. These are the true lines of experimental growth, showing in succession our condition, God's provision, access, progress, fulness of blessing. Ep. to Romans affords a striking parallel to the lessons of the Pentateuch.

Rev. G. SOLTAU'S LECTURES.

In a recent lecture, Mr. Soltau continued his review of St. Matthew's Gospel. The chief points dealt with were—

Features of the Parables.—They were photographic and prophetic. Of the eighteen parables, eleven are peculiar to this book, and thirteen are in association with "the Kingdom of Heaven," a phrase which may be explained as "that which professes to be under the rule of heaven, in the absence of the King." The series opens with the sower, and closes with the Son of Man coming in glory. The interval is filled by the preaching of the kingdom, opposition to the kingdom, imitation of the kingdom. The King, though veiled and hidden, is busily at work. He appears as follows: xiii. 3, a sower; 24, a man owning a field; 31, a man sowing a tiny seed; 44, a man buying a field; 45, a merchant; xx. 1, an employer of labour; xviii. 23, a king; xxiii. 2, a king's son; xxv. 5, a bridegroom; xx. 5, 14, a nobleman administering an estate. (Then comes a sudden flash of the King in his glory). Chap. xxii. 1-14, affords an instance of prophetic phrase; 3, servants—Old Testament prophets; 4, other servants—John the Baptist, the twelve, the seventy. (The treatment described in vv. 3 and 4 is illustrated in Acts iii.-xii.) Verse 7, destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; 8, 9, servants going forth—the foreign missionary movement of the centuries; 10, good and bad—people of all religions and conditions invited and accepting.

Mr. Soltau's next subject was St. Mark's Gospel, which was dealt with as follows:—

Portrait of the Servant. The divisions are: i. 1-13, preparation; 1-14-xii. 23, ministry in eastern Galilee; vii. 24-ix. 50, in northern Galilee; x. 1-31, in Judea and Perea; x. 32-xvi., closing scenes and ascension. Observe the corresponding swiftness of enemy's action against Him (i. 23, iii. 6, iv. 15, v. 2, vi. 25, 27, ix. 20, xiv. 45, xv. 7). Trace the "ministry of the hand" throughout, being the portrait of the servant at work. A servant is supposed not to talk much, hence comparatively little of our Lord's sayings is recorded. Peculiarities of this Gospel are—(a) it contains no quotations from the Old Testament except i. 2; (b) contains no allusions to Jewish laws; (c) words and customs that could not be understood by Roman readers, are explained; (d) much care is bestowed on details of time, place, and numbers, and particulars as to persons. The treatment He received should be carefully traced throughout the Gospel, remembering Isa. xlii. 1: "Behold my servant, mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth." The series of sentences commences iii. 6, and terminates at xv. 36, with the sponge filled with vinegar, the last gift of this world to its Lord.

Irish Notes.

REV. WILLIAM HARPUR, of Athlone, has been prevented by the police from preaching on the street in Sligo, and has been kept for several hours under arrest. The matter is to be brought under the notice of the Government.

Miss Carnegie, who has been for many years doing excellent work in Belfast and Dublin among the Jews, under the auspices of the Church of Ireland Jews' Society, is going out to Jerusalem for a period of five months. In the meantime, work among the Jewesses in Belfast and Dublin will be carried on by Miss Kamcki and Mrs. Kamin.

A meeting to bid farewell to Rev. Ebenezer Webster, M.A., and his wife, who have been about eighteen months in Ireland on furlough, and who are returning to their work in India, has been held in the Centenary Methodist Church, Dublin. Rev. J. D. Lamont presided, and addresses were delivered by Rev. James Robertson and several others. A gold watch was presented to Mr. Webster on the occasion, in recognition of his faithful services on behalf of missions while at home.

DONATIONS

Received by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, to Monday, November 6th, 1899.

 Will donors oblige by stating explicitly and fully the titles of the institutions to which they wish their donations to be applied? Further correspondence will thus be obviated.

 Cheques, Money Orders, or Postal Orders should be made payable to Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C., and crossed "London City and Midland Bank, Ltd."; this will effectually prevent loss.

Accidents to Railway Servants.—Mr. G. J. Hyde writes from Walthamstow: "In your issue of the 19th October I noticed a statement that '2,293 accidents, some of them fatal, have occurred in a year which automatic couplings would have prevented,' implying that the introduction of automatic couplings would have prevented, or gone a long way to prevent, such accidents; and that the accidents that have occurred have been the result of the callousness of English railways in not having applied a 'proven remedy.' As a matter of fact, it has not been proven, and it is by no means certain that the suggested remedy will meet the difficulty; and at the present time the whole matter is under consideration of the Parliamentary Commission."

THIS advance has naturally increased the expenditure; so much so, that on March the 31st last the Committee were left to face a deficit on the General Fund of £11,087—now reduced to about £8,050. The expenditure for 1898-9 was the highest in the history of the Society.

The Committee are reluctantly compelled to contemplate retrenchment. This practically means curtailment of the Mission. They have decided, however, first to make this General Appeal, in the hope that they may have the prayers and the generous and liberal assistance of God's people in this immediate and most anxious matter.

The Famine in India.

THE great fact in India now is the famine. The usual rainy season is past, first crops and many second crops are withered; and, most terrible of all, water is short over large areas. Writing to us from Agra, on October 12, Dr. Colin Valentine, of Agra, says:—"Melancholy accounts of suffering reach us from all parts of the country on account of the famine. Nothing, I am afraid, can now save us from one of the most terrible famines we have experienced for years."

Again, Rev. H. B. Fuller, writing in the Bombay Guardian for October 21, says: "The pressure of the famine grows heavier and heavier, and the prospect is very dark indeed. An exceptionally well-informed gentleman of Berar said lately that he did not think that more than 60 per cent. of the people would be able to pull through, and only a small percentage of the animals. If this is an approximate estimate, then it is indeed an awful outlook, and ought to stir all hearts to the utmost effort to save the lives of the people and animals too. The great danger is in the delay in starting plans of relief on a scale in any sense proportionate to the need. In the last famine there were vast stores of grain in the country, as there had been good crops in general for many years. But there is a lack of grain now, and one of the things of first importance is the importing of foreign grain in large quantities, so as to break the monopolies of the grain merchants. The prices are fearfully high, considering that the famine has been on so short a time, and there are so many long dark months before there is any prospect of release."

Mr. Fuller suggests a plan for importing grain to be sold at actual cost to the people as soon as possible, before they are reduced to such a physical condition that they are incapacitated for work. His idea is for wealthy Christian men to form a company with this object, for they would lose none of the capital they put in, the grain being taken off their hands at cost price by missionaries and others, who would agree to retail it to the people at the same. The importers would give the use of their capital without interest as their share of the relief work, and large sums of money would be needed in distributing this grain, &c. By this plan everyone would help in some way. American farmers could give grain, and others could give money to defray cost of transportation, and so forth.

Mr. Campbell Morgan in America.

A writer in the Boston Congregationalist, in an account of the work of Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, in connection with Mr. Moody's various institutions, says:—

MR MORGAN'S method is not expansion so much as emphasis of great principles. Intensely in earnest, though not excitable, every form of expression directly adds to this emphasis. Using the Bible a great deal, his quotations are always made with reference to a wholeness of view very different from the "false use of words, texts, and multiplying of types" on which George Adam Smith pours such scathing rebuke.

Like Dr. Fairbairn, Mr. Morgan preaches with his whole body. He forces one to follow the movement of his hands almost as much as his lips. Yet there is nothing artificial about his gestures; they are part of the effort to make vivid to his audience the vision of truth so clear to him. For Mr. Morgan is a man who sees. Old truths seem new under the vitalizing contact with one who sees God's power over all man's weakness. He may be a mystic, if to realize things unseen is to be a mystic. But there is nothing vague or unpractical about his teaching. His mysticism is something to live by, to act with, a humble faith in a supernatural Redeemer as working through, uplifting and perfecting his natural creation. However much or little one's intellectual culture in spiritual things, such emphasis on this vital faith brings to everyone who hears Mr. Morgan the stimulus a preacher ought to bring. The man can say, because he sees, "Behold your God."

The Edinburgh Castle.

MR. HENRY COLLINS, of the Evangelization Society, has just completed two months' services at the Castle. It has pleased the Lord to own the Gospel testimony by his servant, so that there have been those who, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, have heard to the salvation of their souls. Mr. Collins leaves us with many earnest prayers and good wishes for further success in the Lord's service.

The work here is full of encouragement, for it is our joy continually to come in contact with men and women who have been won for the Lord Jesus through the preaching of the Cross. Hundreds will have to praise God throughout eternity that He ever led his servant, Dr. Barnardo, to purchase this place, which was once Satan's seat, but which has now become a court of the Most High, the place where his power is continually manifested.

It is an inspiring sight to see 2,000 to 3,000 people on a Sunday night listening to God's loving provision for sinners. Again this is so when, every Sunday afternoon, over 1,000 men and women gather at our P.S.A.'s, eagerly listening to the old, old story. A gracious and spiritual tone pervades every one of the numerous branches attached to this place, for which we give thanks to the Lord.

WALTER NOTMAN, Superintendent and Secretary.

Mr. Charrington's Mission Work.

THE month of October was cold, with an ever-varying temperature, included in which were fogs, heavy rains, wind and frost. Not the weather likely to induce people to attend Gospel meetings. The fog was most trying, and stayed with us a third of the month—including in its programme seven consecutive days. Despite all this, it is wonderful to be able to record that the meetings in the Great Assembly Hall have been well attended. This may, in some measure, be accounted for by the fact that Mr. Rowland D. Edwards, of the Evangelization Society, was the speaker for the month. It is only his second visit to the work of the Tower Hamlets' Mission, but his previous mission gained for him a reputation that is not likely to die out easily.

By profession a solicitor, he has, for some years, accompanied by his wife, evangelized in India, New Zealand, Australia, and many other parts, with much success. He has a pleasing manner, and, with great freedom of speech, he declares the Gospel with power. The believers have been greatly helped and stimulated; while those careless and indifferent about spiritual things have been aroused, and many, through the power of the Spirit, have been convicted of sin and brought to the feet of Christ. Night after night these were dealt with by the workers in the inquiry-room, and some striking cases of conversion were recorded. One man happened to be passing the hall when a friend of his was outside inviting the passers-by to the service; and he was induced to attend the meeting. That night he gave his heart to the Lord, and he testified afterward that he was just out on the spree, as he expressed it, with £50 in his pocket, and had intended spending it in "riotous living" before returning to business. He was a hard drinker, but signed the pledge. The sudden break in his habits caused him to take to his bed for some days, and, although greatly tempted to take drink, by God's grace he was able to overcome the temptation, and is now a constant attendant at the services, and testifying to his old companions and the world the power of God to save and keep even such as he.

Mr. W. R. BRADLAUGH has completed a mission in St. Andrew's Mission Church, Livesey, Blackburn. The old-fashioned Gospel has been preached, and blessing attended the efforts. C. T. CLARK, Pastor.

An eight days' mission conducted by Mr. B. H. ANGLE, has been held in the Presbyterian church, Alderney. Many precious souls sought salvation, and God's people were richly blessed. A. LE MONTAIS.

Mr. NOAH TAYLOR'S recent mission at the Gospel Mission Room, Martin Street, Brighouse, Yorks, was a time of strengthening to many. The word was earnestly delivered, and sinners professed to turn from their evil ways. E. H.

The Metropolitan Theatre, despite the rain, was well filled on Sunday night, when Mr. LEONARD WEAVER gave the address, and Madame ANNIE RYALL was the soloist. A large number of people came forward and confessed Christ.

Our old friends Mr. and Mrs. Harrison have been with us at the St. Giles' Christian Mission during October. The services were a source of comfort and stimulus to Christians, and each Sunday evening some professed to decide for Christ. These workers have gone to Dublin, and will be followed by the prayers of many here. WM. WHEATLEY.

Rev. H. HOWARD MAY, Wesleyan Connexional evangelist, has concluded a ten-days' mission at Castle Donington. Large congregations have gathered night after night to listen to the heart-searching appeals of the preacher. Scores of people, who but seldom attend the House of God, have attended with remarkable regularity. Excitement there was none, but it is believed that not a few have been brought into union with Christ.

Mr. and Mrs. BUSTIN have conducted an evangelistic mission at Drummond Road Chapel, Bermondsey. The Lord was with his servants. Night after night the vestry was thronged with inquirers, and numbers professed to yield to Christ. The meetings were full of interest and spiritual instruction. The singing of Mrs. Bustin (Madame Annie Ryall) was, as usual, an impressive feature of the mission.

H. A. BURLEIGH, Pastor.

The Nine Elms Tent was blown down last week during a violent gale, but the meetings have been continued with much blessing in a neighbouring hall. On Saturday evening last Mr. LEONARD WEAVER conducted a "rally" of converts and friends. This was the last public gathering of the present season in connection with the tent work, and the proceedings were full of enthusiasm, many testifying with gladness that they had found Christ.

A mission has been held at the Soldiers' Home, Spital Tongues, Newcastle-on-Tyne, by Mr. ALEXANDER CLARK, of the Evangelization Society. There was blessing from first to last, believers being quickened and sinners seeking salvation. The preaching was of a faithful character. During the mission the men of the 74th Battery were entertained at tea, prior to their departure for South Africa, and each was presented with a marked Testament. A. D.

Mr. IRA D. SANKEY has been revisiting New Brunswick, where he addressed several large audiences. The evangelist sang at the First Presbyterian Church in the morning, at the First Baptist Sunday School in the afternoon, and in the evening he addressed a mass meeting in the First Methodist Episcopal Church. People were unable to gain admission to the evening meeting. Mr. Sankey has also been in Philadelphia during the Evangelical Alliance Conference, and he took part in two of the meetings. He had an enthusiastic reception.

Mr. JOSIAH NIX has concluded a mission at Queen's Road Wesleyan Church, Northampton. A glorious start was made on the first Sunday. At each of the twenty services held during the mission, the power of the Lord was manifest, and the final gathering was marked by deep enthusiasm. Our rejoicing is in the many changed lives witnessing that the Gospel is still the "power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Some hundreds of persons were dealt with in the inquiry rooms, numbers made a deeper consecration for service, and very many temperance pledges were taken. JOEL PETERS, Minister of Queen's Road Church.

As an outcome of the tent work in Peckham, a fortnight's services have been held by the South London Christian Union in Peckham Tabernacle, and so encouraging were the results that our good friend Frank Smith, the pastor, determined to continue the meetings. Pastor Chas. Spurgeon, Mr. William Olney, and myself, with others, took part; and men and women evidenced their desire to live for God. The meetings are continuing this week; Mr. Sawday, of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and other well-known friends, are rallying round the pastor. Peckham Tabernacle is a centre of usefulness in the midst of a vast population, and the pastor is labouring vigorously for the evangelization of the people. It was a pleasure to help such an aggressive band of workers.

CHARLES COOK.

Mr. HARRY YOUNG, of the Evangelization Society, has concluded a mission at Reay, Caithness. The first meeting was a service in the Free Church, and at the first evening meeting the attendance was encouraging. During the first week high winds and drenching showers rendered it impossible for any but the very robust to venture out of doors. In spite, however, of rain and darkness the numbers increased. On the second Sabbath evening crowded gatherings were addressed by Mr. Young and Rev. James Macdonald. From outlying districts people walked long distances, and appealed to the evangelist to go to their hamlets, if only for one night. To these requests he was able to respond in part. Deep spiritual earnestness pervaded every meeting held. Christian people were encouraged and helped, while others were sobered and brought to reflect as to their place and standing in relation to God. A great number of young people were enthusiastic in their attendance and help. Lasting good has been done, and the services will be long remembered.

Notes & Comments

RECENTLY, when addressing our readers regarding "These Forty Years," during which God has given us a hand in his work by means of The Christian, and its predecessor The Revival, we asked friends who had found help and refreshment in these pages to support our endeavours by introducing the paper to their acquaintances. We have heard from a number who are anxious to do this, and we have no doubt that there are others from whom we have not heard.

In order to give a practical shape to this kindly interest, we have prepared a booklet, entitled "These Forty Years," presenting particulars of the recent Birthday Commemoration, and a selection of the testimonies then borne to the helpfulness of The Christian to workers in many departments. We shall be pleased to forward a supply of these to evangelists, ministers, and others, who may be disposed to assist us, by handing copies to those with whom they come into contact, or whom they are privileged to influence and guide in religious matters.

We recently met a city missionary on a railway platform. He told us that he was engaged in speaking to those with whom he came in contact about the great salvation. "And," he added, "there are more who desire to be spoken to than there are Christians ready to speak to them." Every soul won for Christ is a jewel in his crown; and those to whom we are privileged to speak of Him, and who receive Him, will be our joy and crown of rejoicing when He comes to number his jewels. Let us be faithful watchers for souls, as they who must give account to Him who has made us his watchmen and his witnesses.

A useful and timely letter will be found on page 23, dealing with the question of conserving the spiritual results of an evangelistic mission. The writer's experience is not, we trust, unique; but permanent blessing would be much more general if similar methods were adopted. A far too common mistake is the immediate relapse into the ordinary routine of church work, instead of commencing a series of supplementary meetings for those who have been converted or impressed during the mission.

While the deadly struggle in South Africa is proceeding to its unknown issue, it is at least cheering to find, from the Prime Minister's speech at the Guildhall, that our international relations with nearer neighbours are very much more cordial than recent newspaper reports had given the world to imagine. The German Government has given ample pledges of neutrality, and the Emperor's family visit to the Queen will, doubtless, help to remove any lingering danger of misunderstanding with that country. This fact alone will ensure the peace of the Continent. The friendship of America has passed the experimental stage, and is now a firmly established reality. The friendly settlement of the Samoan difficulty between these three governments, however it may affect the natives of those islands, removes another possible source of estrangement. In view of these accomplished facts, it is clear that the virulent tone of the Continental Press can be ignored, and that the recent fears of a world-wide conflagration, as the result of the South African war, may be dismissed. This is a matter for devout thankfulness.

While the war knows no abatement, the people, from the throne to the peasant, are showing that they are not unmindful of the sufferings which actual warfare inflicts upon the families of those who bear the full brunt of the struggle in the field. The Mansion House War Fund has reached nearly £200,000; but that sum, while proclaiming spontaneous generosity, is not at all commensurate with requirements. The people are stirred at the bare thought of the misery and anguish that must follow every fresh engagement. Still, the horror and loss and heart-break increase proportionately. No money contributions, no war funds, can meet the almost infinite agony of those now suffering at home. Generous gifts come from sympathetic souls. These, however, can never assuage the soul-sorrow that has to be borne by so many in secret and alone.

Dr. John Smith, of Broughton Place U.P. Church, Edinburgh, is giving a series of discourses on the Prophet Amos. On Sunday last he took up chap. vi., and applied it with great force to God's government of nations at all times and with special emphasis to our own.

History (one has said) is philosophy teaching by examples. Prophecy is God's government of the world wrought out to its issues in actual instances of judgment and blessing.

It would certainly be a very questionable policy, now that the Soudan is to be opened through Lord Kitchener's arrangements "to all comers," if the Government still refused missionaries of the Cross free right of entrance there. What the Soudan needs is not Imperialism, but the liberty wherewith Christ makes the people free. There is nothing more adapted to Africa's crying necessity than Jesus Christ. To proclaim Him there as King of the heart, the conscience, the life, should be the supreme effort of missionary enterprise. Nor have we any fear at all that volunteers will soon apply for the privilege of being sent among the earliest pioneers. The field is white unto harvest, and the labourers will not be wanting.

The cession of the Samoan islands to Germany is another hard blow dealt by the Government at the work of the London Missionary Society. After years of toil and sacrifice in Madagascar, where English rule was eagerly desired by the people, the Society had to endure the pain and mortification of seeing that island occupied by the French, treaty rights trampled upon, and a reign of persecution inaugurated. This was "a deal" in return for our invasion of the Soudan. And now, for the sake of German non-interference in South Africa, comes the sacrifice of Samoa, which, like Madagascar, has been made worth occupation by missionary zeal and labour. Fifty years ago a similar experience was gone through in Tahiti. In each case the Romish Church is the gainer; in each case the same Society made the places worth the having; and in each case British rule would have been preferred to any other. The ways of statesmen are remarkable!

Last week's debate in the London County Council on Sunday concerts was important from several points of view. In the first place, the Council declined to go back on its previous decisions, and refused to enlarge the concessions already made. In the second place, it is very doubtful whether the restrictions laid down are being honoured by those who carry on these Sunday amusements. The number of concerts has greatly increased, which are indistinguishable from week-day concerts. The form of registration resorted to by the Sunday League at Somerset House, that their meetings profess to be "meetings for worship of a body of anonymous Dissenters," is a piece of impudent hypocrisy, whose hollowness must be patent to those who know anything about their aims and methods. Truly, as said Mr. John Burns, speaking not as a Christian, but "as a respectable Freethinker," we may find that we have already gone, not only far enough, but too far, in licensing the inevitable Sunday labour involved.

It is a curious sign of the times that more weight seems to have been accorded to Mr. John Burns's opposition to the extension of Sunday amusements than to Colonel Rotton's petition on behalf of the Lord's Day Observance Society, in spite of the fact that both laid the chief emphasis on the humanitarian aspect of the case. The religious principle that lies at the back of the Society's activities is just now at a discount with the public and their representatives, and even prejudices them against its appeals. This is a peculiar condition of things, and should be faced by all religious people with frankness. It is partly due to a tendency, even among themselves, to discount the spiritual aspects of social questions, a tendency of which many ministers are not guiltless. And the remedy lies in a deeper grasp and clearer enunciation of the higher sanctions that lie behind the idea of Sunday rest. We may be sure that, in the long run, the humanitarian motive alone will never be able to stand the steady and persistent efforts of the mammon spirit on the other side. Take away the religious argument altogether, and in the end the position is lost.

The plea uttered by Mr. C. W. Toms, the Chairman of the London Congregational Union, for a more frequent interchange of pulpits between the ministers of large and small churches, for the benefit of both, deserves serious consideration. The real difficulty lies, as he pointed out, not in the unwillingness of the ministers to do so, but in the attitude of the congregations, who are usually selfishly attached to their own minister if he happens to be in any way able and popular. Partly for lack of this rapport between the suburban and inner churches in London and the larger cities and towns, the latter are languishing, their ministers are overworked and discouraged, and the cause they represent is falling into premature and painful decay. Perhaps a little education in what Mr. Hugh Price Hughes has called the "urban conscience"—i.e., a sense of obligation to the entire town or city in which we live, and not merely to our own church or chapel—would be a great help to remedy this thoroughly unchristian state of things. A few sermons on 2 Cor. viii. and ix. would be of signal service to many of the wealthier churches.

The Archbishops are just now finding their office anything but a bed of roses, and the Northern Primate, growing tired of clergy who calmly ignore his spiritual advice, has proceeded to issue a somewhat peremptory order for the discontinuance of the ceremonial use of incense. The Church Times protests, in no mincing terms, against this display of authority, and foretells trouble in consequence. The Archbishop, unfortunately, discounts his own influence by confessing a personal weakness for incense, and expressing his hope that the time will come of "greater liberty in the revival of ancient usage." On what ground it is right to hope that, what is now forbidden may in future become allowable, is difficult to see—unless the whole movement is due to a desire to discount the temporary alarm of genuine Protestants as to the drift of things in the Church of England. In that case, when the alarm has died down, we may expect a recrudescence of objectionable practices. All this emphasizes the need for perpetual watchfulness and unflinching insistence on the principles of the Reformation.

It is a matter for much gratification that the Bishop of Sodor and Man has spoken so definitely on the sacerdotal movement. In the recent Manx Diocesan Conference, he said:—

> What is needed is, first, a firm and statesmanlike grasp of the situation; next, a determination to keep the Church of England true to herself—by which is meant true to her Articles and Formularies; thirdly, to avoid attempts to make her a kind of Pantheon, such as Mrs. Humphry Ward and others plead for, in which every kind of doctrine may find a niche . . . and, lastly, to admit and prefer only those men who prove themselves loyal to the doctrines and practice of the Book of Common Prayer.

Every day it is being proven beyond dispute that the puerile methods adopted by the Archbishops to bring about a better state of things, are utterly inadequate to the gravity of the situation. Dr. Straton stands almost alone in taking a statesmanlike view himself of the chaotic condition of ecclesiastical affairs.

Archdeacon Taylor's paper, recently read at the Church Association at Gloucester, on the Royal Supremacy, is a valuable contribution to the understanding of present-day questions affecting the Established Church. The exact nature of the Royal Supremacy in matters of religion seems to be misconceived both by clergy and laity. Archbishops have held courts and pronounced "opinions" which have no legal value whatever. In doing this they have evidently intervened where the Crown alone has jurisdiction. It is most desirable for all parties concerned that the people should know what the law actually is. The Archdeacon states the case precisely when he says:—

> This, then, is the present law of the Royal Supremacy—viz., that the Crown, as representing the nation, and acting through and by the courts and judges appointed by the nation, shall have, and exercise, all the power and authority over the ecclesiastical estate—i.e., over what we call "The Church"—to visit, reform, correct, and order all manner of abuses, errors, heresies, schisms, contempts, and enormities, which the Pope laid claim to, and actually exercised over the Church before the Reformation. In one word, the whole power of appointing the bishops, correcting all errors, heresies, and abuses in the Church, and deciding all appeals of whatever character, was transferred to the Crown, but restrained and regulated by the laws of the land.

We heartily agree with the protest of the Methodist Times and other papers against Dr. Parker's call upon the National Council of the Free Churches to take up the work of the Liberation Society, and turn itself into a political institution. In the first place, the Liberation Society may be entrusted to do its own work. In the second place, the Council, so far, has applied itself with gratifying success to the task of bringing the Free Churches into a closer fraternal relationship, in welding their spiritual forces into a grand whole, and in the organizing of a system of special missions all over the country, with a view to reach the unconverted and to edify believers. Here is more work for the Council than it will be able to compass in a good many years. The question of Disestablishment will settle itself if the spirituality of the Churches be deepened and their members educated in those principles which lie at the root of the religious life. The political aspects of the question may well be left to other organizations, formed and organized to deal with them.

The funeral of the late Grant Allen, at which no religious ceremony of any kind was permitted, and even Mr. Frederic Harrison found himself unable to give free utterance to his "religious faith," has brought to an end a career of great brilliancy and of greater failure. Mr. Allen belonged to that younger school of evolutionists who carried Darwin's theory to its last defences, and tried to explain everything in terms of mechanism and biology. These men have shown a "cheery courage" in this impossible and barren task; and their utter failure to substantiate their case is their greatest claim to gratitude. The truest science has passed far beyond the "dead point," as represented by such writers as these; and, as is shown by recent pronouncements from the chair of the British Association, has become very much more modest in its claims than it was twenty-five years ago to explain everything in heaven and earth, without the postulate of a Divine mind and will. Twenty-five years hence the phase of thought represented by Mr. Allen will have become an insignificant eddy in the backwaters of religious history.

If London is anything, it is a commercial city, and therefore the Lord Chief Justice was justified in speaking at his reception of the new Lord Mayor on the subject of commercial honesty; although, unhappily, that dignitary may himself presently be put on trial for his share in some company promotion schemes. Lord Russell said:

> It is a very grave and very serious thing that in the history of a company with which your name has been associated, a learned judge of the High Court should have thought it his duty to say that he might consider it necessary to lay the papers before the Public Prosecutor. It is because of the serious character of this suggestion that we have heard with satisfaction the statement which you have authorized the learned Recorder to make, viz., that you are prepared to meet these injurious allegations, and are prepared to defend your reputation before the established tribunals.

Lord Russell went on to say that, in the legislation which it is proposed to pass, "the aim is clear and simple: it is to enforce the rules of common honesty in the promotion of companies." There is only too much evidence that the dishonesty of commercial life remains a serious danger among us, more serious than any menace of our enemies; and it is high time it was dealt with.

The War.

THE following letters from correspondents, whose personal views of the merits of the war differ widely from each other, are of importance as showing a recognition of the one point on which all agree—the necessity of prayer. There is ample ground for humiliation and confession of sin in matters at home, as well as in our colonies. The definite points enumerated by our correspondents are one and all worthy of deep and solemn attention:—

Dear Sir,—In six weeks all Christendom will be remembering the birth of our blessed Jesus, all Christians will hear the angelic message, "Peace on earth, goodwill toward men;" and yet, unless God interpose, on that very day two Christian races will be preparing to continue the schemes of mutual slaughter.

A suggestion has been made to the authorities in South Africa, both at Cape Town and the Transvaal, that on that day, at any rate, there should be peace from midnight to midnight.

I am sure all Christians will unite in earnest prayer that the Lord, "whose kingdom ruleth over all," would in mercy grant this.—Yours faithfully, Radstock.

Dear Sir,—May I (in the hope that prayer may be as far as possible of one accord) suggest that the readers of The Christian should pray earnestly and persistently every evening during the war—

1. That events (military and otherwise) may make for an early peace.
2. That when the time for negotiation comes, a spirit of conciliation on both sides may prevail.
3. That such moderate demands may be made as shall not be too difficult of acceptance, or (by being unnecessarily humiliating to the vanquished) cause deep and permanent resentment, and leave South Africa a weak spot in our empire.

J. H. Greene.

Dear Sir,—It is most desirable that "The Church" of all sections should, with the least practicable delay, set apart a day for making the war in South Africa the subject of most earnest supplication to God unitedly (and by its members continuously) with humiliation before Him for personal and national sins, that He will mercifully shield our soldiers, sailors, and the multitudes of others so grievously afflicted by the present desperate war, and so overrule events that it may speedily be brought to a close in such a manner as shall tend to his glory.

Christians of this country have, like Daniel (chap. ix), the deepest cause for humiliation before God, on account of our united and individual sins and shortcomings, as well as for the secret and open sins of those of our nation who know not Christ as their Saviour; and for pleading with Him that He will, in his infinite love and long-suffering, hear the cry of his people for help in this time of trouble.—Yours very truly, J. T. Maberley.

Dear Sir,—Now, if ever, all parties in the Church of Christ seem to be at one on the subject of the appointment of a day for national humiliation and prayer. We do not suppose for one moment that prayer and confession of national sin have not been presented to Almighty God by thousands of believing people already. But this has been done only in our individual capacity. The nation, as a nation, needs to recognise the hand of God in the present grave condition of things ecclesiastical, military, and social.—Yours faithfully,

J. Woodhouse

The Future of the Christian Religion.

A STRIKING paper appeared in the September number of the Nineteenth Century, from the pen of Rev. Dr. Henry R. Percival, Presbyter of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, U.S.A. Under the heading, "The Future of the Christian Religion," Dr. Percival contends—and we are bound to admit that the contention is able and dispassionate—

1. That, among civilized nations, the form of Christianity nourished by Rome, which is ordinarily called "Popery," is making no headway.
2. That the distinctive doctrines of every Protestant reformer are being more and more universally rejected.
3. That there is in all Protestant Christendom (the Anglican Church being, perhaps, improperly included in that category) a distinct movement towards Catholicism, and a most evident desire for ceremonialism.

His first point Dr. Percival has little difficulty in proving by a swift but comprehensive survey of the present status of the Roman Catholic Church in England, on the Continent, and elsewhere, from which he augurs that "the future of Romanism is as black as it could possibly be."

It is, however, Dr. Percival's second point which has especially arrested our notice; and his remarks call for serious attention, even from those who would be prepared to accept the solemn challenges—made, as it seems to us, too light-heartedly.

There is a sickening feeling that it is not without some excuse that he demands, for example, "Where are those who believe, as Luther taught it, that doctrine of imputed righteousness which he called 'justification by faith alone'? The doctrine is extinct." And again, "Who, but a handful among old-fashioned Tractarians, considers himself bound to accept the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England?"

We are thankful to know that the doctrine of justification by faith is not "extinct;" but we are bound to admit that one hears very little about it in these days, nor indeed about any of the distinctive doctrines which our fathers considered to be the fat and marrow of our Christian theology.

Shall we not learn wisdom from our critics, and see to it that our Protestant Churches no longer

INVITE SUCH A CHALLENGE?

Christ and his Apostles taught doctrine, and that in the most unequivocal manner. Can modern Christianity afford to ignore it? The Christianity of the "Acts of the Apostles" was not a mere incident amongst many. Would it not seem as if, to many nineteenth-century professors, it were hardly more than that? The forgotten Christian art of "earnestly contending for the faith once delivered to the saints" is one which might well be practised again in the face of our author's assertion—that of Puritanism nothing remains to-day except "a pale, emasculated, swiftly-dying sabbatarianism."

Without in the least sympathising with Dr. Percival's attitude, and without accepting his conclusions, we must, nevertheless, concede further that it is not without some reason that he maintains there is a universal tendency towards ceremonialism in worship.

Can we be surprised that he points, and with scarcely concealed scorn, to the "vested choirs," "processionals," and "recessionals," which he asserts are to be found in Free Churches? "North of the Tweed," he adds, "if we can believe the reports which constantly reach us, a strong body of the ministers of the Established Church is introducing what we should call 'out-and-out ritualism' into the churches once delivered from such 'abominations' by John Knox."

There is little, if any, recognition by Dr. Percival of those forms of aggressive Christian activity which, through the blessing of the Divine Spirit, are our hope and encouragement amid the enshrouding darkness of these Laodicean days. Nor is there reference, of course, or scarcely a reference, to the individual faith and soberness which, as yet, have proved like the from corruption. But it will be seen from this brief notice that there is sufficient in Dr. Percival's suggestions to call each spiritual and regenerated heart to new diligence. And we could wish that the members of our Free Churches especially might be led to consider whether a return to their old-time simplicity might not do something to stem the tide of ceremonialism, which has undoubtedly set in. Certainly such simplicity is far more dignified and more convincing than an elaborate imitation of a ceremonialism professedly renounced.

Above all, let us hear, and, hearing, let us heed, the sad undertone of a Divine question which has never yet received an answer—"When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"

Never, surely, more than now, was there need to give diligent heed to the 2nd Epistle to Timothy, an epistle which marks out the path of the individual servant of God, amidst the prevailing disorder and failure. "Thou hast a few names, even in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments; they shall walk with Me in white, for they are worthy" (Rev. iii. 4).

Schools for Bible Study.

THE fifth of Rev. Hubert Brooke's lectures on Bible subjects was delivered on Wednesday, November 8, at Exeter Hall. Mr. Brooke dealt with the Book of Genesis, under the following heads:—

Introduction.—I. The title is Greek, "origin" or "generation" (ii. 4, Matt. i. 1). (Hebrew, "In the beginning." Comp. Mark i. 1, Jno. i. 1.) Deals with the beginnings of everything relating to the human race: family, religion, law, civilization, &c. II. Moses, the writer, used existing material in part (v. 1); and also wrote from direct revelation (i. 1-ii. 3). The book covers a period of 2,300 years.

Divisions.—1. (a) Introduction (i. 1, ii. 3); (b) eleven sections, each introduced by "These are the generations." 2. According to dispensational dealings: (a) Paradise; (b) antediluvian; (c) Noachian; (d) patriarchal. 3. By the seven chief characters of the book, corresponding with the seven stages of the creation (and, it may be suggested, with the 7,000 years of world history), Light, Division, Foundation, Rule, Progress, Fruitfulness, Full Growth. Note that the opening chapter, often assailed, is being proved more and more to be scientifically and historically correct.

Lines of Study.—1. The book is true (a) historically, (b) dispensationally, (c) ecclesiastically, (d) individually (see Gal. iv. 21-v. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 46). 2. Observe the connecting links between Genesis and Revelation: the beginnings here, the consummations there—e.g., Conflict, the Lamb, Babylon. 3. The great topics of salvation: The Fall, Sin, Sacrifice, Substitution, Priesthood, Messiah, Covenant.

Personal Use.—1. It is the seed-plot of the Bible, giving introduction, summary, and outline of contents. To master these is to hold the key for the whole line of Scripture teaching. 2. It illustrates the lesson of man's continual failure from Paradise to Egypt. 3. It shows the progressive revelation of Christ, as the source of deliverance and victory, of blessing to the world, bringing in the rule of peace: as Saviour, King, High Priest, Sacrifice, and Substitute. 4. At every stage of failure in man, God teaches how faith can grasp the divine corrective and salvation. (See Heb. xi. 1-22).

REV. G. SOLTAU'S LECTURES.

In a recent lecture, Mr. Soltau continued his consideration of our Lord's ministry under the aspect of:—

The Servant at Work.—What is a miracle? The four Gospels give a record of our Lord's work by his word and his hand. "Prophecy is a miracle in words; miracle is a prophecy in action." Miracles, or rather signs, were never wrought to produce, but to confirm faith. A miracle is a sign of the love and power of God, acting where nothing else will avail, to effect deliverance for his people. The thirty-four miracles may be divided into seven groups, dealing respectively with—(1) deliverance from Satanic power in the home and church; (2) varieties of sickness typical of divers aspects of sin; (3) death, typical of the dead in sins brought to life by his word; (4) sword-cut, the remedy of the disciple's error; (5) food supplies, care for temporal needs; (6) the storms, deliverance from trouble; (7) the fish, showing power exercised over nature for the benefit of God's people. Observe how the miracles were wrought by the power of the Spirit, and note the methods of action in healing. Is the same power present in the Church for dealing with sin? Consider why there are not more signs of his presence, and compare Matt. xii. 28, Luke xi. 30, Matt. ix. 29, Luke ix. 46, John xiv. 2, Luke xxiv. 49, and Acts ii. 1-9.

Needless Sunday Traffic.

THE recent victory gained over the seven-day newspapers emboldens me to raise the same question in another direction. On our railways there is an enormous amount of traffic on the Lord's Day, passenger and goods, for pleasure, business, &c. This, of course, involves a vast number of railway servants in Sunday work, and it seems to be steadily increasing. Is it necessary?

There is only one argument for it, from the point of view of shareholders and directors—larger dividends. But there are a large number of shareholders who value the Sabbath for themselves, and do not feel at rest to receive dividends earned at the cost of depriving their servants of Sabbath privileges. Are these to continue to hold shares in concerns whose whole policy in this matter they cannot but condemn? Or, on the other hand, are they to be shut out from investments which are safe and easily understood? These seem to be the only alternatives unless a change of policy can be brought about.

Can we not have a great crusade like the last in favour of the reduction of Sunday railway traffic to the necessary minimum; a great outcry from Christian hearts and consciences in favour of going back, at any cost, to the ways of better days? For if Christian shareholders withdraw and leave the whole business to those who have no conscience about the Sabbath, the consequences must be disastrous. But they might as well withdraw as keep silence. Can nothing be done in this important question?

Shareholder.

Evangelization Society.—Mr. John Wood writes:—"I have reason to think that some confusion is likely to arise about the title of this Society. For more than thirty years it has been the 'Evangelization Society,' not the 'Evangelization Society of London.' Recently I have seen Press allusions to us under the latter title, confusing us with the special committee, which held tent missions in London during the summer. It is to the interest of both bodies of workers that no confusion should arise."

Peace Sunday, which is always the Sunday before Christmas Day, falls this year on December 24. The committee of the Peace Society are again sending invitations for its observance to clergymen and ministers, to P.S.A.'s and to a number of Sunday school teachers. As usual they offer to forward information and literature free to all who intimate their desire to receive them, lists of publications being enclosed for this purpose. They will be glad to receive notices of sermons and addresses or other information of the observance of the day. Office: 47, New Broad Street, E.C.

The Spirit of Grace and of Supplication.

ZECH. XII. AND XIII.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

THERE is unusual solemnity in these opening words, as though to assure us that there can be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the Speaker to carry into effect all that He is about to unfold. Thus saith the Lord, which stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundation of the earth, and formeth the spirit of man within him.

The vision itself refers to a time yet future, though perhaps not far away, when the Jewish people shall have returned to their own land, but still in unbelief. Indeed, it is supposed by some that they will be in actual league with some awful impersonation of Antichrist, in accordance with Daniel ix. 27. For some reason, for the present veiled in mystery, the anti-Semitic hate, with which some of the nations of Europe are already smitten, will then become universal, and all the nations of the earth shall be gathered together against Jerusalem. But their confederacy will be overwhelmed with infinite disaster. Such is the burden of this threefold affirmation:—

Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of reeling unto all the peoples round about (v. 2).

I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all the peoples (v. 3).

In that day will I make the chieftains of Judah like a torch of fire among sheaves (v. 6).

Immediately upon this, an assurance is given that in that awful day, more fully described in the succeeding chapter, the Lord shall save, and the Lord shall defend (vv. 7, 8). In clouds the long-rejected Messiah, accompanied by his Bride, the Church, will appear to the succour of his brethren, as Joseph interposed on the behalf of his; and, as they behold Him seated at the right hand of power, and coming, as He told Caiaphas He would, in the clouds of heaven, they will appropriate the old refrain, prepared by Isaiah for this very occasion, when He shall swallow up death in victory, and take away the reproach of his people from off all the earth:—"Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation" (Isa. xxv. 9). "Behold! He cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see Him, and they which pierced Him; and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn over Him. Even so, Amen." Then the Lord Jesus will slay the Lawless One with the breath of his mouth, and bring Him to nought by the brightness of his coming. And then the solemn and awful threatenings of this passage will take effect: It shall come to pass, in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem.

Let us now turn from this side of the picture to consider the threefold effect that this interposition will have on the Jews themselves:—

In that day shall there be a great mourning (v. 11).

In that day there shall be a fountain opened (xiii. 1).

It shall come to pass in that day, that I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land (v. 2).

I. A great mourning. Notice the certainty of this announcement. "There shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem." There is no hesitation in the prophet's speech. He is as sure as the apostle Paul, when he says, "So all Israel shall be saved." This is a solemn reflection for the traveller, as he perambulates the streets of Jerusalem, or visits the piece of ancient wall by which the Jews wail weekly. There shall be a great mourning, not because the Turk has desecrated the sacred places, nor because the ruins of bygone days affront with their yawning gaps, nor yet because of the bitter sufferings of the much-hated race; but each for a personal rejection of the Messiah, who was driven through those streets and crucified without the gate.

The Comparison.—"As the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the Valley of Megiddon." At this spot the good King Josiah, whose reign had been the only gleam of brightness in the period between the reign of Hezekiah and the downfall of the State, was done to death by the Egyptian arrows. Jeremiah, lamented for Josiah, and all the singing men and singing women spoke of him in their lamentations. There never had been such universal and heartrending sorrow since Israel became a nation, as that which arose when the royal chariot drove through Jerusalem bearing his dead body for burial; but such grief is the only symbol adequate to express that coming national agony, when Israel shall look on her rejected Lord and mourn.

THE PRINCE OF LAMENTERS,

Yet another metaphor is pressed into service. The anguish with which a parent mourns for his only son, the bitterness of sorrow for a firstborn, is heartrending in any land, and among all peoples; but it is peculiarly so in an Eastern—a Hebrew home. Yet the bitter mourning which is one day to fill Jerusalem will be like that—as it was in the land of Egypt, when every family mourned over the death of its firstborn.

It will be universal. From the highest to the lowest of the court, for Nathan here stands for the youngest of David's sons; from the highest to the lowest of the priestly order, for Shimei stands for the least conspicuous of the priestly clans; all the people that remain shall be bowed in one common act of contrition. It is much to see one prodigal stricken with remorse—what will it be when a whole nation beats on its breast, and bewails its sins! Every wind laden with dirges, all the open spaces black with prostrate forms, all eyes wet with tears, the sombre shadow of the funereal pyre flung over all.

. . . . .

The Agent in producing this mourning is the Holy Spirit. "I will pour . . . the Spirit of grace and of supplication." Conviction of sin is the special work of the Holy Spirit. He uses the truth as his sword, piercing to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, of the joints and marrow. He particularly takes the truth of the sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus, and presents that to the conscience, pressing home the evil of rejecting such a Saviour, such pity, such holy yearning love, until the soul understands what sin has cost the Lord, and melts, as icebergs do when they float down into southern seas.

II. A Fountain Opened. On the day of Pentecost, Peter pointed to those cleansing streams. "And Peter said unto them: Repent ye, and be baptized, every one of you, into the name of Jesus Christ, unto the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." With marvellous force and eloquence John Bunyan brought out the significance of those words, every one of you. But I struck Him on his head with the rod: is there any hope for me? Every one of you, saith the Apostle. But I spat in his face: is there forgiveness for me? Yes, is the reply, for every one of you. But I drove the spikes into his hands and feet, which transfixed Him to the cross: is there cleansing for me? Yes, cries Peter, for every one of you. But I pierced his side, though He had never done me wrong; it was a ruthless, cruel act, and I am sorry for it now: may that sin be washed away? Every one of you, is the constant answer. Repent, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out. The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin. If the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctify unto the cleanness of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the Eternal Spirit, offered Himself without blemish to God, cleanse your conscience!

And as it was at the beginning of this era, so it shall be at its close, with this difference, that whereas then some few thousand souls only stepped into the fountain, at last a whole nation, the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, shall wash there and be cleansed. Then the words of the Apostle Peter, spoken centuries ago in Solomon's porch, will be fulfilled, when Israel repents and turns again, her sins will be blotted out, and there will come times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and the restoration of all things, "whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began" (Acts iii. 21).

III. The Destruction of Idolatry. The names of the idols will be cut off out of the land and the prophets and unclean spirits will be caused to pass out of it. It is not enough for God to forgive. He must deal with the sources of all the waywardness and backsliding of his people. There will be, therefore, a strong and radical dealing with

IDOLS, PROPHETS AND DEMONS.

The thoroughness of these drastic measures is brought out in an imaginary vignette of a household scene in those happy days. It is supposed that the son of godly parents (who have lately mourned for their sins apart, and been delivered from them), suddenly feels himself called upon to assume the rôle of a prophet. He encourages people to come to him to detect the culprit in some theft or murder, or to cause the rain to fall on the parched ground, or to perform magical rites over the sick, or call up the dead—to do, in fact, what Balak wanted Balaam to do, when he sent for him across the desert. The tidings come to his parents, who are so devoted in their adherence to God, that they would rather lose their child than allow him to pursue his evil God-dishonouring work in their home. It shall come to pass that, when any shall yet prophesy, then his father and his mother that begat him shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live; for thou speakest lies in the name of the Lord: and his father and his mother shall thrust him through when he prophesieth. It would not be possible to discover a stronger way of affirming the absolute transformation that will finally come over the Jewish people, when their devotion to God shall overpower their natural love to their children.

. . . . .

The passion against idolatry and false prophets would become so intense, that the practisers of arts which had imposed on the credulity of the people would be ashamed and afraid to own their profession. The prophets shall be ashamed, every one of his vision, when he prophesieth, neither shall they wear a hairy garment (this being the special dress of the sons of the prophets, by which they were at once recognised).

If a township of people should rise against a man suspected of being a prophet, he would vehemently protest that they were mistaken.

and that he was no prophet. Trembling for his life, because so certain of the temper of his accusers, he would make any subterfuge to escape suspicion. I am a tiller of the ground, for I have been made a bondman from my birth.

If, finally, in the pursuance of their hot inquiry, they discovered marks on his body, which indicated that he had been previously convicted and branded for following the calling of a prophet, he would rather assign them to the hands of his friends than dare to admit that he had ever been suspected of claiming to be a prophet. One shall say unto him, What are these wounds between thine arms? Then he shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends.

This inquiry and reply have often been associated with the marks of the nails in the hands of Christ. But this is not the natural reading of the passage, which can only be attributed in the sense above given; the evident drift of the passage being to show that there will be such a revelation of the evil wrought by the prophets, and so strong an antagonism against them, that those suspected of being such will be prepared to evade the charge at any cost, knowing that if it is established against them they may expect but short shrift. This will be a deliverance indeed, which shall be radical and final. But if God is prepared to do so great and perfect a work for his ancient people, let us give Him no rest until He has utterly abolished our idols also, and purified us unto Himself—people for his possession, zealous of good works.

"The Arm of the Lord."

A COUNTRY chapel at 10.30 on a hot Sunday morning. The air is close; the light strong; the pew hard; the building ugly.

That man singing in the choir has a well-trained and tuneful tenor voice, but he is at heart an unconverted man. A tall, wan-looking woman in the middle of the chapel is wedded to misery. A young girl decked up in gaudy finery is breaking her parents' hearts. Two other young people are talking and tittering during the prayers. What a motley group! Will the Lord visit such a place? Will his arm be stretched out to save? Evidently the preacher thinks so, as he prepares to deliver his soul. He is well acquainted with the facts stated above. But he had got up at dawn, and spent some time with his God.

. . . . . .

The Spirit is quietly working, pleading. He comes to the tenor and shows him that he comes to chapel and sings merely for appearances' sake; that all his religion is assumed; that his membership is a name on paper, nothing more! The man, to all appearances, is quietly listening to the sermon; but is in reality deliberately quenching the Spirit of God. Yet that man will give his experience at the class meeting; nay, he will dare to kneel to-night at the Lord's Table!

Here the Spirit is touching the heart of a little child. She has the idea that Jesus has taken her up in his arms; He has held her to his heart and kissed her. She feels supremely happy, and resolves in the afternoon to gather some flowers from her very little garden and take them to a poor, old, sick woman.

Hither and thither among that little congregation does the Spirit go, missing not one—not one. He knocks at each door. Some are kept shut in spite of his knocking. Some open the door a little way, and hold a parley with him; but at last turn away with the request that He will come at a more convenient season!

But there was one there who cried in his soul—

"Oh, come to my heart, Lord Jesus,
There is room in my heart for Thee!"

Did the Lord Jesus come to his heart? Ten years later I heard that many say, "Yes, I am left alone in the world; folks pity me very much, poor, suffering, and solitary; but"—and here he smiled—"I would go through far worse to come at last and lay my head at my Master's feet up yonder!" M. S.

Revival Memories.

Messrs. MOODY and SANKEY, 1873-1875.

Continuing the series of interesting articles upon Historical Revivals, the United Presbyterian Magazine for November has a very readable sketch, from the pen of Rev. John Young, M.A., of the visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to Great Britain in 1873-5. We make some extracts

THE special agents used in the movement, Dwight L. Moody and Ira D. Sankey, were in many ways eminently qualified as instruments for such a work of grace, and through it all they were marvellously helped and guided of God. Mr. Moody impressed one from the first as a strong man—physically, mentally, and spiritually—of great force of character and tenderness of heart, strong in conviction, in courage, in compassion, of commanding common-sense, and of a general wholesomeness and effectiveness which gained upon one the closer one came to him in personal intercourse. In all his speaking there was the clear note of certainty. He preached, like the old Seceder, 'as if God was at his elbow.' The love of God was his one theme: 'the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness towards us in Christ Jesus.' The Cross of Christ and his atoning sacrifice focussed the Divine love in its dealing with sinful man. The abiding presence of the Holy Ghost, to shed abroad that love in every heart ready to receive Him, gave assurance of power to restore and sanctify any and every hearer.

Mr. Sankey brought the service of song as a powerful agency for impressing the heart and mind, for preparing the soil for the reception of the seed of the Word, and for deepening impressions produced by spoken address. The work of music and song in this connection had been prepared for by the visit of the Jubilee Singers, who had attracted large audiences of ordinary concert-goers to hear their plantation songs of

"FREE GRACE AND DYING LOVE."

Since Mr. Sankey's visit, song, as an instrument of Gospel preaching, has taken and kept a place for itself in the ministries of the Church, and many trophies of grace have been won by the blessing of the Spirit on its instrumentality.

The central place in the movement was given to prayer. Like all great religious movements, it had been cradled in prayer; and from first to last the prayer meeting supplied its motive-power. Nothing revealed Mr. Moody's admirable knowledge of men and skill in dealing with them more than his success in breaking down the traditions of long, doctrinal, hortatory public prayers and circumlocutory devotional phraseology, and in converting the prayer meeting into a bright and blissful hour, full of warmth and sunlight, in which were blended pointed and practical address, sweet and suggestive praise, and prayer that lifts the soul up to God, and gains for it the strength to live and labour for man.

But all the agencies and methods looked toward, and were intended to converge in, the inquiry meeting. Very many regarded this part of the work with suspicion at first. But suspicion was ere long disarmed by the prudent management of the arrangements, and by the proved usefulness of the meeting in gathering in spiritual results. Mr. Moody himself has a wonderfully quick eye for observing where impression had been produced, an insight which led him to cases just needing a helpful word, and yet afraid to ask for it. There was, under his guidance, the greatest care for delicate, tender handling of those under anxiety, and the most reverential and quiet conversation with them; and he did not encourage the eager counting of conversions, or parading of the particulars of individual cases, which has done so much to discredit inquiry meetings. There was equal care for excluding all but qualified and accredited persons from meddling with the work of the inquiry room, and for inquirers being referred to their own ministers or to others who could guide their thoughts and habits so as to strengthen them in the faith, and secure for them the full advantages of Christian and Church fellowship.

The movement owed much of its success and stability to the stress laid by Mr. Moody on the

CO-OPERATION OF THE LOCAL MINISTRY.

Without the assurance of that he would accept no invitation and begin no work. His loyalty to the Church life of Scotland was unimpeachable. His regard for the ordained ministry, his admiration for the stated work of the pastor, and his sympathy with its many difficulties, were manifested in many ways in public and in private.

What, then, were some of the characteristic fruits of this great movement? What have been some of its developments in the after years? It would be easy to cull from one's own pastoral experience, from the ample records of the movement in various towns, and from the pages of biographies, such as those of Cairns, Dale, Drummond, and Robertson of Newington, ample testimony to the striking and satisfactory nature of the effects produced by this revival. At the close of the Edinburgh meetings, a meeting was attended by 1,700, chiefly intelligent young men and women, who had been brought to decision. Dr. Andrew Bonar once indicated his opinion that nearly 7,000 persons had owned themselves as recipients of the supreme blessing; but the Day alone will declare the magnitude and the value of the spiritual harvest of those years. The movement affected powerfully all classes of society to a degree which differentiated it from the previous awakening of 1859-60.

Nor were those who passed through inquiry meetings all who experienced the great change as a result of the movement. Cases of the most interesting character were continually cropping up in pastoral experience through the after months and years. To many the stands out as the most memorable feature of the work in Edinburgh. The Saturday meetings were a spring of untold blessing. Conversions—intelligent, clear, unmistakable—were numerous, and the "early piety" of those happy days has, in many cases known to us, proved to be "eminent piety." The blessing passed into the homes, and changed in many households the whole bearings of the family life. In Edinburgh large numbers of educated and thoughtful young men and women were claimed and won for Christ—teachers, students, professional men, and many of the leisured classes. In Glasgow a work among young men, perhaps the most striking in the records of any revival, was an outstanding feature, and gave the impetus to the work among the young men in other parts of Scotland, and in England and Ireland, for which Mr. Moody largely used Henry Drummond. In London were the marvel of the day to London society, and Mr. Moody's work touched, yea, affected deeply, a stratum of society not easily, perhaps seldom, reached by ordinary evangelistic movements.

THE OPERA-HOUSE MEETINGS

On the other hand, the lowest classes, and those outside of ordinary religious and Church influences, were laid hold of by great mass meetings, such as those held in the Grass-market of Edinburgh and in some of the largest central halls of the great cities; and by the free breakfast work, which still continues in many places as a permanent addition to the aggressive work of the Church.

We cannot manufacture a revival, or lay down the lines along which or within which the Spirit is to work. 'The coming revival,' which men speak of and expect, must 'come'—come in God's way, at God's time, by God's chosen and prepared instruments. It is ours not to plan it, nor to force it, but to 'stand before the Lord,' ready to observe his goings in the sanctuary, and to respond to the first breathings of the Spirit as He moves upon the face of the waters. It is ours to be true to the truth, which is, in every revival, the instrument of the Spirit, the love of God in the free gift and perfect sacrifice of Christ, our substitute Sin-bearer; and in dependence upon the Spirit to wait for Him and be taught by Him, that, when the revival comes, we may be used of Him to carry it forward, to know its joys, and to lay its results at the Redeemer's feet.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 19. 2 Chron. xxv.

"NOT with a perfect heart" (2). Too often this is true of men who mean to do right, but there is one flaw, one reserve, one door open towards the world and sin; and through this the evil one comes to mar their peace, their testimony, and their life. It was so with Amaziah, and this finally led to his disastrous end. Be very sure that, as a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so you are not stronger than you are in respect to the one indulgence or temptation beneath whose influence you often fall. You judge yourself by what you feel in your strongest and best moments; God judges you by what you are in your weaker ones. The little rift in the lute will mar all the music; the one worm in the timbers will sink the vessel.

How careful we should be of the alliances we form! The prophet remonstrated with Amaziah for allying himself with the children of Israel, and urged him rather to forfeit the subsidy he had furnished them than allow them to go with him to the battle. Do you fear to give up that partnership which you know is damaging your spiritual life and integrity? Do you dread the consequences of withdrawing from that circle, which is certainly foreign to your deepest inclinations? Do you shrink from making an enemy of that man or woman who tempts you, by clearly ridding yourself of their society? Ponder, then, I pray you, the answer of the man of God, "The Lord is able to give thee much more than this." It is better to go into the battle, with God as your ally, than to enter it in unlawful fellowship with those against whom He has a controversy.

The soul that begins with an imperfect consecration ends with putting Edom's gods in Jehovah's place. Nothing could have been more fatuous and unreasonable. Yet take care lest you, too, barter your Saviour for things that will not help you in the stern battle.

MONDAY, November 20. 2 Chron. xxvi.

The biography of a man may often be written by a quotation of texts. It is certainly so with regard to this king Uzziah, whose reign outwardly was a very prosperous one. Fifty-two years of great prosperity fell to Israel through the goodness of God, but his life deteriorated as lives so often do when there is plenty of gold and ease. Let us notice the outlines of his career as furnished in these paragraphs.

"He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his father had done." "He set imself to seek God, and as long as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper."

So, in our young manhood, we are often eager enough in our religious exercises, especially under the powerful example and teaching of a man like Zechariah, who towers above his contemporaries, and can see what is hidden from ordinary men. Seeking the Lord and prosperity remind us of the godliness that has promise for this world, and, there is no doubt, if a man will resolutely follow the Divine counsels, even in this life he must prosper.

"He waxed exceeding strong. . . . His name spread far abroad, for he was marvellously helped till he was strong." Marvellously helped! How true that is of many of us. When we look back upon our earlier life, and think of the position to which God has raised us, can we do other than cry "Marvellous! marvellous!" We cannot understand why God has so signally favoured us, but we are persuaded that it is only by his hand that we are what we are. We should look upon our strength as a talent to be used for God. Too often we forget that we are made strong in order to help the weak, and our heart is lifted up to do corruptly. The one security against Uzziah's sin is to cherish a thankful heart on the one hand, and to use whatever we have got for the good of others.

TUESDAY, November 21. 2 Chron. xxvii.

The story of Jotham, as told here, is memorable if for only one sentence, that he became mighty because he ordered his ways before the Lord his God. The Psalmist said that God will show his salvation to those that order their conversation aright. The same word may be translated "order" or "establish," so that we get the following thoughts:—

The right life is a well-ordered one. Just as we order our prayers before God, putting his honour and glory before the expression of our personal need, so there should be an ordering of our ways. We should do first things first. We should use the early morning when the mind is freshest, and we are least likely to be disturbed, for religious exercises, and the serious duties of life. We should have a distinct purpose even though that purpose be the building up of a strong inner character around the commonest details of life.

An ordered life is a mighty life. The people to be dreaded in the world are those who say with Paul, "This one thing I do." They are invulnerable and invincible; repressed in one place, they break out in another; cast down, they are not destroyed; perplexed, not in despair. The might of the stream is when its rushing waters are concentrated into one channel, and the weakest life may become mighty for good when its concentrated purpose is fixed upon doing the next thing to the utmost of its power.

An ordered and mighty life depends upon the favour of God. However well considered our plans, or single our purpose, nothing will avail apart from God. Before his eye every plan and purpose must be laid. In his might, through the Holy Spirit, received by faith, the arms of our hands must be made strong.

WEDNESDAY, November 22. 2 Chron. xxviii.

There is a close connection between the morality of a land and its history. As soon as Ahaz imitates the abominations of the heathen he is delivered into the hand of his foes. There is a great deal of interest just now excited in the new treatment of consumption. Formerly, everything was done to heal the lungs by medicine, or external appliances. Latterly, the patients have been placed as much as possible in the open air, and everything done to increase physical health, because, as the blood is fresh and pure, it is able to overcome the microbes of disease with which the system has become infected. The counterpart of this holds in the spiritual world. When we are in full spiritual health, we are able to resist, without difficulty, the microbes of temptation and moral evil which swarm around us; but when a nation, or individual, yields to aught which enervates its spiritual vigour, it becomes at once a prey to enemies which are lurking round, and which at other times would have no power whatsoever. See to it that in your heart you do not yield to the corruptions of the world; so shall you be proof against all the wiles and assaults of the devil.

It was a noble act on the part of the prophet Oded to denounce the captivity of so many of their brethren and sisters by the victorious army, and the force of his words was witnessed to by the uprising of the noblest sentiment of pity and fraternal affection. This sending the captives home, clothed, shod, and anointed, was a beautiful act, and we can only hope that England will behave with the same magnanimity when the time for settling the Transvaal arrives.

THURSDAY, November 23. 2 Chron. xxix.

What eager haste was this? In the first month of the first year of his reign, Hezekiah began his work of reform! Carry forth the filthiness, he cried, be not now negligent! The clarion call of this exhortation rings yet, and bids us cleanse the inner temple of all filthiness of the flesh and spirit. Let us hasten to open the doors, kindle the lamps, and burn incense in the holy peace of the inner life. There may be a good deal of preparation and sanctification necessary. The operations in our great hospitals are performed in rooms whose walls are washed with antiseptic mixtures, and the instruments are kept in carbolic. There is the more need that those of us who are engaged in the service of God's sanctuary should be specially cleansed in the antiseptic of the Holy Ghost, that no unclean microbe may attach to us in our ministration to others.

The usual sacrifices followed the cleansing, as though to teach us that the negative separation from evil must be followed by the positive dedication to God and to his service. The burnt offering as well as the sin offering is necessary, because it is expressive of our sincere and entire devotion to God. It was as the burnt offering began that the song of the Lord began also, a song which spread from the Levites to the congregation, and so finally to the entire land. Self-sacrifice always leads to the song of the heart. Yield yourself to God for his service in the world, and it is inevitable that the white-vestured choir of Levites will stand in your heart—instruments of music in their hands—and there will be a perpetual cadence of celestial music.

FRIDAY, November 24. 2 Chron. xxx.

In India, in the early stage of the crops, the paddy-fields are marked out by a number of ridges which divide the plot of one native from another. But while the green spires are reaching maturity, it is impossible longer to see the dividing lines of demarcation, because the whole vast acreage is covered with a mass of waving green. So with the work of God in human hearts. When it is at a low ebb, the divisions between Christians are evident; but, when a revival comes, we no longer think of the fields, but of the crop; no longer of the folds, but of the flock. Thus, in this time of national revival, Hezekiah and his people could not refrain from sending out a general invitation to all Judah and Israel, and especially to Israel, inviting them to turn to the God of their fathers. To a very large extent the hand of God gave the people "one heart."

Then there came another cleansing of the land, a new rendering of sacrifice, and a fresh outburst of such gladness and great joy as had not been since the time of Solomon. When God turns our spiritual captivities, it is with us, as with the people on their return from Babylon—our mouth is filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing. Every great revival has had its Gregorian chants, its Luther's hymns, its Wesley, its Havergal, its Sankey.

Do not forget to notice Hezekiah's prayer, which rose from his belief that God cared more for the setting of the heart to seek Him than for the minute ritualistic prescriptions of purification. To obey is better than sacrifice—the condition of the heart more than stainless vestures or correct postures.

SATURDAY, November 25. 2 Chron. xxxi.

The maintenance of the priests and Levites must be assured that they might give themselves without anxiety to the work of the Lord. We are therefore commanded to remember those who are over us, and admonish us in the Lord. The minister of God should have no anxiety on his heart about pecuniary matters, that he may the more freely give himself to his holy duties; and when his people have put away all that grieves God, as Israel had done, and have entered upon an enthusiastic religious life, there is no difficulty about the support of their religious teachers. "The tithe of all things is brought in abundantly." It is not often that ministers of religion are in the happy condition of Azariah, the chief priest; but they are partly to blame in not instructing their people to take tithes of their income and property in a systematic manner. Everyone who names the name of Christ should set apart a proportion of yearly income for the service of God, giving as much more as may be possible.

There are beautiful expressions in this chapter—as, for instance, when we are told that they brought in the dedicated things faithfully; and, again, that the small as well as the great received their share, even as the daily portion of each required (R.V. marg.). As each priest received a daily allotment according to his daily need, so we are taught to ask for our daily bread, and believe that our Father will not fail. Note, too, a closing expression about Hezekiah, that he began nothing into which he did not put all his heart, and God placed the crown of prosperity upon him and his work.

The Lord's Prayer.

By Rev. J. R. MILLER, D.D.

V.—The Bread Petition.

MUCH of the meaning of the Lord's Prayer lies in the order of its petitions. The first longings of a truly devout heart are for the hallowing of God's name, the coming of God's kingdom, and the doing of God's will. Then follows a prayer for bread. We should never forget this order. We are to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then all things needful for our bodies will be added.

Yet it is a great comfort to know that we may bring our bodily wants to God in prayer. Throughout the Scriptures we are taught that nothing which concerns our life in any way is too small to be of interest to Him who feeds the birds and clothes the flowers.

This petition for daily bread, like all the sayings of Christ, is full of deep meaning. Every word has its rich suggestions. We ask God to give us bread. We thus recognise our dependence on Him for it. It is not easy to offer this petition when we have plenty in our hands and no fear of want. We can conceive of the very poor, with no bread, on the verge of starving, uttering the prayer and putting their whole heart into it. But for those who have never felt a real pang of hunger, and have never been without a store from which to draw for to-morrow's provision, it is hard to realize the sense of dependence which the petition implies.

This is one of the words of Christ whose full meaning only experience can teach. Yet it is true that whatever abundance may be ours, we are actually dependent upon God for each day's bread. The story of the forty years of the miracle of manna in the wilderness is but a parable of another miracle infinitely greater—the providing of bread for all earth's millions all the days of all the centuries. What we call the laws of nature are but our Father's ordinary ways of working. The regularity of these laws is but the proof of divine faithfulness. Suppose that for a single year, or but for a week, God's miracle of bread should cease from the earth, what would be the consequences?

This prayer implies also that all the bread of the world is God's. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof."

THE BREAD BELONGS TO HIM, and what we need can become ours only through his gift. We may take it and use it without asking Him for it, but if we do we take that to which we have no right. Even if the food be on our table, ready to be eaten, it is not yet ours until we have asked God for it. Those who pray not, nor even think of God, seem to be fed as well as the righteous—sometimes more bountifully. "God maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust." But there is a difference. Those who ask God for their bread get it as his gift and with his blessing upon it, while those who take it without asking for it get it, and may be fed; but they lose the blessing. This suggests the true meaning, and the fitness of the Christian custom of asking a blessing before a meal.

The form of the prayer teaches also the lesson of unselfishness. It is not "Give me," but "Give us." We cannot come to God for ourselves alone. We must for all—even for our enemies, if we have enemies. Especially must we think of the needy, the destitute, asking God to give them bread. If our prayer is sincere we must be ready also, so far as we have opportunity and so far as we are able, to help answer our own prayer for others by sharing our plenty with those who lack. "Whoso hath this world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him?" One of the most beautiful commentaries on this teaching is in the narrative of the early Church. After the day of Pentecost, in the glow of the new-born love of the disciples, those who had abundance gave to those who were poor, so that none lacked.

Bow thy head and pray
That while thy brother starves to-day
Thou mayest not eat thy bread at ease;
Pray that no health or wealth or peace
May lull thy soul while the world lies Suffering, and claims thy sacrifice.

There is a limitation in the petition. "Give us our bread this day." In the other form of the prayer, in Luke, the words vary somewhat, "Give us our daily bread day by day." In Matthew it is a prayer only for the one day, with no thought of any to-morrow; in Luke it takes in other days, but only as they come, one day at a time. In both forms we are taught to pray only for the bread of one day. There is a deep lesson in this teaching. Life is not given to us by the year or the month, but

BY SINGLE DAYS.

Night is the horizon which bounds our vision; we see not the morrow, and we are to confine our thought to the little space included between the rising and the setting of the sun. This does not forbid forethought—the Bible encourages wise and proper care for the future. But all we are authorized to ask God for is simply enough for the present day. Even if in the evening our last crust is eaten, and there is nothing in store for to-morrow, we need not be afraid. When the morrow comes we may ask God for its own bread, and know that He will hear us.

There is a special suggestiveness in the word "our"—"Give us our bread." It is God's bread first; it becomes ours through God's gift. But there is something else also implied—the bread must be earned by us before it is properly ours. It is clearly taught in the Scriptures that everyone must work for his own bread. This was the law of the unfallen state in Eden, and is now the law in the kingdom of redemption. Of course this does not apply to little children who are too young to work, to the old who are too feeble, or to the sick who are incapacitated for work—all such come under God's special care, and will not be forgotten. But all who are able to work must do so, or the bread they eat is not rightfully their own. "If any will not work," says St. Paul, "neither should he eat."

The bread must be earned also in ways which have the divine approval. If a man steals his daily bread, it is not his—he has robbed God and robbed his fellow-man, and there is

A CURSE ON WHAT HE EATS.

Money got in fraudulent transactions or by any dishonest means has not been righteously earned, and God's blessing cannot be invoked upon it by any form of prayer. Imagine a gambler, for example, living on the fruits of his sin, asking God to give him, with a blessing, the bread on his table! Imagine a saloon-keeper, who has earned his bread by selling strong drinks which have brought ruin upon lives and homes, asking God to bless his daily bread! God's bread can become ours with a blessing only when earned in honest ways.

There is yet another limitation in the petition in the word "daily." It means enough for the day—seasonable provision. It is not a prayer, therefore, for a large supply. We are not authorized to ask for luxuries. We need not infer that it is wrong for us to have more than our actual need that the day requires; but this is all that is promised. St. Paul says, "My God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory." This suggests a very abundant provision. Our Father does everything generously. He is never niggardly or mean in caring for his children. Ofttimes He supplies their wants most abundantly, giving them far more than they need. But we are taught to ask only for enough.

The prayer, therefore, would seem to forbid extravagance. God's bread

SHOULD NEVER BE WASTED.

There is a story of Carlyle, that one day he was seen going into the middle of the street to pick up a crust of bread which he saw lying there in the dust. Taking it in his hand gently, as if it had been something very valuable, he brushed off the clay and then carried it to the kerb and laid it down, saying, "I was taught by my mother never to waste anything, least of all bread, the most precious of all God's gifts. This crust of bread may feed a hungry dog or a little sparrow." Our Lord Himself taught the same lesson, when, after working his great miracle of the loaves, He directed that all the fragments be gathered up, that nothing should be lost. The bread we get as God's gift is sacred, and not a crumb of it should be wasted, either recklessly or in useless extravagance.

We are taught to limit our wants, but we are to ask in confidence for all we may need for the day. Days differ. Some bring their heavy burdens, their great wants, their keen sorrows, their crosses. Others have fewer needs. God knows our days, and He is better able than we are to measure our real wants for each day. We may safely, therefore, ask for daily bread, and let Him choose what to give us. He will never give too little.

"If, a 'To-morrow,' who can tell?
To sleep, or wake?
To work, or rest?
What He deems best,
God gives, we take,
Knowing, 'He doeth all things well!'"

It is surely a great comfort to know that in this world each one of us is thought about and cared for by our Father, who loves us with an infinite and everlasting love. He does not think of us merely as a vast, uncounted family, but as individuals. He knows our names. Each one of us is personally dear to Him. The very hairs of our head are all numbered. Not one of us is ever forgotten in heaven for a moment. We can be in no place or condition in which our circumstances are not well known to God. "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask Him."

This teaching makes the law of life very simple. We are not to live to get food, but are to live, first and last, as God's and for God. We have nothing to do directly with the supplying of our own wants—that is God's matter, not ours. There are but two things we need to concern ourselves about. First, we are to do our duty—the will of God, as it is made known to us day by day. Then we are to trust God for the supply of our bodily and temporal wants.

Those who have learned to live thus have found the way of peace. Over-anxiety is sin. It dishonours God, for it is bred of doubt. It hurts our own life, hindering our spiritual growth, marring the beauty of our character, and blurring our witness for God to others. If we faithfully do God's will, as revealed to us, and then trust God perfectly, the peace of God will guard our hearts and thoughts in Christ Jesus.

Snowdrop Bands.—At this season when factory clubs, girls' evening homes, &c., are re-opening for the winter, workers may be glad to know that Snowdrop Bands are found very helpful by an increasing number of those who feel the importance of awakening in our young girls a higher ideal of life and conduct, a standard of purity which may save them from a world of perils. It is not a new and rival society, but can be grafted on to existing ones, such as the Y.W.C.A. Temperance Bands, Christian Endeavour, &c. There are twenty branches in London, twelve in Birmingham, eight in Bristol, &c. The "Letters" also, are full of suggestion. I shall be glad to supply, by post, any information desired.—(Mrs.) Amy Watson, Southwold, Sheffield.

Mr. C. T. Studd's Farewell.

A LARGE and interested audience assembled on Monday last, at Exeter Hall, in connection with the farewell of Mr. C. T. Studd to undertake work in India, under the auspices of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society. The gathering was marked throughout by spiritual fervour and deep missionary enthusiasm.

After Lord Kinnaird had briefly described the aims and methods of the Society, Rev. H. Price Hughes gave a breezily characteristic address. Recalling the interest aroused by Mr. Studd's first departure for the mission field, Mr. Hughes remarked that it would be a blessing to the country and to themselves if the privileged classes, instead of prowling about the earth in search of personal enjoyment, would work for God and turn their attention to the great PROBLEMS OF THE MISSION FIELD.

He had done his best to drive rich Methodists, for instance, out of the country, persuading them to go out to Uganda or to India, rather than settle down in highly fashionable villadom at Chislehurst or some other exquisite residential suburb. If they could not preach, they might at least give a plain testimony for Christ, and prove a blessing and encouragement to those who laboured in the midst of dark and discouraging circumstances. Christians must be more unconventional and more romantic in their ideas of foreign mission work, and bring greater devotion and nobler generosity to bear, so that there should be an end of the dearth of men and of the eternal want of pence for the proper maintenance and extension of the work.

Dwelling on the importance of such special missions as Mr. Studd is undertaking, Mr. Hughes pointed out that it was no reflection on those who prepared the foundation if a man specially endued by God with the soul-converting power came in to erect the superstructure. With regard to Mr. Studd's work, the speaker regretted the attitude taken up by people who were friends of every nation except their own. While willing to help people of all races and colours, surely our own kith and kin should be considered. Some sections of Anglo-Indian society might have become demoralized by the peculiar and subtle influences of the East; but it should be remembered that some of our civilians and soldiers in the East have been conspicuous saints. Both as patriots and as earnest Christians, India had claims upon us; and it was, indeed, a blessing to India that it had been brought under the rule of the British, who regarded the people not as a community to be fleeced, but with a pure and disinterested desire to do them good. Nevertheless, we should never serve India well, in the truest sense, until we brought it to the feet of Christ. Mr. Studd would take the real evangelical Gospel, preaching a high type of Christianity, enthusiastic and whole-hearted.

Rev. F. B. Meyer's address was brief and homely, but lit with vivid flashes of spiritual appeal. He referred to old associations with Mr. Studd at Leicester, and described some hallowed moments of blessing that had been fraught with inspiration to himself. He congratulated Mr. Studd on his determination to go to India, and ventured to foreshadow that his tour would prove a stimulus, not only to Anglo-Indians, but to the English-speaking natives who, especially, welcome so gladly any worker who they feel is accessible to inquiry and desirous to help. Following Mr. Meyer came Rev. Isaac Row, an experienced missionary of the Society's, thoroughly versed in the work under many and varied conditions. He gave a picturesque account of many toilings, especially among the planters and railway people, and, with a touch of pathos, described the spiritual hunger of many whom he had visited in lonely places.

Mr. C. T. Studd's address was simple but direct. Modestly describing himself as but a popgun which by the prayers of God's people needed to be transformed into a "seven-inch quick firer," the speaker went on to make to the young men present to devote themselves to missionary work. As to the personal aspects of his forthcoming journey, he felt that, apart from his responsibilities as an Englishman and a Christian, there were family relationships with regard to India which accentuated the feeling that he must go. He was willing to labour there for a short or a long time, as the Lord might lead. His wife and children were staying behind, and while it cost him much to leave them, yet he must follow Christ.

Mr. Studd reviewed, in vigorous terms, his ideas as to what a missionary should be, and drew some forcible illustrations of devotion from the behaviour of the British soldiery in the Transvaal. While all were agreed that the war was a terrible thing, they were equally agreed that it must now be carried through. So, in the spiritual war, they must spare no effort, shrink from no sacrifice, to see it successfully through. Expressing the opinion that the extension of British rule was a good thing, since the British, more than any other people, honestly sought the good of those over whom they exercised sway, Mr. Studd said he could not but rejoice when a new portion of the map came to be "painted red." Yet, how much vaster and nobler was the grand ideal of "painting men red" with the knowledge of Christ. "Go ye into every land and preach the Gospel to every creature." Since 1870, India had added 70,000,000 to its huge population. What urgency there was, then, that a great spiritual war of a general character should be energetically and instantly waged!

The reports from South Africa must needs contain accounts of many horrors and difficulties; but there was nothing gained by blinking them. Obviously the best method was to face them, and go on to conquer in spite of them. So, in obeying the call of God to the foreign field, they should not be daunted by difficulty, but march on the quicker to end the war between heathenism, superstition, and ignorance, and the true religion of Jesus Christ. After reviewing the possibilities of the work, and pointing out the potent influences that might come about as the result of the conversion—for example, of Anglo-Indian planters, whose influence over the natives was so great—Mr. Studd concluded by expressing a humble hope that his lonely efforts to benefit the Anglo-Indians might be owned of God.

Lepers and the Famine.

MAY I present to your readers the plea of the famine-stricken lepers? In many of our stations the scarcity is already severe, and before help can reach India it will be much more acute. The lepers are naturally among the first to feel the effects of famine, and the most helpless to contend against it. The following extracts from letters just to hand are brief, but pregnant with terrible meaning:—

From Lohardugga: "This famine will be more terrible than the one we had three years ago. Scarcely any rain for three months, and now all hopes are gone. The fields present a pitiable sight. . . . Unless Christian people come to the rescue, there will be many deaths from starvation." From Nasik: "Grain is dearer now than in the height of the famine of 1897. . . . In the midst of this sorrow we have to think about funds, and how daily bread and water can be found for our poor lepers. Lean figures are already beginning to steal into the village, begging for food." From Chandkuri: "We have now 125 lepers and fifty untainted children; but what shall we do? The distress around here is horrible. I will try to keep the untainted children for four shillings per month, but I can't say if it will be possible later on."

The urgent needs of these afflicted people will speak for themselves, and need no words of mine to emphasize them. I may add, however, that God is greatly blessing the work in the highest sense, that is, the Spiritual. During October we have the tidings of some seventy baptisms of lepers. As a class, it may be said of the lepers that their readiness to accept the Gospel is proportionate to their need of it. They are embracing the hope which Christ alone can give them, with a readiness which is, in itself, a stimulus to increased effort to win them as trophies for Him who gave it as one evidence of his Messiahship that "the lepers were cleansed"

Syrian Colonization Fund.

THE Society for Relief of Persecuted Jews exists, in the words of the late Lord Shaftesbury, "to give relief and employment to Jews, especially in the Holy Land, till increase of funds shall give us the means to enable them to form themselves into colonies on their own responsibility."

The sad fact is that the persecutors in European lands are professing Christians. The persecution is continuous and relentless. Hence the point of a remark in the latest report:—

"The only amends that can be made for the wrong-doing of their oppressors, by Christians elsewhere, is to succour the comparatively small number who succeed in escaping from the house of bondage; that is, to help those who seek new homes in America and in the colonies, and to provide work and food for those destitute thousands who have found at least shelter in the Holy Land."

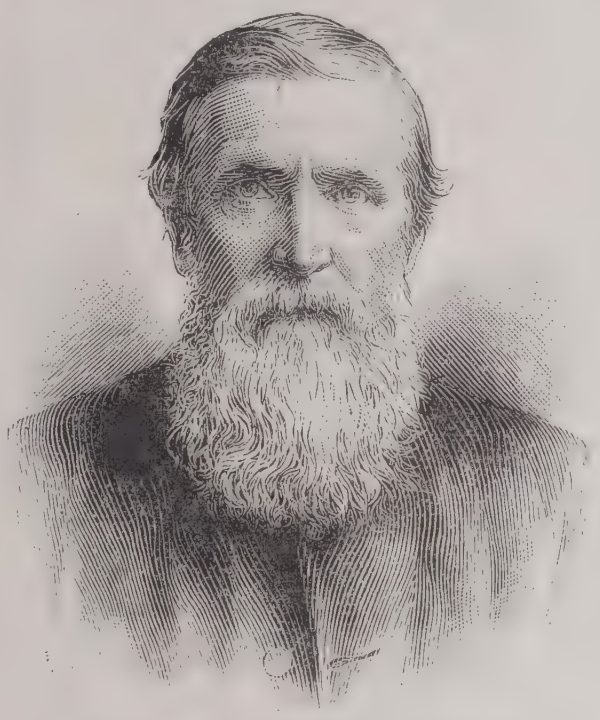
The account of the work being done in "Abraham's Vineyard," near to Jerusalem, where a new water cistern is in process of construction, is most interesting. "The great Tunbridge Wells cistern supplies many hundreds of 'cupfuls of cold water;' and the other cisterns, too, furnish water for the Jews, which it is delightful to see them carry away during the dry months of summer."

The work is one that appeals to all who would bless Israel in his day of sorrow and estrangement from God.

The report is full of details, both sad and encouraging. Copies and further information may be had from the office of the Society, 41, Parliament Street, London, S.W. (Mrs. E. A. Finn, secretary).

Rev. F. W. Bourne,

PRESIDENT OF THE METROPOLITAN FREE CHURCH COUNCIL.



IN the election of Rev. F. W. Bourne to its Presidency, the Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of London has conferred an honour which has been well deserved by its recipient's services, not only to the Christian Church in general, but to the cause of Christian union in particular. Sixteen years ago he risked much of his popularity within his own denomination by his strenuous support of Canadian Methodist union, and he has heartily advocated the proposals that have been made for the organic union of the Bible Christians, formerly with the Methodist New Connexion, and recently with the Primitive Methodists. He has been for several years a valued member of the Committee of the National Free Church Council, which he has assisted in various ways, including the preparation of its literature.

That Mr. Bourne, though well known and highly esteemed by the leading workers in Nonconformity, has not figured prominently in the public eye is due, partly to his persistent shrinking from notoriety, and partly to the devotion which he has shown to work within the circle of his own denomination. His loyalty to one of the smallest of the churches has not been due to the lack of opportunities of a larger sphere.

Mr. Bourne entered the ministry in 1850, when just twenty years of age. It was in the little Bible Christian chapel in his native village of Woodchurch, Kent, that he had been led to Christ, during some revival services five years previously. It was soon discovered that he possessed qualities of character and intellect which fitted him, even while still young, for positions of influence and responsibility. In 1859 he was appointed Secretary of the Bible Christian Missionary Society, in 1865 assistant editor of the Connexional literature, in 1866 missionary treasurer, in 1867 President of the Conference (an honour repeated in 1875 and 1891), and in 1869 sole editor and book steward. Thus, before he reached his fortieth year, he had received the highest proofs of the confidence of his brethren, and had won a foremost place in the councils of his denomination. Such a rapid rise is the more remarkable when it is remembered that the educational opportunities of his boyhood were limited to the narrow curriculum of a private school in a small village. By perseverance and hard study, however, he had acquired, before he reached middle age, a thorough and well-grounded knowledge of theology and a wide acquaintance with the best general literature.

He might be quoted as an effective illustration of Bacon's dictum, that "reading maketh a full man." There are no shallows in his preaching. Yet it is not the fulness of the well-informed student merely. One cannot listen to his sermons without the conviction that their richness and depth come not from books only, or chiefly, but from meditation under the highest of influences. When he is at his best—which is at a Conference, or some similar gathering where he is assured of the spiritual sympathy of his hearers—there is about his words that "unction" which has now become more a tradition of the past than an experience of the present. It is impossible otherwise to explain such an incident as that which occurred during the Holsworthy Conference of 1889, when a congregation of over 1,000 persons was completely broken down, as the preacher, without any elocutionist's tricks, without even a gesture, repeated two or three verses from the most familiar hymns. Of his published volume of sermons, Dr. David Thomas said that few men in any church could produce its equal; but while the strength of Mr. Bourne's discourses makes them valuable to read, there is in their delivery a persuasive tenderness which does not survive the translation into cold type.

Thirty volumes of the Bible Christian Magazine are the visible sign of his labours as Connexional editor. In this very difficult post, which is fettered by limitations unknown to editors of undenominational publications, his unique knowledge of the history and characteristics of his church has kept him in touch with his readers, while his literary ability has enabled him to turn out a periodical that need fear no comparison with others of the same class. He has himself contributed to the denominational history a "Centenary Life of James Thorne," in which the story of the establishment and growth of the Bible Christian Connexion is graphically told. He has also made "Billy" Bailey, another of the early preachers, the subject of a biography. But the book by which Mr. Bourne is most widely known is "The King's Son, or a Memoir of Billy Bray," which has had a steady sale of a thousand a month since its publication in 1871. It has been translated into several languages, and has been widely circulated in Australia and America. Indeed, some of "Billy's" best sayings—as, for instance, that "the promises of God are as good as ready-money"—have passed into current proverbs of the religious world. It was stated publicly, in 1888, that letters had been received from at least 600 persons in all parts of the world, ascribing their conversion to the reading of this book; and the list has been largely increased since that date. In one instance the lending of a single copy in a London suburb led to the closing of a public-house and the addition of three members to a local church. A great religious awakening, several years ago, in the Highlands of Scotland was due especially, on the human side, to the distribution of several thousand copies by the late Mr. John Melrose, of Edinburgh.

From a photograph by Mr. Reed, 16, Tottenham Court Road, London, W.

One of the most surprising features in Mr. Bourne's career is the fact that he combines with these gifts, as preacher and writer, exceptional qualities as an administrator and business man. It might have been supposed that the occupation of several hours daily in correspondence and official duties would have been fatal to those habits of contemplation which are essential to permanent usefulness as a preacher or writer; or that, on the other hand, the tastes of a student and thinker would have made it a burden to attend to the details of committee work. But there is no conflict of faculties in the case of Mr. Bourne. It has sometimes been remarked, by those who have observed his mastery of difficult financial problems, that he might have made a fortune as an accountant; but his skill in figures has not been purchased at any cost to higher powers.

Mr. Bourne would probably agree with the recent opinion of Mr. G. F. Watts, the painter, that it is hard work that keeps a man alive and youthful. Not long ago, in speaking to some young ministers about the use of the morning hours, he remarked casually that for the last thirty years he would have been unable to do any reading on his own account if he had not done it before breakfast. In much physical weakness, "in weariness often," he has known no slackening of toil, but has "scorned delights, and lived laborious days."

When, at the next Conference, he attains his ministerial jubilee, he will be able to look back upon a half-century of service by which he has won a place of unique honour and affection in the Church to which, in the name of Christ, he has given a devotion without thought of gain or reward.

From Mission Tent to Hall.

A FEW years ago, a tent was erected for the summer months in a field on the outskirts of one of the most populous districts of Bristol. At the close, as had been hoped, many made their way to different places of worship; but, in addition to these, there were counted some sixty converts, who were as "sheep without a shepherd," and who seemed to know no "means of grace," or Christian friends, other than the tent and its workers. They could not be forced to join some neighbouring effort in a body.

After much thought and prayer, the workers felt they dare not shrink from the responsibility of providing for the spiritual needs of those who were looking to them for help and guidance. As a result, the "People's Mission" was organized. Having, from various circumstances, been obliged to move from one place to another, this vigorous little effort is now being carried on in a rented hall quite unsuitable for the purpose. Recently a meeting of the workers and friends was held, at which a number of the former promised to give labour in erecting a hall, in the event of site and material being procured.

A suitable piece of ground has been selected, in the centre of a large population, close to Mina Road, Mina Park, Baptist Mills, and plans have been got out for the erection of a hall capable of seating 326 persons. The estimated cost is from £200 to £250 (reckoning, of course, on the promised free labour). From the days of the mission-tent to the present time, the soul-converting power of God has been continually present and very evident.

Letter to English Friends.

I AM feeling weary with the many meetings in Chicago, and in Racine and Milwaukee —which were just like the work in Chicago —followed by marvellous blessing. I do not know if I mentioned about a Christian woman who was deluded by a Turkish teacher to deny Christ. She found pardon for her sin in one of the meetings, and returned to Jesus. Another young girl who had been deluded by a Buddhist teacher from India also turned back to Jesus, and found pardon and peace. Several Roman Catholics found salvation in Jesus alone.

There is also special blessing among the working classes. They seem to be drawn to listen, since it has become spread through the country that I helped 50,000 of their unemployed friends in Chicago. One of them was heard to say: "Some missions give us the bread without the Gospel, that's too dry; and others give us the Gospel without the bread for the body. We don't believe them, and think they are hypocrites. She is all right, she gives us both, and we believe what she says." Many incidents have we had of souls blessed or saved, and the blessing seems to grow in proportion to my bodily weakness. Though I may look fresh and strong, many a time my heart stops beating out of sheer weakness, and I know that I am within a step from death. Yet I know, and by the Spirit of God am assured, that that step is not as yet to be made; and that, however impossible it seems, even that weak bodily heart and go on. We have also been marvellously kept on concerning our needed funds to supply for our Mission. I really do not know how it has been possible for us to go on till now, as we had extremely little help.

WILL HAVE TO RALLY

In Chicago a committee of prominent gentlemen is at work to raise the money for a very necessary Sailors' Home, which I promised to start in case they raised the money. Moreover, as the result of my work on the "Duen" last winter, the young people from various churches have united with the intention to start tea-shops and coffee-rooms; and I think that the coming winter will find in Chicago several more or less free shelters for the homeless. It is the intention that all the institutions should be managed for saving souls as well as bodies.

I intended taking a summer vacation, which I greatly need; but I was unable to do it, partly because I have to work to make the funds cover the expenses of the Mission, and partly because there seems to be no hiding-place for me. In the Muskegon Lake, we entered by night, and anchored in a hidden place, sixteen miles from the city; but the next day a steamer, with the Danish flag, and laden with people, made an extra excursion with the result that, after two days, the churches in the town were too small, and a theatre, that holds several thousand people, closed its play earlier than usual so that I might speak in the building.

Among the thousands of people who attended the meeting were many that apparently had never listened to the Gospel. We went along the coast, entering all the lakes. In White Lake, the pastor writes as follows:

"I want to tell you that you have been a great blessing to us all. Many of us have seen the barrenness of our lives, and hope for a better devotion to our Lord than we have yet given. We have proved the truth of your words again and again—that any sacrifice we can make is more than repaid by our Lord, and yet how we hesitate to sacrifice anything!"

There, too, the churches were too small, and we took the bicycle rink, which was overcrowded. The two worst characters of the town were so turned round that a man who had not been in any of my meetings, and was never known to give to any mission, sent 10dol. with the remark "that a mission that could change such fellows in the course of a few days was worthy of being helped."

I cannot go on giving the details. In Pine Lake, at the elegant bathing resort, as well as among the farmers that gathered in their country church, there were the same blessed experiences. Seeking rest, we passed Mackinac Island, and anchored in the lonely Cheneaux Islands among fishermen and Indians; but even there I was fetched by three clergymen to an elegant club-house, where I spoke.

To-day we found out an uninhabited island (Goose Island) far away, and, taking refuge there, I write this letter to English friends, asking them not to forget me, but to uphold my hands until the battle is won.

Gospel Literature for the Troops.

AMONG other agencies that have been sending Gospel portions to South Africa is the Scripture Gift Mission and Crystal Palace Bible Stand (Office: 15, Strand, W.C.). In a recent circular we read that some 15,000 Gospels have been distributed amongst the troops sailing for South Africa. The various Scripture readers attached to regiments have also been supplied with free grants for immediate use. Distribution to every regiment leaving our ports will be continued. Christian workers in South Africa cannot conveniently carry or circulate entire Bibles, but they gladly receive and distribute the illustrated issues of the Scripture Gift Mission. It is hoped to send 50,000 more Gospels; but these will cost £200, and as the Mission is now preparing for next year's Paris Exposition, it is felt that the ordinary funds cannot bear the strain. Therefore opportunity is given to liberal-minded Christians to come to the help of work among our soldiers by making special contributions for this undertaking.

There has also been a large distribution of Gospel publications among troops at the ports of embarkation, through the generous provision of a Christian lady. Copies of the Herald of Mercy and other books, including many from the Stirling Tract Depôt, were placed in the hands of the men through the agency of the Soldiers' Christian Association (Mr. A. H. Wheeler), Miss Robinson (Portsmouth), Miss Perks (Winchester), Miss Ridout (Gosport), and the Liverpool Seamen's Friend Society. Thus the troops are supplied with a variety of good reading for the journey. Mr. Wheeler has also undertaken distributions among the men on the field. In all, seventy-two large parcels of Christian literature have been circulated through the channels specified; and the men on the Rock of Gibraltar have not been forgotten in the distribution.

With reference to the work of the Army and Navy Missionary Union, we are asked to state that missionary literature only is distributed by the Union, Bibles, etc., being sent out by other Christian organizations.

British and Foreign Sailors' Society.—In making a donation of £200 to this Society a few days ago, the donor wrote: "The present gift will save trouble to my executors, and, at the same time, give me the pleasure of doing a small amount of good during my lifetime." The example is worthy of imitation by those who have provided in their wills for charitable donations, and its adoption would result in a great and immediate development of evangelistic and benevolent effort in many directions.

WOES OF INTEMPERANCE.—Prov. xxiii. 29-35.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Prov. xx. 1.

INTRODUCTORY.

TO-DAY is called Temperance Sunday in Great Britain, and hundreds of sermons are being preached on temperance, and thousands of Sunday scholars are learning about it. Nearly all our Sunday scholars belong to some "Band of Hope;" but so many leave it when they get about fourteen or fifteen, and forget all about their promise to abstain. It is just then that they most need to keep their pledge, and say, "No, I cannot," to those who tempt them to taste that which may prove their ruin. Sunday school teachers should specially urge on the elder scholars the safety of sticking to the temperance pledge. A lady was giving a temperance address in a large factory, at the dinner hour; two or three hundred girls and women were present. She asked all who were tectotal to hold up their hands. Not more than half a dozen responded. She then asked how many had been Band of Hope girls, and nearly all hands went up.

THE DRUNKARD.

We all know him too well. But how sad to know that some hundreds of children under ten are found drunken on London streets in a year! The only way you can be certain that you will never become a drunkard is by never tasting the poisonous drink. We know homes that would be so happy if only father did not go to the public-house, or mother did not have her beer. God did not give us strong drink; there is no alcohol found in nature. It can only be produced by fermentation, which is the first stage of putrefaction. It surely must have been the devil who invented it; it is his most powerful agent in the destruction of men's bodies and souls. You cannot talk to a drunkard about Jesus and his love, for the brain is all in a muddle, and he cannot think or understand.

PROV. xxiii. 29-35.

Verse 29. The Hebrew is, "Who hath 'Oh?'" "Who hath 'Alas?'" This verse describes the condition of a drunken person. We are supposed to see someone in this state, and inquire, "WHAT IS THE MATTER?" What brings woes to body, woes to mind, woes in the family, pains, disease, poverty, death? What fills our prisons, our workhouses, our asylums and hospitals? What makes men into fools?

Verse 30. THE ANSWER. Wine, strong drink. Even good old Noah drank too much; perhaps he had let the juice of his grapes stand till it fermented and sparkled, and did not know what harm it would do him. So from the very beginning we see the evil.

Verse 31. THE REMEDY. Don't look at it; turn away from the temptation. Never taste it, however nice it is. Every drunkard was once a moderate drinker; every moderate drinker once a child, who had never tasted. Drunkards are shut out of heaven (Gal. v. 21).

Verse 32-36. THE RESULTS. Remorse, stinging conscience, despair, delirium tremens, "seeing strange things." At first it gives a pleasant excitement; at last it is "the wine of God's wrath? (See Psa. lxxv. 8; Rev. xiv. 10-xvi. 19.) The serpent fascinates, looks bright and beautiful; it rarely loses its prey, it poisons the blood, is dangerous and deadly. (It will be helpful to get each in the class to bring his own illustration.)

TWELVE REASONS FOR BEING TOTAL ABSTAINERS.

I. Because strong drink injures my body.

II. It muddles the brain, and I cannot think rightly.

III. It ruins my soul and imperils my eternal welfare.

IV. Strong drink keeps me from the Saviour.

V. If I never take it, I can never become a drunkard.

VI. Alcohol is deluding and deceitful.

VII. It is a stumbling-block in the way of many.

VIII. Jesus warned us against being the cause of others stumbling.

IX. Though being teetotal will not save my soul, it is often a stepping-stone to Jesus, who can and will save me.

X. Drink is the great hindrance to the Gospel.

XI. I wish to set a good example.

XII. I cannot enjoy that which ruins others.

St. Ives, Hants.—At this village, situated near Ringwood, a committee of evangelical Christians has been formed to carry on Gospel work on undenominational lines. Memorial stones of a Gospel hall were recently laid, and, at a subsequent public meeting, interesting reports of work were given. It is hoped that the new building may be opened free of debt. The secretary is Mr. E. Diffey, Ringwood, Hants.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

FOURTH WEEK OF GENERAL MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE work in Dennistoun district has, from the outset, been one of the most successful branches of the Campaign. On Sabbath evening of last week (November 5), Rev. Dr. John Robbins (of Watford) followed in Mr. McNeill's footsteps by opening a mission of one week's duration in Blackfriars Parish Church. There was a large congregation, and it was noticeable that in the opening prayer the minister of Blackfriars (Rev. Thomas Somerville) poured forth a thanksgiving for much blessing received during the previous week. Dr. Robbins chose as his text, "The great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?" (Rev. vi. 17).

God is "slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy;" but nevertheless there is great righteousness in the wrath of God against the sinner. The anger of God against sin springs from the constitution of that law of his, which is "holy, just, and good;" it is not like the anger of man. Sin may be divided into two parts—the sin of the body, and the sin of the mind. You cannot stand in the day of conscience, much less can you stand in the light of the day of Jesus Christ. Then this Book condemns you—"He that believeth not is condemned already." Every sin culminates in the sin of unbelief. Who shall stand? The penitent, the man or woman who brings to Christ the broken and the contrite heart, he who is justified: they shall stand.

REV. T. D. WATT IN GORBALS.

The work begun in Gorbals district by Mr. Henry Varley, and continued by Mr. Hugh Paton, has now been taken up by Rev. T. D. Watt (of Powis, Aberdeen). On Monday evening, when Mr. Watt appeared for the first time, we found the meeting—held in the Parish Church—larger in size and much more hearty in tone than had been the case a week previously. The spiritual life of God's people is being deepened and quickened. At the outset Mr. Watt explained that, in his own experience, the most fruitful evangelistic work resulted where Christians brought out their neighbours by personal invitation, not being deterred by any number of rebuffs or refusals, but working round their circle of acquaintances till they found those whom they could induce. Due stress was also laid on attendance at the open-air gatherings, and at the prayer-meetings before the services; above all, on continual personal intercession, that souls might be saved.

Joseph's ministry of salvation in the seven years of dearth (Genesis xli.) was presented as a type of the ministry of our Lord Jesus Christ. A break was made at the end of the hour for the convenience of any obliged to leave, and thereafter the "Hath," in the refrain of Hymn 299, became the basis of a yet simpler explanation. "Faith, the simplest thing in the world," was the speaker's motto as he pleaded with those who had been present night after night at the meetings, and in the most brotherly, winning way he passed from seat to seat speaking words of counsel and help.

IN THE SOUTH-WESTERN DISTRICT.

Rev. Thomas Wilson (Pleasance Free Church, Edinburgh), has been evangelizing for the last two weeks in White Memorial Free Church, Paisley Road. On Tuesday a special feature was the attendance of the local company of the Boys' Brigade, who formed a second excellent choir, and, as the audience was assembling, sang a long series of Gospel choruses and snatches of hymns. The early part of the meeting was given up to an address specially intended for the young people present. From 2 Timothy ii. 3, the "good soldier of Jesus Christ" was portrayed as (1) enlisted: his must be a free choice—no pressed men being admissible. (2) Under training: he must wear the dress, and be known by it. (3) In the field enduring hardness: he must learn to use his weapons and obey.

After the boys had sung the call, "Christians rise and shine, give God the glory," the adults were addressed from Rev. iii. 18: "I counsel thee to buy of Me." I. The need of the things Christ offers. (1) Gold tried in the fire—Himself. (2) White Raiment. (3) Eye-salve. II. The Price within the reach of all. "There is no man too poor to buy these three things. When you find out you have nothing to offer, He waits to give. But you will have to part with every sin. The difficulty is to get men to take God's salvation, at God's price, and in God's time."

The minister of the church (Rev. James Paterson) presided, and the opening prayer was full of thanksgiving for the blessing received by numbers on past evenings—some waiting to talk it over, some going away without saying anything at the time. This church is a great centre for the work of the Mizpah Band, itself a blessed and gracious memorial of the Revival of 1874. The situation, too, is one of the most favourable in the city, being at a prominent corner, surrounded by a teeming population of the more comfortable working class. The congregation has a reputation for aggressive work, and for keeping an "open door" for all comers. The occasion of our visit was a stormy evening, yet the open-air testimony was being given in the midst of heavy rain; and, indeed, every branch of the work is zealously and faithfully supported. To all the Lord has set his seal, and granted rich blessing. A valuable helper here is the congregational missionary, Mr. Edward Gillespie.

MEETINGS AT THE WEST END.

The centre of operations for Hillhead and Kelvinside is now Hillhead Baptist Church (Rev. F. H. Robarts), and during the past week the speaker has been Rev. James E. Houston (minister of Cambuslang parish, and missioner for the Church of Scotland). The attendance at the meetings continues large, and it is being borne in on those in charge of the division that a deep spiritual work is going on in the hearts of the people, though it does not manifest itself outwardly by the same signs as in other parts of the city. On Wednesday, Mr. William M. Oatts, Rev. F. H. Robarts, and Rev. Dr. Walter Ross Taylor, took part in the service. The text was Heb. ix. 27. The preacher began by pointing out the fallacy of the belief that speakers in such meetings are "dealing with speculations, fancies, maybes, perchances," when they are dealing with real verities and facts. Four facts he found evident in the text:—The certainty of death and judgment, also of redemption and final salvation.

CLOSE OF MR. INGLIS' MISSION

Mr. Charles Inglis brought to a close last Thursday evening his visit of four weeks to the city. During the whole time he has conducted the evening meeting in the Tent Hall, and, in addition, has been constantly finding opportunities for special service among various classes of workpeople during the day. Before leaving, he expressed gratitude to God for the way in which the Holy Spirit had been working in the dinner-hour meetings of workmen in the shipbuilding yards on the Clyde. Engineers, joiners, carpenters, and labourers crowded in to hear the Gospel, until the attendances reached as high as seven hundred; and as many as seven neighbouring ministers were on the platform at one time. The interest was real and deep. The true position of the sinner was brought home to hearts for the first time. The short time available made personal dealing or inquiry meetings impossible, but the men found their way in the evenings to places where the Gospel was being preached; and, at greater leisure, learned more fully the way of salvation.

Mr. Inglis had a specially busy closing day. In the forenoon he was addressing the factory girls in the eastern suburb of Shettleston, and, in the afternoon, spoke to a gathering of policemen westward in Cranstonhill. In the evening we joined the company who go out to the open air from the Tent Hall. Mr. David Pratt was there with a strong body of men in middle life, each with a testimony to give, out of his own personal experience, of the saving and keeping power of the Lord. Jail Square is the rendezvous of a motley crowd. A few respectable working men were standing about, but the majority belonged to the classes who find refuge in common lodging-houses. Not many accept the invitation to the hall, but they listen as the Gospel is sung and spoken by those whom they know to be leading changed lives.

Prominent among those who were lending valuable help were Mr. D. M. Pratt and Mr. John Steel. Before closing, thanksgivings were offered for the consciousness of the presence of God in the midst throughout the mission, and for souls brought out of darkness into light. Then there was prayer that young believers might be earnest and faithful spreaders of the glorious news.

THE SOUTHERN SUBURBS.

Mr. Arthur Klein, B.A., has finished his second fortnightly mission in connection with the Campaign. On this occasion the meetings were held in Hutchesontown Free Church (Rev. Andrew Ryrie), situated in Dixon Avenue, Crosshill. The meetings were not large, a fact which was partly accounted for by the stormy weather and certain local circumstances; but, at the closing gathering on Friday evening, testimony was borne that there had been blessing from the beginning. Real conversions have taken place, and Christians have been led to come out more boldly on the Lord's side. The address was on the subject of "The Lost Sheep and the Seeking Shepherd" (Luke xv.).

The other preachers in the evenings during the week were Mr. D. M. Bayne (Whiteinch Parish Church), Mr. Richard Hill (Brownfield Parish Church), Rev. Robert Hamilton (Greyfriars Church), Mr. Charles Galletly (Garngad U.P. Church), Rev. John McNeill (Shettleston), Mr. Hugh Paton (Gillespie U.P. Church), and Mr. James Marshall (Govan).

AFTERNOON MEETINGS.

Mr. McNeill's services at one o'clock in St. George's Church, Buchanan Street, are attracting large numbers of men during the interval of business for luncheon. The attendances have gone up as high as 900. Preaching on one of the days from the Stilling of the Tempest (Mark iv.), he reached many hearts by his application. "It is not work, but worry, that kills. We read in a newspaper that a much-esteemed active man of business has, while going to his office, reeled and fallen dead upon the pavement. The verdict of the coroner's jury, or the report of the doctor, would be that death is due to failure of the heart's action. The verdict up yonder would be that care wrecked the vessels of his brain, and burst his heart, because he had been carrying a burden which God Almighty never asked him to carry unaided." Last Friday, Mr. McNeill began an eloquent and practical exposition of the twenty-third Psalm, which he promised to carry on to completion during the current week.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS.

Large numbers of boys and girls have been attending the meetings in Finnieston Free Church, addressed by Mr. Thomas M. Pratt. There were quite eight hundred present when we visited the church. By means of the lantern the attention of the children has been drawn to the doctrines and facts of sin, salvation, and Christian service. Beginning with "The Leper," the natural state of the human heart was faithfully presented. Later, an excellent presentation was made, from the history of Meribbaal, of the duty of consecration, and the privilege and blessedness of those who are in a state of grace.

Here, as at other centres, the very success of the juvenile meetings threatens to hinder in some measure the accomplishment of the real end in view. The number of adult missions proceeding at the same time causes the supply of qualified Christian workers to be scattered over a wide area; and, in the young people's after-meetings, the number of friends available usually falls far short of the actual requirements of the case. Even more than among the seniors, it has been shown that great care and attention should be given to every child who remains behind, as well as to the following-up after the meetings are over, and dealing with companies of a dozen or more at a time is far from satisfactory. "A great door and effectual," has indeed been opened. The harvest truly is great; and the labourers are few.

We say nothing about the relative importance of senior and junior meetings, because that is not within any man's province, and not every worker has for dealing with boys and girls. But, perhaps, the success of each branch will solve the difficulties of the other. Many a grown-up convert will find outlet for his highest powers in telling over to the children what the Lord has done for him, while the little ones will brighten, by their service of song, many an otherwise depressing experience.

We are beginning to hear again what has been one of the most pleasant features of the work of grace among the children of the city in former times. Going to and from school, little companies can be heard joyously trilling forth their favourite hymns, all unconsciously bearing a blessed witness for their Lord.

We found Mr. Arthur A. Govan well supported by ministers and other workers in Queen's Park Baptist Church. The neighbouring Free Church minister (Rev. Mr. McMillan) presided, and the pastor (Rev. Thomas Ll. Edwards) and Rev. John Sloan (Shawlands Parish) took part in the meeting. The meetings were well attended, and marked by a quiet, reverential spirit, which augured well for lasting results.

The following were also busy among the children throughout the week:—Mr. J. W. van de Venter, Mr. J. S. Hewlett, Rev. William Baird, Mr. John Corbett, Pastor D. G. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Raphael, Mr. William Thomson, jun., Mr. Alexander Mackeith, and Mr. John Stewart.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Developments of the Campaign were to be expected, and, perhaps, the first of these is a proposal for special prayer meetings among young men at certain centres.

Congregations and individuals who were more or less strange to the work of dealing with anxious souls are gaining experience, and many to whom the general methods were new are gradually falling into line.

Evidence has come under our notice from different quarters that "the thermometer is distinctly rising," more especially in connection with the adult meetings. There is more prayer on every hand, and the sense of responsibility on the part of Christians is, we are told, becoming greater as the weeks pass.

Interesting Cases.

A lawyer, in a good position, found his way into an inquiry room, in the company of his wife. Realizing that drink had brought him to the brink of a precipice, he sought guidance at a centre far from his home, and was smitten down to the dust in contrition before God. But he is still groping in the darkness. Let us pray for him.

A backslider, anxious to be restored, sought a conversation with one worker. They talked together of heavenly things. Then the worker prayed, and the man himself poured out his soul to God. The concluding sentence was, "O Lord, Thou hast done it, for Thou hast said it in thy holy Word, and I believe it." Ere he left, he was rejoicing as he had done in days long gone by.

The arrow of conviction found the heart of a gentleman who had been tampering with drink, though outwardly respectable and correct. Convinced in heart that he was not leading a right life, he went home to pray. On his knees, in the quiet of his own room, he realized how steadily his sin had been gaining the mastery. On his next appearance, he told humbly and gratefully of setting out in the narrow way.

The Open-Air Mission.

THE autumnal reunion of members and friends of the Open-Air Mission took place on Tuesday of last week in Exeter Lower Hall. The chair was occupied by Dr. W. G. Kemp, and there was a large attendance of well-wishers and supporters of the mission. Several addresses were delivered descriptive of the work of the past season, and in praise of God who had so richly owned the labours of his servants.

Rev. J. Cobham (Yarmouth) spoke of the various ways in which the blessing of God had attended the prayers of his people at that town. In its earlier stages the work was carried on under great difficulties. The hindrances, however, had been removed, and a very blessed season had been the outcome.

Mr. J. W. C. Fegan followed with an encouraging account of the open-air services in which a number of boys from his Home had taken part. Ramsgate sands was the scene of operations, and, surrounded by the multifarious amusements peculiar to seaside resorts, efforts were made to evangelize the crowds on the beach. "We cannot tell how much good was done by our services," said Mr. Fegan. "We were holding meetings for three hours without interruption." The hop-gardens of Kent had been visited, and Mr. Fegan had heart-moving stories to tell of the misery and deprivations experienced by the hop-pickers. A striking incident was that of an old man, who attended the meetings night after night, always taking a back seat, manifesting an utter indifference to the Gospel message, and only attending to hear the boys sing. At the last meeting of the mission the old gentleman asked to be shown to a front seat, as he was anxious again

TO HEAR THE SINGING.

But during the address the power of the Spirit overcame the stubborn will, and in the end he went forth rejoicing and praising God.

Mr. B. Barry Wake related his adventures at race meetings—at Torquay, Epsom, Ascot, Doncaster, and Northampton. At these centres the Word had been preached in the midst of evil surroundings, and many had been the signs that the message had not been delivered in vain.

Mr. Frank Cockrem, the secretary, having described a visit to Germany, Pastor A. G. Brown, citing the last verse of Mark xvi., gave an inspiring address to preachers and Bible students. He drew some useful suggestions from the passage, and emphasized the significance of its teaching. If there be no empty sepulchre, there can be no command to go and preach the Gospel. The empty tomb should be the preacher's warrant, the ascended Lord his inspiration, and the Gospel of Jesus Christ his theme.

Madame Annie Ryall sang solos, and the meeting took up the choruses. The addresses were received with much enthusiasm, and the proceedings were singularly helpful in their influence upon heart and mind.

On Lord Mayor's Day a company of the evangelists of the Mission, headed by Major Mackinlay, distributed 10,000 copies of a souvenir card entitled "The Greatest Procession in the World," and dealing with the Lord's Second Coming. Twenty thousand are being circulated this week at Bristol on the occasion of her Majesty's visit. Prayer is asked that they may be abundantly blessed.

Jewish Missions.—A two-days' conference on this subject is to be held in Exeter Lower Hall on November 23 and 24. There will be two meetings each day, at 11 and 2.30. The topics for discussion include—"The Promises to Israel in the Old Testament," "The Grounds of Jewish Opposition to Christ," and other subjects relating to methods, and results, and prospects of Christian missions to Israel.

Public-School Missionary Cruise.—In view of the encouraging success of the tour to mission stations along the North Coast of Africa, made by a party of public-schoolboys and others last Christmas, arrangements are in progress for a similar cruise to leave this year on December 28, with the object of stimulating a deeper interest in mission work. Particulars may be obtained from Rev. Norman Bennet, 29, Maitland Park Villas, Hampstead, N.W.

At Midland Fairs.

ON arriving at Nottingham, we attempted to unfurl our Open-Air Mission banner beneath the Samuel Morley statue, but were delayed by police interference. A chief official, however, subsequently appointed us a capital position. There, under our own "flare-up," lamp, we were able to attract large crowds. On the Sunday we gained the public market-place, and from morning till late at night were enabled to bring the Gospel before numbers of loungers and listeners who gather in that famous centre.

At Leicester we found a capital pitch between the travelling dens of six lions. The showmaster approved, because, he said, we should keep back peeping boys! He sprinkled sawdust for us to stand on. Although our flagstaff shook as tremendous thuds were again and again delivered on the sides of the caravan by a lion, souls professed conversion even there. Rev. Joseph Posnett kindly lent the Clarence Hall, and presided at our lantern lecture.

On the closing Sunday we had all day long, with slight intervals, an eager, anxious concourse of people filling every place of vantage, as we spoke from the commodious stage of a large show. At night we had to press through the people to gain the stage. Solemnity rested upon the large gathering, but we were compelled to dismiss sooner than desirable in order to reach another large meeting at the Park gates which had been arranged by friends connected with Melbourne Hall, once the scene of the Rev. F. B. Meyer's labours. B. Barry Wake.

The African Institute.

THE African Institute, established at Colwyn Bay, aims to give an evangelical and industrial training in this country to the most promising of the African converts, and to establish branch institutions on similar lines in Africa, thus sending forth to their own land self-supporting missionaries. The natives of several of the English Colonies on the West Coast (including Sir S. Lewis, K.C.M.G., the first African knighted by our Queen) show great interest in the work, and have formed auxiliary committees at various places, thus bringing the Institute in touch with 3,000 miles of the West Coast.

The Institute students already represent many of the districts along the line from the Gambia down to St. Paul de Loanda. They are taken from all parts of Africa, where 600 different languages are spoken. Knowing a little English when they come, their training is continued during their stay in the Institute till every one, before he returns, is able to read with ease and pleasure, so that he can get at the wealth of knowledge to be had through English literature. Evangelical books are placed in their hands to refresh the souls of the preachers themselves, and to constitute them fountains of living waters to their own people. Having had this training, the students are able to translate the Book of books into their respective languages. Just now the Institute suffers greatly through lack of funds, and an appeal has been issued for £2,000 to help the friends in carrying on the work. The Principal is Rev. Wm. Hughes.

East-London Tabernacle.

IN connection with his resignation of the pastorate, which takes place early in December, Rev. Sydney J. Jones appeals on behalf of the varied evangelistic and relief agencies which are maintained among the poor of East London. Mr. Jones remarks:—"I am very desirous that these works should be put in a position to go on for many months after I leave, if possible until another pastor is chosen. Mission work is needed—oh! so greatly needed—in the squalor-stricken parts of this district. I only send this to say how thankful I should be to receive gifts for this purpose within the next few days. I can then put the work under a pro tem. management, and feel that my removal is not dislocating what service is now being rendered." Mr. Jones may be addressed, Kent House, Bow Road, E.

The Reformation and Ritualism.—A series of letters, signed "Theodore Tyndale," have been issued in pamphlet form, reprinted from Hertford and Essex newspapers. The author deals forcibly and lucidly with the main points at issue in the Ritualistic controversy, and the pamphlet forms a handy compendium of information on vital questions. (3d. Wm. Pallett, The Churchyard, Waltham Abbey).

Slums of Somers Town.

A DENSE wedge of slumdom, with here and there a huge block of barrack-like dwellings, with streets notable for squalor, with dingy little courts and alleys running behind the larger thoroughfares like forlorn children following at the skirts of misery-ridden parents—that is Somers Town. A couple of plain, unpretentious houses, into which an apparently interminable procession of children is passing—that is one of the spiritual lighthouses of this dark region, being the premises of the Christian Men's Union Gospel Mission.

It is a stormy day, and the rain descends in torrents; but the children continue to arrive from all quarters, and subsequently pass out carrying large jugs or basins of soup. In instances where, we deduce, domestic utensils are scarce, they bring a few meat or milk tins; but in every case the little one wears a look of satisfaction. Passing within, in company with the treasurer of the Mission, we enter the large room in which the soup is served. Some hundreds of meals have been taken away by the children, to serve, in many cases, as a supply for a family; but there are hundreds of others seated at the tables waiting to take their dinner on the spot. The devoted band of voluntary workers, who have gathered to help, are drawn from many sources, for the mission is undenominational, and seeking only to regardless of questions of creed or occupation.

The curate of Christ Church strikes the tune for grace, and the shrill voices pipe bravely in spite of damp clothes or physical feebleness. This is the first meal of the winter season. Twice a week, until "somer is a-comen in," these children of poverty will be regaled. They are carefully chosen by the chief Christian workers and school managers of the district, and by the "sister," who systematically visits the neighbourhood. But for the basin of soup, many of them, doubtless, would go dinnerless. One needs but to glance at those serried ranks of white, wan faces to grasp the deep pathos of the situation; and it is cheering to learn that the breakfasts provided on Sunday mornings are equally helpful.

The work of the Mission, however, is by no means confined to a judicious distribution of aid. The organization is distinctively Christian, maintaining a variety of undertakings. A front parlour is utilized as an who, in such a neighbourhood, need especial care to shield them from evil associations. They are taught sewing, and brightly interested in noble ideals of life. At the mothers' meeting the large room is filled, and the Gospel services, which are led by volunteer workers from various denominations, are crowded. A satisfactory feature is the importance attached to Scriptural instruction.

As may be readily imagined, a pathetic interest attaches to the labours of the "sister" in the homes of the people. Here are a few sample cases illustrative of what Gray has called the "short and simple annals of the poor;" but which, if inspected closely, often prove to be prolonged and complex histories:—

Mrs. ——. Husband recently died of consumption. He had been visited two or three times weekly during the past few months, and died trusting in Jesus. Widow and four children were left in deep poverty. Mrs. —— supports her children by means of mangling, at which she works very hard. Very grateful for the help we have been able to give.

Mrs. ——, widow. Generally has but 4s. 6d. a week on which she can rely. Of this, 1s. 6d. was an allowance from her son, who, having fallen out of employment, is now unable to help. Tries to get needlework to do, but has had none for three weeks. Nothing to eat in the place. Very thankful for a little relief. Home poor, but beautifully clean.

The work gains in economy from its gratuitous management by Mr. P. A. Ball and other business men, who devote time and energy to the cause. Communications may be addressed to the secretary, Mr. H. Page, 34, Tollington Park, N.

Scottish Notes.

UNDER the auspices of the Life and Work Committee of the Church of Scotland, a three days' conference of ministers was held a few days ago at Craiglockhart, Edinburgh. The subject under consideration was "The Spiritual Aims of the Preacher." Among those who took part were Revs. George Wilson (Edinburgh), Henry Rankine (Titwood), and Dr. Elder Cumming (Glasgow).

Last week Dr. John Pagan, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, gave a lecture on "Woman's Relation to Christianity," in the Deaconess House, Pleasance, Edinburgh. He dealt with (1) the place of woman in the Gospels and New Testament history; (2) the blessings woman owes to Christianity; and (3) the service which, in return, woman should render to Christianity.

Rev. A. Goldie (Glenisla) brought under the consideration of the Free Presbytery of Meigle, last week, the state of affairs in his neighbourhood with regard to Sabbath desecration. He said the conduct of excursionists to the glen was an open scandal, and outraged the feelings of the people. He also mentioned that shooting tenants made a practice of arriving and leaving on Sabbath, and that they sometimes set the example of fishing on that day.

The negotiations for the proposed union between the Free and United Presbyterian Churches are making steady and satisfactory progress. One after another the presbyteries of both churches are accepting the final draft of the scheme of union, as it has been submitted to them; and the same remarkable harmony which has distinguished the deliberations of the joint committee is manifesting itself in all the courts.

At the Glasgow Noon Meeting on Monday week, Mrs. Baker, the American lady who is working in conjunction with Pundita Ramabai, gave a thrilling account of the condition of the widows in India, and of the means which are being adopted, under the guidance and blessing of God, for the alleviation of their miseries and their salvation through the Gospel. Mrs. Baker also spoke of the awful degradation of women in India through the Hindoo priests and the English army, as well as other causes. A Rescue Home (for which she invited contributions to be remitted through THE CHRISTIAN) is being built by Pandita Ramabai, in faith and prayer.

Mrs. Todd-Osborne presented, on the other hand, the case of the young soldiers, for whom no one cared, and who, by very neglect of a kind word or look of recognition, are driven to the drinking saloon and the house of sin. They come from homes where they have had a mother's or a sister's companionship, and now they feel the want of it. Mrs. Todd-Osborne said that nearly £4,000 are still wanted to fit the admirable premises, lately purchased in Cairo, for the purposes of a Soldiers' Home.

Dr. Alexander Whyte, on Sunday last, delivered from Gal. i. 15-17 a profoundly suggestive meditation and study of the inner life of the Apostle Paul. Some one remarked that the doctor said a great deal that was not in the Bible. Quite true. But they who meditate on these things, and give themselves wholly to them, see within the letter far beyond the letter, and receive through the letter revelations which are spirit and life.

The service lasted an hour, and then Dr. Whyte met his class of young men (including many older men as visitors). The subjects for the present session are the autobiographies of Scottish Christian worthies. The counsels given on this first evening of the winter session as to methods of study were very helpful. Such classes might be multiplied with admirable results.

An appeal had been made to all Free Church ministers in Scotland to preach on Sabbath, Nov. 11, with special reference to the sacerdotalism now so prevalent, and some very outspoken and pungent utterances were given by many ministers in Edinburgh and probably throughout Scotland.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR NOV. 19.

LIBERTY AND LOVE.—Rom. xiv. 1-23.

THE key to this wonderful deliverance of the Apostle's, so full of sound judgment and sanctified common-sense, is the reiterated reference which he makes to the Lord. That word occurs some ten times in fourteen verses. The fact of Jesus being Lord both of the living and of those who have died, and are living on the other side of death, is the solution of the difficulty as to what the Christian should do or leave undone. Let him stand for a few moments before the judgment seat of Christ, or at least before the reflection of that tribunal which is mirrored in the tranquil expanse of his own conscience, and he will have an unerring guide for his conduct. The one question for him to ask is, What would my Lord and Master Jesus Christ wish me to do in these circumstances?

The question agitated in Rome was as to the observance of the seventh or first day of the week as the Christian Sabbath; and, also, what principle should direct the use of food, that of Leviticus or of common use. The Apostle insists these are not questions which affect either our personal salvation or our acceptance with God. He insists on no uniform rule, and issues no authoritative command. In his opinion they are matters for each individual believer to decide for himself. There are actions clear as light, or black as night, about which there can be no controversy; but these questions lie between the two, in the borderland of twilight, and each must apply one or other of these general principles for guidance through the maze.

First, What would Jesus, my Master, wish me to do? I am his chattel and slave purchased by his precious blood. He has a will and an opinion about everything, which He is prepared to let me know by the teaching of his Spirit in my heart. If I do it, I must do it to Him: if I do not do it, it must still be with respect to Him; and in my liberty or abstinence I must give Him thanks.

Second, What is best for others? I have an influence over some; perhaps more look at me than I know. I must be on my guard not to put a stumbling-block in another's way. I must take care not to lead others by my example to follow paths, in which, though I am able to walk, they will almost certainly fall. Though certain articles of diet are innocent to me, yet if they will destroy, directly or indirectly, one for whom Christ died, it will be better for me to abstain from them. I must not overthrow the work of God, or do anything whereby my brother may stumble, but follow things which will edify and build up.

Thirdly, What is best for myself? I ask God not to lead me into temptation, but I must not put myself into it. I must put aside my weights, as well as my sins. I must watch against anything which is likely to gain a power over my appetite, and put away the tiger-cub ere it becomes to masterful for me to combat. It is better for me to trample the eggs of the serpent-brood before they are hatched out.

All these questions apply to total abstinence. Surely our Lord Jesus wishes us to take a decided position against the greatest foe of his Church. Surely our influence in the world is more likely to be strong for good if we abstain from alcohol, and take the safe path. There will, at least, be no fear, under those circumstances, of misleading any. And surely there must be some fear lest we come under the influence of strong drink, if we continue to take it. Myriads like ourselves have gone down under it, why should not we?

It is easy to say that all things are indeed clean; but the present distress, the terrible alcoholism which is abroad, the fear that there may be some bias in that direction, inherited and latent in our blood, the desire to follow Christ on his white horse, as He goes forth to the conquest of evil—are reasons for total abstinence.

C.E. NOTES.

It is possible that Dr. Clark may take a trip to China and Japan in January of next year, returning to America in May.

* * *

The North Staffordshire Christian Endeavour Union has put on foot a scheme for obtaining 5,000 new total abstinence pledges in the year.

There are now more than 17,000 enrolled "Comrades of the Quiet Hour." These agree to spend at least fifteen minutes a day, preferably in the morning, in quiet communion with God.

* * *

A letter from Rev. H. De Van Brockhuisen, Pretoria, South Africa, speaks of a flourishing Endeavour Society of 161 members, having two branches. The work has been greatly blessed. Since the letter was written war has broken out, and our Transvaal Endeavourers need the prayers of all.

How a Missionary Lives.

WRITING to a friend in England, Rev. Fred. J. Paton, of Pangkumu, Malekula, New Hebrides (son of the venerable Dr. J. G. Paton), says:—"We live in wooden houses, lined, and roofed, the roof being of corrugated iron. The houses need to be fairly strong to resist hurricanes. My house has three large 15ft. by 14ft. rooms, and three lean-to rooms.

"At an out-station some miles away, on a hill overlooking the sea, I have a small one-roomed house. Pangkumu Mission station is particularly unhealthy. I have a stone wall round it; and inside, besides my house and the native church, there are several natives' houses. Besides a small garden, there are many orange trees, and every year I get hundreds of pine-apples. Grass is abundant. Ducks and fowls give us change of food, and I have a small flock of goats.

"The climate is such that we have to think of food more carefully than you do, for fever is most destructive to the constitution. Lately I had fever and ague, and ate practically nothing for ten days.

"Native teachers help us. These are placed in villages along the coast, and, in more civilized islands, inland. I have seven out-stations, and will have two more this year. At the main station there is a head teacher and staff, some being in training. The Malekulans help as boat's crew. All teachers work every week-day in the school, each at his own station. On Saturday we have a holiday. On Sabbath there are two services. Besides, we visit throughout the villages, and see everyone. Teachers at outstations give simple medicines, and tell me of all more serious cases. They also come every Wednesday afternoon, when possible, to the main station, and unite in a special prayer meeting. On Sabbath and Wednesday evening we have singing for an hour; on Friday evening a meeting for prayer only; and on Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday evening classes for English.

"Life is not easy. I am away from home one-third of my time, sometimes living in grass huts, and at rare intervals sleeping on the beach.

MALARIAL FEVER

is always with us; and cases of sickness are frequent. To-day a chief left the village. He came with a loathsome disease, and would not take the medicine I gave him; so I had to let him go after a month's attention. He will die very soon. Again, a girl, fourteen years old, was burned under the bend of each knee by her husband. He put red-hot stones under each knee, and tied her legs round the stones. I heard of it next day. She has been here three weeks, and will soon be quite well again.

"This week has been a quiet one. Last Sabbath, I started at dawn and walked eight or nine miles before breakfast, visiting three villages, where I held two services. Then came morning service at Pangkumu, and Sabbath school, followed by afternoon service and night singing. The sick cases came all day, more or less, and I had to visit some. Also children came in to look at pictures.

"For three days I have been digging, burning, and generally clearing away (with the aid of the natives) the EFFECTS OF A HURRICANE.

The sun has been so intense that I dared not dig in the middle of the day. Our native lads have been building new houses. To-day I hold a meeting of the teachers. There is trouble at one out-station, which I will visit to-morrow, and thence I will canoe to Mr. Leggatt's, where I will be busy till next Monday or Tuesday. We have the care of children, left with us by their parents, and of men and women who have voluntarily joined us for the sake of the worship. During the recent hurricane I was badly cut about the body, having been caught by some waves and thrown on to the coral rocks.

"With a brother missionary I crossed Malekula, being the first white men to do so. We saw natives who had never seen a white man. And, as our party was unarmed, I believe our visit did good. So, besides our regular work, there are special trips, and we need thorough rest in cooler climates every few years. Letters are a difficulty with us. The climate is so exhausting that we rarely write unless there is special need."

"Luck."

THE boy who's always wishing
That this or that might be,
But never tries his mettle,
Is the boy that's bound to see
His plans all come to failure,
His hopes end in defeat;
For that's what comes when wishing
And working fail to meet.

The boy who wishes this thing
Or that thing with a will
That spurs him on to action,
And keeps him trying still
When effort meets with failure,
Will some day surely win;
For he works out what he wishes,
And that's where "luck" comes in!

The "luck" that I believe in
Is that which comes with work,
And no one ever finds it
Who's content to wish and shirk.
The men the world calls "lucky"
Will tell you, every one,
That success comes not by wishing,
But by hard work, bravely done.

The Golden Lectureship.

THE winter addresses in connection with the Golden Lectureship, are this year to be delivered by Rev. F. S. Webster, who, in a preliminary announcement, observes—"The close of the century amidst tumult of war and social and religious strife, makes all thoughtful people feel the need of that strength and calm which come from faith in God. England's destiny depends upon the character of the nation. I know no other satisfactory basis of character than true religion. It will be my one aim and desire in these lectures to help forward personal, experimental heart-religion, by various examples and warnings taken from the Old Testament."

The lectures, which are given at St. Margaret's, Lothbury, commence on November 21, and will be continued each Tuesday, until January 2 next (December 26), at 1.15 p.m.

Following Up a Mission.

SOMETIMES I find that complaint is made by Christians about the "effervescent" character of revivals; and a speaker at the recent conference of evangelists stated that he was obliged to deduct 30 per cent. from all reports of missions.

Now I venture to suggest that, speaking generally, this leakage of 30 per cent. (if it really exists) must be laid at the door of the local Christians, who in many cases fail to follow up the immediate results of the mission by prayer and personal effort with regard to those who have been "deeply impressed," and by a systematic helping of the young converts.

For example, about two and a half years ago a blessed revival was vouchsafed to us here. It began in a very humble way by a few Christians meeting together for united prayer and guidance as to the spiritual welfare of the village. This resulted in a visit from Mr. Monro Collings, and throughout the whole of that memorable fortnight's mission the power of God was abundantly manifested, not only in the Gospel meetings, but in the afternoon Bible readings for Christians; so that at the end of the mission we had recorded the names of nearly seventy who professed to be truly converted to God. Immediately after this, a Christian Union was formed on the lines of a United Christian Endeavour (minus the pledge), which speedily reached a membership of 150, and in this way the new converts were nurtured in a spiritual atmosphere and nourished with "the sincere milk of the Word." Not only so, but they were encouraged to engage in some definite work for the Lord, "according to their several ability." As a consequence, the spiritual life of the place has been permanently enriched by this one revival.

About twelve months after, another mission was held by the same evangelist, which helped still further to "stablish, strengthen, and settle" the previous converts, and bring many more into the fold. As a direct and definite outcome of this second mission, a weekly afternoon Bible Reading has been established, with many tokens of Divine blessing; indeed, the hunger and thirst after righteousness which these two missions have been the means of creating were so intense that we were led to arrange a fortnight's Bible readings by the same God-honoured evangelist; and to see the eager way in which some 150 people in this comparatively small place flocked night after night to hear the sound, searching, and stimulating expositions of God's Word, rejoiced the heart of all who love the truth.

I only hope that our happy experience may serve to stimulate others; and, at all events, I feel sure that in these days, when so many are anxiously awaiting a revival from on high, Christians need to be reminded of the tremendous responsibility which rests upon them after the mission is over and the personal work of the evangelist is done.

I submit to you, Mr. Editor, that it would be a wholesome and profitable subject, both for conference and correspondence, "How best to conserve the immediate results of a revival" (from the human side, of course).

Oak Lodge, Feltham. P. Mallinson.

The Revival of 1859, in Ballymena and neighbourhood, was, as our older readers are generally aware, described in a singularly interesting pamphlet by the late Rev. S. J. Moore. Christians of the present generation will do well to make themselves acquainted with the story; and for such the pamphlet has been reprinted, and may be had for one penny from M. Erwin & Co., 30, Wellington Street, Ballymena.

"Northfield Echoes."—The General Conference number of this publication (No. 4, Vol. VI.) has for its frontispiece a portrait group of members of the New York Presbytery who recently visited Northfield. Among its contents we notice addresses, "Lo, I am with you all the days," by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan; "Unto Him be Glory and Dominion," by Rev. F. B. Meyer; "Revivals," by D. L. Moody; "The Christian's Relation to the World," by Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D.; "Bible Studies in Prayer," by Rev. R. A. Torrey; and "The Gospel of John," by Prof. Wm. R. Newell. It is well illustrated with portraits of many of the authors of the various papers.

A Sermon Topic.

SIR,—Your pages never fail to indicate the importance which you attach to Bible reading, and your sense of the need of greater attention to this important matter. Now, during the coming week, in connection with the International Bible Reading Association, considerably more than half-a-million persons, young and old, in Great Britain alone, will be reading daily portions bearing on this subject; and, on Sunday next, millions of teachers and scholars will study that beautiful incident of Ezra's public reading of the law within the newly-built walls of Jerusalem, recorded in Neh. viii. This seems to me to be a splendid opportunity for preachers to enforce the duty of home Bible reading, seeing that in many cases their hearers will have the subject in their minds. At the same time, good service would be done by advising membership of the particular plan which may be in operation in the church or Sunday school. Where there is no such plan, I shall be pleased to help by sending information post free.—Yours faithfully,

CHARLES WATERS, Hon. Sec. I.B.R.A.

A Latter-Day Martyr.

THE name of Manuel Matamoros is inalienably associated with the religious emancipation of Spain, for he was a champion and martyr in the cause of religious liberty in that country. Papists are very fond of pooh-poohing the "Holy" Inquisition, and deprecating any idea of the Romish Church persecuting, and would probably deny that any people have been persecuted within the memory of those now living. To such (as well as to all earnest Christians) we would commend a booklet entitled "Manuel Matamoros" (Alfred Holness).

The case of Don Manuel attracted attention throughout Europe forty years ago. He was a native of Malaga, and converted from Popery during early life by inadvertently entering a Protestant church one day at Gibraltar, where, for the first time, he heard the blessed Gospel of salvation. He was a young officer in the Spanish Army. He became a preacher of the Gospel, and soon had to leave the army, owing to the hatred stirred up against him by the sacerdotal agents of the Vatican. Thoroughly alarmed by the results of the preaching of Matamoros, they obtained orders from the Government for the police to search out and arrest readers of the Bible, and he was one of the first to fall.

While under arrest, and being conveyed to Granada, Matamoros made the acquaintance of Sir Robert and Lady Peel, whose subsequent exertions in favour of the victims of religious persecution were not in vain. After being imprisoned for some time, and suffering unheard-of barbarities, Matamoros was put through a mock trial, and though ably defended, a sentence—long delayed—was pronounced (with closed doors) of nine years at the galleys. That was on May 20, 1863.

This sentence, such a monstrous outrage on civilization, such a stigma on religion, called forth universal condemnation. Sir Robert Peel helped the agitation in England, and a deputation from nine European countries was commissioned to solicit from the Spanish Government the release of the prisoner. This most Catholic Government contented itself with commuting the sentence to eight years' exile. Three years later Matamoros died in exile, his health and strength having been ruined by his cruel sufferings in the dungeons of Granada.

A hall for Gospel preaching has been erected in Malaga in memory of Matamoros. It is built in the court where he played as a child. The widowed mother of this martyr for the faith of Jesus is still living, but in very reduced circumstances. She has attained the great age of ninety-seven, and is supported by the contributions of Christians. There must be many among our readers to whom the story will be its own appeal. Contributions on her behalf may be sent to Mr. Wm. Greene, 3, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

About Books.

Two Commissions: A brief memorial of Digby Henry Dent, is a very readable biographical sketch. (1s. Marshall Bros.) Many will read with interest this story of a young officer, who was also a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

Mr. C. J. Thynne has issued The Unseen Guide: or Stories and Allegories to Illustrate the Fruits of the Spirit. (1s. 6d.). The pages are full of instruction for the young, pleasantly conveyed, and they will be welcome to those who labour for their spiritual enlightenment.

Miss Charlotte Murray's work is always characterized by sincerity and thoughtfulness. In Wardlaugh, a simple tale of Scottish life, she maintains her wonted standard of excellence. Clear evangelical teaching and vivid personal experience and witness are happily interwoven with the story. (2s. Partridge).

In view of the great need for instruction in Reformation history and principles, we welcome two capital little Books—The Story of the Man who Fought the Giants, in which W. Stanley Martin delineates the life and work of Martin Luther; and At the Sign of the Pelican, a tale of the Reformation in France, by Brida Walker. (1s. each nett. Partridge.)

"Children need frequently to be reminded of the advantages of youth, and industry, and truthfulness," says Rev. A. Hampden Lee, of Walsall, in his little book, Object Addresses: for Church, School, and Home. (1s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The pages are by no means confined to this limited endeavour. Divine truth is conveyed in a striking manner, and the teacher is assisted by hints as to the objects by which to illustrate each subject.

Social Aspects of the Quaker Faith is the title of a singularly thoughtful volume of lectures and addresses by Edward Grubb, M.A. (3s. 6d. Headley Brothers.) Among the subjects discussed are "Christ's Ideal of a Church," "The Study of Social Problems," "The Simplification of Life," and "Christ's Teaching on Wealth." The author is of the "advanced" school of Quakers. On some of the positions assumed, good men are by no means agreed; others are such as deserve unequivocal commendation by Christian men and women.

A remarkable chapter is contributed to the ever-growing missionary history by Bella M. Brain, in The Transformation of Hawaii: How Fifty Years of Mission Work gave a Christian Nation to the World. (3s. 6d. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.) The story, which is marvellous in more senses than one, relates to the labour of American missionaries in a region which has at length come under American dominion. The pages have an interest that is universal; and, though the author specially addresses young people, readers of all ages will find much to instruct and entertain. There are a number of excellent illustrations.

Genesis in Harmony with Itself and Science, by George Rapkin (5s. Christian Commonwealth Publishing Company), is a vigorously written book, addressed to the ordinary reader. In some prefatory remarks, the author says: "I disclaim as vehemently all sympathy with the destructionism of the Higher Critics, as with the blind obscurantism of those traditionalists who seem impervious to all the genuine discoveries of recent days." On some points Mr. Rapkin presents views of a decidedly speculative character, and occasionally his critical remarks are crude and inadequate. But he aims at helping the devout student, and his pages will assuredly be read to advantage by many.

The GOSPEL NEWS (Partridge & Co. 1d.), is a sixteen-page monthly, edited by Mr. Samuel Levermore, and is full of aggressive evangelism.

The latest additions to the Red Nursery Series of children's books are DICK'S HERO, by Blanche Atkinson, and MORE TALES TOLD AT THE ZOO, by E. Veloni. They are bright little volumes and well calculated to please the young folk. (1s. S.S.U.).

A useful little book of quotations is THOUGHTS IN MANY MINDS ON ANIMAL LIFE, gathered by "H. C. F." Its purpose is not only to inculcate kindness to animals, but to encourage a reverence for all life. (2s. Women's Printing Society, 66, Whitcomb Street, W.C.

The Dowager Lady Pigot has published two striking booklets, SAVED FROM THE STELLA (2d.) and TWO QUESTIONS (1d.). They are designed to appeal to the unconverted, and Lady Pigot's style is forcible and should rouse attention. The first-named booklet is illustrated. Both have already had a considerable circulation. (Partridge.)

Mr. E. Kaufmann, 5 and 6, Paternoster Row, has already brought out two Scripture block calendars for next year. The daily texts are the same on both, but the designs vary; each is singularly bright in floral decoration, and artistically executed. One is styled THE CHRISTIAN'S CALENDAR, the other THE LIGHT OF LIFE. (1s. each).

A good booklet, well illustrated, is HOW, WHEN, AND WHY, an address to the young on Giving for the Cause of Christ, by J. Forbes Moncrieff. Issued by a Committee of the Free Church of Scotland, this little work is calculated to instruct Christian people on a subject of deep importance. (1d., 5s. per 100 nett. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

Feeding the East End Poor.—In accordance with annual custom, the poor of the East End of London were entertained to a "Mayoral banquet" on Thursday last in the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End. The kindness of many friends has rewarded the diligence and devotion of the superintendent of the Tower Hamlets Mission (Mr. F. N. Charrington), year by year, in his endeavour to provide, on each recurring Lord Mayor's Day, a treat for the inhabitants of the slums and alleys with which this locality abounds. The hall was thronged with a multitude of hungry men, women, and children, eager for the opportunity of partaking of what are only the necessaries of life, but of which they are only too often deprived. The enjoyment of the festival was greatly enhanced by the performances of the orchestra, and an exhibition of animated photographs.

"I WAS AN HUNGRED; NAKED; IN PRISON."

Eight Days' Missions conducted regularly in the Prisons of England and Wales by a special staff of Church Army Prison Missioners. Many stories can be told by these missioners of lives changed, and a new world opened out to prisoners and ex-prisoners. Men, women, and lads received direct from Prison into the Society's Homes. Special Homes for First Offenders. Help is given in cases of necessity to the families and dependents of those in prison. 72 HOMES, &c., in London and in the Provinces, from Newcastle to Plymouth, for helping those who have "fallen by the way" to help themselves, without distinction of creed.

Chaplain, Pentonville Prison, writes:—"Your labour homes are simply invaluable."
Chaplain, Durham Prison, writes:—"Your work is sound and invaluable."
Chaplain, Wormwood Scrubbs Prison, writes:—"I believe the Church Army to be doing an immense amount of good, and to be the right thing in the right place."

FUNDS and OLD CLOTHES of every description urgently pleaded for.

Central Staff almost wholly unpaid.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Autumn Conference of the South Midland District Union was recently held at Reading. After luncheon, at which the delegates were the guests of Mr. Martin John Sutton, the Colonial and Foreign Extension Work of the National Council was considered, and Mr. Frank Anderson gave an address on the subject.

Conferences have been held in connection with the South Wales District, at Leominster, and the North-West Metropolitan District, at Stafford Rooms, Edgware Road, London. At the former, Mr. W. Hind Smith and Mr. Frank Anderson took part in an interesting afternoon session, as well as at a public meeting in the evening, presided over by Mr. H. S. Newman, editor of The Friend. At Stafford Rooms, an address was given by Mr. J. H. Putterill on "Specialized Effort to Reach different Classes of Young Men."

At the Aldersgate Street Association, a mission to young men is now in progress, conducted by Major Liebenrood. The opening meeting, on the 6th instant, took the form of a reception, at the invitation of Sir George Williams, which was responded to by about 450 young men, largely from the City warehouses. After a few hearty words from the host in commendation of the Christian life, Major Liebenrood gave his first address, his subject being "Meeting God," a contrast between Adam and Moses. The succeeding meetings have been well attended, the only check being on the evening of Lord Mayor's Day, and instances of very definite blessing have been already noted.

The annual conversazione of the Glasgow United Y.M.C.A. was held last Friday evening, in St. Andrew's Hall, under the presidency of Mr. William A. Campbell. The report presented showed that the membership is now 7,578, with 2,087 in the Young Women's Auxiliary. The weekly fellowship meetings number 217; and aggressive work is carried on in ten model and common lodging-houses by 253 members. As before, the only limit to the attendance was the capacity of the great hall, many being content to stand throughout the proceedings. The Chairman—himself with long and wide experience of evangelistic work in the city—spoke with heartfelt gratitude of what God had wrought by means of the Association in years gone by. Hearty references were subsequently made to the long and devoted services in the secretaryship of Mr. Wm. Oatts—a subject to which we hope to return in our next issue.

An encouraging meeting was recently held at the Cardiff Y.M.C.A. to welcome new members added during the quarter. Alderman Trounce presided, and the Hon. W. T. Phillips, American Consul in Cardiff, gave a racy address. Mr. G. Percy Thomas read an interesting communication from Mr. John Cory, President of the Association, in which much excellent advice was given to young men. In his letter Mr. Cory urged them to remember and to help others, since "no man liveth unto himself." They should be "fellow-labourers with Him" in the glorious work of the world's redemption. While referring to the temptations of a large town like Cardiff, Mr. Cory said that the greatest spiritual force in the world is prayer, and that the habit of prayer should be cultivated. A helpful study in this connection was that of the life of Daniel. Prayer and daily Bible reading would do much to transform the character and fashion the life after the image of Jesus Christ, making them fruitful in every good work, and a spiritual influence amongst their fellows. The letter, which was of a deeply spiritual nature throughout, concluded with a forcible appeal for "loving, submissive obedience to God."

The Y.W.C.A.

A NATIONAL department has been initiated by the Y.W.C.A. to help deaf and dumb adult girls who have been taught on the oral system, at special schools, to read the movements of the lips and to speak. They will be drafted on admission into the classes already formed in the Association. Arrangements have also been made at the Y.W.C.A. Business and Employment Agencies for helping orally taught girls to find suitable employment. The head of the new department is Miss Isabel A. Pollock, 8, Clanricarde Gardens, London, W. She hopes that any who know deaf girls orally taught will communicate with her. She is also anxious to interest those who are deaf or partially deaf, and who are in a position to help their poorer sisters.

Soldiers' Christian Association.—In connection with this Association, arrangements have been made for a convention to be held in Exeter Hall on Saturday next. At twelve noon there will be a meeting for prayer, praise, and testimony; at three, the reports of delegates and secretaries will be considered; and at seven there will be a public meeting, when addresses are to be given bearing on the Association's movements among our soldiers.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Mrs. Livingstone-Wilson, daughter of Dr. Livingstone, has left to undertake Church work in Sierra Leone.

Rev. Dr. Wood, rector of Beyton, Bury St. Edmunds, has been appointed by the Colonial and Continental Church Society to the chaplaincy of Lucerne for the winter season.

The Bishop of London has appointed Rev. E. A. Stuart to be one of the Chaplains of the London Lay Helpers' Association, in succession to Rev. T. W. Drury. The winter lectures of the Association will include one by Rev. J. E. Watts Ditchfield, on "Work amongst Men."

Rev. G. W. Lawson, Vicar of St. Thomas's, Kensal Town, has issued a report of last year's work. The Bishop of Marlborough says that there is "no poorer parish in London." The parish is indeed proverbial for its difficulties and poverty. It is called "Soap Suds Island" on account of the many laundries in it, employing hundreds of young girls and women. The report gives accounts of vigorous advance in many directions.

A new mission church, which has been erected in the parish of St. Silas, Bristol, was opened last week by the Bishop of Bristol. The new church is intended to minister to a crowded district, which is too distant from the parish church to be effectively influenced by the work carried on there by Rev. F. J. Horsefield and his band of helpers. The Bishop alluded with satisfaction to what the inhabitants of that part of the parish had already done on behalf of the work. He urged them to show by their lives—by what they did and by what they did not do—the Christian religion which they held.

The autumnal Conference of the Church Association has been held at Gloucester. The attendance was large and representative. The clergy of the neighbourhood mustered in force, and there was a good sprinkling of laymen. Archdeacon Taylor spoke on Royal supremacy, which he said must be guarded and preserved. It is the supremacy of the nation over the National Church and the national religion. Many of the Bishops and clergy want this power to be transferred to them; or at least that it be exercised under their direction and by their decision. As well might the officers and colonels claim to regulate the movements and discipline of the Army without the intervention of Parliament.

Congregational.

The Worcestershire Union of Congregational Churches has been strengthened during the year by the addition of three churches, two of them connected with the Countess of Huntingdon denomination.

Special evangelistic services are being held in connection with the churches of north-west Manchester. The ministers of the district and several students from the Lancashire College are taking part in the mission.

The half-yearly meetings of the London Congregational Union were held last week at Queen's Hall. Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, of Stamford Hill, was elected chairman for 1900. In the evening a largely-attended public meeting was held in the large hall. Mr. C. W. Toms occupied the chair, and delivered an address on the Century Fund.

After a pastorate of twenty years, and a ministerial career of half a century, Rev. J. Morris has just concluded his ministry at Ilfracombe, and the closing incidents of the pastorate have been such as to bear ample testimony to the esteem and affection in which the reverend gentleman is held. An annuity has been settled upon Mr. Morris, and at a recent public meeting, the ministers of the town spoke in appreciative terms of his deep spirituality and conspicuous devotion to his work.

A united meeting of the Congregational churches in Norwich was recently held to inaugurate locally a movement in support of the Twentieth Century Fund. Rev. Dr. Barrett, declared that the future of Congregationalism in this land depended upon whether or not they were prepared to capture the towns and cities of England which were slipping away from them year by year. The growth of the population had overstripped the provision the Congregationalists were making for their religious accommodation. The £150,000 which would go to church extension would be productive expenditure of the best kind.

Baptist.

Mr. H. R. Cripps, of the Pastors' College, has accepted a hearty invitation to the pastorate of the Baptist Church, Horley, Surrey. A spirit of expected blessing prevails.

Rev. W. F. Price, of Paignton, has accepted a unanimous invitation to Buckingham Hall Church, Hotwells, Bristol. He purposes to commence his ministry there on the first Sunday in January.

Rev. J. H. Grant's first anniversary as pastor of Fulham Chapel, Dawes Road, S.W., has been celebrated. At the public meeting, Mr. W. H. Prideaux was able to give very satisfactory reports of spiritual progress. Many, he said, had been baptized during the year.

Rev. T. Collins Joyce, Baptist missionary, recently returned from Brazil, where he has laboured for five years, is precluded by medical orders from returning to the foreign field, and is therefore seeking a permanent sphere of work at home. Communications may be addressed 243, Great College Street, Camden Town, London, N.W.

Dr. Clifford continues to attend meetings in the provinces on behalf of the Century Fund. At a recent visit to Loughborough, he addressed a conference of representatives of the Loughborough and District Baptist Union on the subject. Preaching in the afternoon, Dr. Clifford also made a forcible spiritual appeal to the young people to undertake more definite service in the church.

Miss Ada Ward, formerly well-known as an actress, has become a member of Lake Road Chapel, Portsmouth. At a recent service she was immersed by the pastor, Rev. G. R. Hern. Miss Ward is an accomplished lady, with a strong personality, and does not hesitate to publicly confess her faith in Christ, and to expose the evils of the stage. She has conducted missions at Portsmouth and elsewhere with good results. Her last appearance on the stage was at the Princess Theatre, adjacent to Lake Road.

Pastor S. John Thorpe, of Teignmouth, recently delivered the first of a series of lectures under the auspices of the Free Church Council. The subject was "Sacerdotalism." Special emphasis was given to the point that, in the New Testament, all believers are equally described as priests. The lecture was greatly enjoyed, and the thanks of the audience were voiced by Revs. J. Williams, E. C. Jones, and B. Portnell, the Wesleyan, Congregational, and Primitive Methodist Ministers.

Methodist.

Rev. J. Gregory Mantle, of Brighton, has secured the Brighton Alhambra Theatre for ten Sunday evening evangelistic services. The building seats 2,000 persons.

The Primitive Methodist Council in Leeds has arranged for a simultaneous mission to be held in each of the eight circuits, commencing November 25. The mission is to commence with a united prayer meeting and love feast at Quarry Hill Chapel, where, at similar services in the past, some glorious seasons of refreshing have been experienced.

The West African Churches of the Primitive Methodist Connexion have given an interesting proof of their vitality. Rev. R. Fairley, who has just returned on furlough from Fernando Po, brought with him from the mission stations on that island contributions towards the Connexional Jubilee Fund, the orphanage, the mission work at Whitechapel and Southwark, and also sufficient to meet the cost of the missionary breakfast in May.

The annual convention of the Junior Wesleyan Methodist Ministers was held last week in Limerick. Rev. H. G. Collier presided. Rev. J. A. Duke spoke on "Sermon Preparation," and Rev. J. E. Neill on "The Conduct of Public Worship." A very suggestive paper on "Pastoral Work" was read by Rev. Thos. Dalmsley. The public gatherings in connection with the convention were largely attended and most impressive.

Presbyterian.

Dr. Pentecost has been suffering from an injury to his knee, the result of an old cycling accident. He recently appeared in a New York pulpit on crutches, but is now able to discard them.

The Presbytery of Carlisle has had in contemplation an extension movement in Lancaster, where the Presbyterian Church of England is not represented. A commodious hall has now been engaged, and services started. Rev. J. Montgomery Bonnar preached at the opening gatherings.

A series of Gospel meetings, conducted by Rev. Mark Robson, have been held in the Presbyterian Church, Falstone. It was a time of much blessing both to old and young. People came from far and near, and the church was filled. The Bible-readings and Gospel addresses will be long remembered.

Rev. Dr. Hanson, of Marylebone, referring to the Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign, writes:—"The undertaking is well organized. The ministers, as a whole, are cordially supporting it. I counted about a score at each of the meetings that I attended. Every care is taken to secure that none but thoroughly competent persons shall deal with inquirers. Above all, those who are responsible for the conduct of affairs seem imbued with a profound sense of the utter worthlessness of all human efforts apart from the presence and blessing of the Holy Ghost."

A conference on the subject of social and temperance reform, organized by the Dublin Presbytery, has just been held in Sackville Street Hall, Dublin, under the presidency of Rev. F. S. Gardiner. Dr. Patterson Smyth spoke on the needs and methods of social service, and Mr. George Duncan on temperance work among the young. As the result of the Conference it was resolved to form social service Unions in connection with the various Presbyterian congregations in Dublin and the neighbourhood.

Speaking at the recent Free Church Congress, in Edinburgh, Principal Rainy referred to ritualism. He said that to admit that a class of men had been charged with the exclusive competency of administering to their fellows a system of appliances in connection with which alone eternal life was guaranteed was, in his mind, to betray the liberty which believers had in Christ, and to turn them aside from that immediate regard for Himself alone, and that immediate access to the Father, through Him, to which the Gospel called them. Dr. Guinness Rogers, who also spoke, said that of all the tyranny in the world there was no tyranny like that of the priest.

Society of Friends.

Meetings have been held at Devonshire House in connection with the Friends' Prayer League. Bible truths were expounded from different aspects, but with an underlying unity of thought, and there was much reverent prayer and praise. On the opening and closing evenings Friends were entertained to tea by one or two members of the League, and on these occasions "the communion of saints" became a real experience.

The prospects of the Dukhobortsi in Canada are more cheering. The way has opened before them for sustenance during the winter; work is offered on railways, &c. Philadelphia Friends, and others from Ontario, Canada, have forwarded food and clothing, and, in Philadelphia, have interested the public to subscribe. If any English Friends incline to help with warm clothing, Elder, Dempster, and Company will forward it to Canada free, and the Government authorities will admit it duty free.

A conference of Home Mission workers recently took place at Devonshire House. The subject, "Evangelistic Work," was introduced by Joseph Farrer, of Hereford, who touched on, (1) How to prepare for the mission—by advertising, by prayer, and by visitation; (2) How to conduct the mission—the number of missioners, singing, personal dealing, after-meetings. William George Hall spoke on "The Stationed Worker." He referred to George Fox and the early workers, and the worker of to-day, his attitude towards meetings for worship, mission meetings, visitation, &c. Frederick Sessions introduced the subject of "Preparation for the Work," taking as his headings—(1) Freshness of heart, mind, and body; (2) Preparation of addresses and Bible-readings; and (3) System in Bible study.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. JOHN JOHNSON, a deacon of Victoria Road Congregational Church, Northampton, aged eighty-one. He had been a temperance worker for over fifty years.—Ventnor Church laments the death of Mr. CLEMENT DEAR, for many years deacon and superintendent of the Congregational Sunday School at Ventnor.—Mr. JOHN ARNOLD, Browndodd House, Larne, by whose death First Larne Presbyterian Church has lost a warm friend. In former years he was an active member of the Session.—Rev. WILLIAM SINCLAIR, M.A., minister of the Free Church, Plockton, Ross-shire, one of the most respected Free Church ministers in the West Highlands; his figure was a familiar one in the General Assembly.—Rev. R. R. COLLETT, Congregational minister, of Appledore, at the age of thirty-eight, from cancer.—Rev. Dr. HANCOCK, vicar of the Church of the Venerable Bede, Monkwearmouth, after a short illness, in his sixty-fourth year.—Rev. A. H. PEARSE, Rector of Little Stonham, Suffolk, late vicar of Westoning, Beds, aged sixty-eight.—Mrs. PEARCE, of Brockley, wife of the late Rev. William Pearce (formerly of Clanfield and Waterlooville, Hants.), a true helper in the Gospel, passed to her eternal rest on Tuesday, the 7th inst., in her eighty-third year, after a long life of cheerful service and patient suffering.

THE MISSIONS TO SEAMEN.

Patron—
ADMIRAL OF THE FLEET, H.R.H. THE DUKE OF SAXE-COBURG AND GOTHA, K.G.

Increased funds are urgently needed to meet the expenditure involved by the recent extensions of the operations of the Missions to Seamen to several new Ports, including Calcutta, Wellington, New Zealand, Cape Town, Portland, Oregon, and Hamburg, where formerly the crews of British ships were destitute of religious ministrations.

A further extension of the work amongst seagoing men in the great Port of London has recently been made by opening a Seamen's Institute opposite the Board of Trade Shipping Office at the Victoria Docks, whilst many urgent appeals cannot be responded to owing to lack of funds.

The Society maintains 190 Chaplains, Readers, Boatmen, &c., working amongst the shipping and fishing vessels in 70 seaports in every part of the world.

Sixty-nine Mission Steamers, Sailing Vessels, and Boats, and 91 Seamen's Churches and Institutes are in daily use, winter and summer.

Expenditure in 1898—£41,025 11s. 7d.

Annual Subscriptions, Donations, Offertories, Drawing Room Meeting Collections, &c., are earnestly asked for to maintain the existing sailor work, and to extend it to other ports. They should be sent to Commander W. DAWSON, R.N., The Missions to Seamen, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Personalia.

MR. ROSS, general secretary of Derby Y.M.C.A., has accepted the post of general secretary to the Conference Hall and Y.M.C.A., Stratford, where Mr. E. Fox Butlin laboured so successfully for fifteen years. He will commence his labours with the New Year.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Faithfull have returned to their work at the Chamberi Evangelical Mission, Madrid. Writing to us on the 6th inst., Mr. Faithfull says:—"It is rather early days to speak of the condition of the work except generally, but I have seen sufficient to call forth both praise and prayer."

Bishop Welldon is already, according to the Indian Churchman, well acquainted with the Bengali language. On August 12 last, not more than six months after his arrival in India, he took part in a confirmation service in Bengali at Ranaghat. Afterwards he gave an address to the candidates in the vernacular.

We regret to hear of the serious illness of Mrs. Henry Cook, of the Portsmouth and Gosport Seamen's Mission. As a result of over-work she has become quite prostrate, and is compelled to take a complete rest. Messrs. Algernon and Claud Coffin, who have given efficient help to Mrs. Cook during the past eighteen months, are continuing the work amid manifest tokens of blessing.

The Student Volunteer Movement.

SIR,—The S.V.M.U. is arranging to hold its second International Conference at Exeter Hall, from January 2 to 6 next. Two thousand students, missionaries, and professors are expected to attend, the students coming from all British colleges, and also from Germany, Scandinavia, France, Holland, and Switzerland. Amongst the speakers at the Conference will be the Archbishop of Canterbury, Rev. John Clifford, D.D., Rev. Richard Glover, D.D., Rev. R. F. Horton, D.D., Rev. Alex. Mackennal, D.D., Rev. F. B. Meyer, Mr. Robert Speer (U.S.A.).

The Hospitality Committee is endeavouring, through the generosity of friends in London, to provide free hospitality for all delegates. May we appeal to your readers to help the Committee by sending in offers to Mr. Tissington Tatlow, 22, Warwick Lane, E.C.? Hospitality will mean providing bed, breakfast, and supper for one or more delegates from Tuesday, Jan. 2, to Monday, Jan. 8.—Yours faithfully,

Kinnaird.
F. B. Meyer.
W. H. Griffith Thomas.

The Pentecostal League.

THE autumnal gatherings of the Pentecostal League took place on Friday last at Exeter Hall. Large and enthusiastic audiences assembled at each of the three meetings held.

Mr. Reader Harris gave stirring addresses. He said that two principles were met with in the churches—a morbid pessimism which magnifies what is wrong without suggesting the remedy, and a blind optimism which calls everything good and declines to acknowledge the need of any remedy. He declared that the remedy really needed was the manifestation to the world of a better type of Christianity, up to the Bible standard. After speaking of the miracle-working power of prevailing prayer, Mr. Harris referred to the war in South Africa, and led the audience in united prayer that the struggle might be stopped and further bloodshed averted.

The closing portion of the evening meeting was solemn and impressive, as Mr. Harris besought his hearers to seek a baptism of the Spirit.

Evangelistic.

At Northampton Races.

REV. J. MANTON SMITH continues to improve in health. He writes, describing a recent effort to reach the crowds that assembled at Northampton Races. Provided with a large quantity of Gospel literature, Mr. Smith was wheeled in a bath-chair on to the racecourse, but found "it was no place for a man on crutches." Subsequently, he took up a position in a garden near the grand stand, and distributed tracts through the railings, while Mrs. Smith undertook similar work among the throngs of people on the extensive course. Policemen and betting men received the printed messages politely, and the jockeys placed them in the pockets of their top-coats. The work was continued for two days, and but one instance of refusal was met with.

It may be added that Mr. Smith is fixed to take part this week in a gathering at Stockwell Orphanage, and he hopes to recommence regular work at Christmas, by which time his leg will have been fitted. Mr. Smith no longer resides at Clapham, but should be addressed, "Elim," 74, Billing Road, Northampton.

Woolwich Tabernacle.

THE Weaver Brothers have held a fortnight's mission with us. It was begun in a spirit of expectation, and to-day the workers are rejoicing in prayers answered. Many young men volunteered for Christ. We have had a remarkable number of soldiers at the meetings. Several who sought the Saviour are now on their way to the Transvaal. Our friends prayed that "big sinners" might be brought in whose conversion would compel the attention of the scoffer. The Lord graciously answered that prayer.

The story of one has made a deep impression. He heard the Word preached in the streets, and followed us to the Tabernacle. The first night he cried out during the service, "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone." Next day, when asked to come, he replied, "Never. I made myself too prominent last night." But he was too deeply convicted to stay away. He came again and again, and at length yielded to Christ. It was a joy to hear him cry, "Lord, I believe. Help Thou mine unbelief!"

On Saturday last we had a gracious time. The backslider was heard praising God for his patience and long-suffering, the penitent for his wondrous grace, parents that their children had been converted early, workers that their comrades had had courage to come out boldly for Christ in the workshop. In the Sunday School, superintendents and teachers were also rejoicing. Five scholars had confessed the Lord in one class, two in another, and so on.

The two brother evangelists have won our gratitude and affection. We anticipate for them a continued career of great usefulness, and our prayers follow them.

Mr. Lane at Coventry.

OF the mission recently held at Coventry by Mr. W. R. Lane (Oct. 28-Nov. 6), a correspondent writes:—

"The mission was all too short, extending to ten days only. The meetings were just arousing widespread interest when the missioner had to leave. The meeting for men on the second Sunday afternoon was one of the most remarkable ever held in the city, upwards of 2,000 being present in the Corn Exchange. Mr. Lane's subject was 'Purity,' and his address was full of heart-searching, and marked with great power. Many were under conviction of sin. In the evening, at the same place, a large number professed conversion. At the closing meeting, when Mr. Lane told the story of his conversion, Warwick Road chapel and school were both crowded out, many persons being turned away. The Bible readings of the missioner proved very helpful to Christians, the whole mission having stimulated cold churches to vigorous aggressive work."

Other communications yield interesting details of the mission. A man who had for years been off the lines of respectability through gambling in youth, and resorting to card-sharping in later life, was among those who attended the meeting for men. He had been in prison seven times, and had spent the previous week at Northampton Races. The Gospel message revealed the man to himself, and he was brought under conviction by the Spirit of God. He was broken down utterly under the preaching, and in the evening processed to decide for Christ. A new sense of concern for others took hold of him, and he urged the evangelist most seriously to warn young fellows about the curse of gambling with its fearful issues. "If only," he said, "I had been told these things fifteen years ago, what a different life mine would have been!" In this, doubtless, the man—now enlightened, and, it is hoped, truly converted—spoke words with which others would fully agree.

Another case was singularly touching, and shows how God sometimes brings about, in strange ways, the blessing for which parents and friends pray so earnestly. A young fellow was invited over from Birmingham by Christian people who were anxious for his conversion. In complying, the youth little thought of the spirit in which he would return. Being of a cynical and doubting disposition, he laughed to scorn the idea of his being influenced through attending the men's meeting. He went, however, and God's Spirit brought him into a narrow place. He became in earnest about spiritual things, and afterwards spent some restless hours. Sleep would not come; but there was a sense of the urgency of surrender to Christ. At the suggestion of a companion, he got out of bed and sought relief in prayer. The vow of loving discipleship was made, and Christ accepted it—as He always does. Peace came, and with the morning an experience of joy, which compelled immediate communication with his home in Birmingham. Getting "on" at the telephone to his father, the young man rang up with the delightful message, "It is full surrender to Christ at last." May other telephones be consecrated by the despatch of such happy communications!

A Stirring Mission.

MRS. BAEYERTZ, the Jewess evangelist, has just concluded a sixteen-days mission in North Shields, with most gratifying results; in fact, we have experienced nothing like it here before. The Lord's people had been earnestly praying for a revival some time previously, and God has very graciously answered our prayers. The presence and power of God were felt from the very first, and as the days went by the interest deepened, both at the afternoon meetings for Christians and the evening meetings for the unsaved.

The culminating point was reached on the last Sunday evening, when the Howard Hall was crowded, fully 1,500 to 1,600 being present, and some had to turn away from want of room. So deep was the anxiety amongst the unsaved, that although Mrs. Baeyertz had begun the after meeting in the inquiry room, a request was sent to her to conduct it in the large hall, where many anxious lingered, and would not go away. This request was gladly acceded to, and, as the result, ninety-one persons gave in their names as having trusted. The total number of souls that entered the inquiry rooms during the whole mission was 372.

The Lord Jesus was preached with the power of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; so to Him be all the praise.

Mr. Newton Jones has been holding two services—first for children, followed by a special gathering for adults—at Pickering, Walford, and Bradford. The word has been with power, and the testimonies have been numerous of blessing received by workers and scholars.

An eight days' mission has been conducted at Bromley Road Tabernacle, Lee, S.E., by Pastor J. W. Davies. A number of young men belonging to the Christian Endeavour took part, and Rev. A. C. Chambers, of Belvedere, gave an impressive address. The attenances were large, and many bear witness to blessing received. D.

Rev. John T. Vine has held a three-weeks' mission in the Grafton Square Baptist Church, Clapham. The services, although not largely attended, have been a great blessing to many. The Lord's people have been much encouraged and helped in their pilgrimage life, and there have been several most hopeful professions of conversion, for which we praise God.

A mission has been held at Okehampton, Devon, under the auspices of the local Free Church Council. The effort was inaugurated by a holiness convention, marked by much spiritual power, at which Rev. J. Gregory Mantle gave addresses. The Gospel meetings were conducted by Mr. W. Jennings, of Plymouth; and, although the weather for part of the time was unfavourable, the attendances were large at all the services, and on several occasions the hall was crowded out. The missioner preached the Gospel in its fulness, and the power of the Spirit accompanied the Word. At the close of the services it was cheering to see both young and old "coming over" to the Lord's side. The mission is over, but the work goes on. W. Harry Dawe.

The mission recently conducted by Rev. W. Bryan Brown, of the Church Parochial Mission Society in H.M. Prison, Durham, afforded a striking illustration of the power of the simple message of the grace of God to move the hearts of men. The opportunities for DEATH has entered one of the stately mansions of England, and thrown another noble household into mourning. Neither political preferences nor religious creed will be allowed to qualify the sympathy which will go forth at this time towards the Marquis of Salisbury and his family. Lady Salisbury never courted the public gaze, but she sustained with dignity an exalted position, and ably supported her husband in the discharge of high responsibilities. What with public anxieties exceptionally acute, and heavy home sorrows, the Prime Minister and his welfare should not be overlooked at the present time by those who take national as well as private affairs to the Throne of Grace.

It indicates the exceeding sensitiveness, even of Christians, Dutch and English, that our references to the war, which have been studiously impartial in a political sense, have brought us sharp rebukes from either side. Each has imagined that the other side has been unduly upheld and their own condemned. But, whatever may be our convictions as to the merits of the case, surely our duty and our privilege as Christians is to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Our function is prayer to God and love to one another. God makes the wrath of man to praise Him, and the remainder of the wrath He will restrain. For ourselves, our prayer continually is that it may be restrained; that the war may be brought to a speedy termination, and that the issue may be peace through righteousness. The Christians on both sides will have the greatest influence in promoting kindly feeling in the future, and in reducing to a minimum the prejudices and animosities of race.

At last the Theatres and Music Hall Committee of the Council (which sat on Friday at Clerkenwell), have practically recommended the discontinuance of Sunday concerts at the Crystal Palace and Queen's Hall, because they are not satisfied that the concerts are not conducted by "by way of trade." This is satisfactory so far as it goes. But it does not touch at all the ground of objection which thousands of Christian people have to Sunday desecration itself. The present trend of things is not denied to be in the direction of a more extended violation of the sanctity of the Lord's Day. Whether or not gain accrues is a comparatively small matter in view of the gradual secularising of the Sabbath, or the approval of much greater facilities for making the Day of Rest a day of worldly pleasure. Loyalty to Jesus Christ demands that any encroachment on the sanctity of the day should be strenuously resisted.

The proposal of the C.M.S. to develop the medical side of their mission work is an excellent one. The committee have sanctioned the formation of a Medical Mission in South London. A hostel for lady students is also to be opened without delay. Here elementary instruction will be given in medicine, surgery, hygiene, cooking, &c. There could hardly be a wiser forward movement than this. Knowledge of medicine on the part of lady missionaries has long been considered an essential qualification for future success in the vast foreign fields of service. Especially in Mohammedan lands, to be able to treat the simpler ailments which they will meet with in the homes of the women will give them a great opportunity of speaking the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. The initial cost of about £1,000 should be no difficulty, and the annual outlay for maintenance easily provided for.

There is reason to fear that the Lambeth Council, held last week to consider the question of procedure towards offending clergy, will prove to be another abortive sitting. That something should be done is admitted on every hand. But if it be the fact, as The Record says, some sanguine persons believe "that the Bishops are all cowards," then there is little hope of lawlessness being put down:—

> Given a few men of personal sanctity who will not yield, a few self-advertising persons to swell the throng, a few truculent laymen of the type of the Duke of Newcastle, and a few lay "supers" to make a show of numbers on the stage, and they think the Bishops will, in alarm, resign all thoughts of action, and gradually allow things to go on in the old groove.

That this should even be in the minds of certain "sanguine persons" is a pitiable thing indeed, in regard to men occupying the leading position in the Church of Christ, which the Bishops claim to occupy.

Much has been made of Lord Rosebery's discovery of the secret of Oliver Cromwell's strength and influence. It is not new, but it is powerfully expressed; and the speaker's position and fame gave it a distinction that it never could have had on the lips of any minister of religion:—

> There is one answer I suppose everybody here would give—that the secret of Cromwell's strength rested in his religious faith. I discard that answer, because it would be begging the question. No; my answer is this—that he was a practical mystic, the most formidable and terrible of all combinations. A man who combines inspiration apparently derived—in my judgment, really derived—from close communion with the supernatural and the celestial; a man who has that inspiration and adds to it the energy of a mighty man of action, such a man as that lives in communion on a Sinai of his own, and when he pleases to come down to this world below seems armed with no less than the terrors and decrees of the Almighty Himself.

What does "practical mystic" mean? A man who prays before he acts, and acts after he has prayed. And this kind of man is not uncommon in all walks of life, an irresistible, magnetic, all-conquering kind of man. His sphere may be very limited, but he reduces it to Divine order, and fills it with Divine blessings.

The distinction between politicians and statesmen has seldom been more forcibly illustrated than it has by the present Administration's treatment of the Report of the Licensing Commission, which seems in a fair way of being shelved altogether by the Government in their fear of the drink interest. Quite recently the Home Secretary—who better than most men should be familiar with the dread results of the liquor traffic—referred to the Report as having left the question of remedies in a "contentious form," and deprecated "legislation in a hurry." But, as a matter of fact, the Report bristled with excellent remedial suggestions, and the subject calls for carefully considered measures of reform which should be pressed for and insisted upon by all who have the real well-being, physical and spiritual, of the people at heart.

We hail with much satisfaction the intention, now publicly expressed, of all the leading national Temperance associations to unite for the purpose of securing legislation on the lines of Lord Peel's Report. Division in counsel and action has too long been the weakness of the Temperance cause, while enthusiastic union has been the strength of "the Trade." The ultimate goal of most Temperance workers is a long way off; but there are nearer objects of great value which, to a united and earnest body of men, should be possible of early attainment. It is high time that the Lord's Day were redeemed from the curse of the drink, and made simply decent; when it has reached that stage the Churches will press on and seek to make it religious and devout. Little children should at once be safeguarded from the temptations of the public-house. And men and women also, who are weak in resolution and are constantly stumbling into open bars, should no longer see every street in the poor parts of a town turned into snares and pitfalls for them.

Mr. Edward Grubb speaks like a true Quaker prophet of the early time when he says that the things which make a Church rotten are the evangelicalism which denounces heterodoxy, but is always well fed; the strict Quakerism that objects to all pre-arrangement except for making money; the smooth complacency that detests all zeal except the search for dividends. He says, and rightly, Jesus Christ knows nothing of a cool, calculating, self-satisfied discipleship, and that his first demand is for a self-forgetting, passionate, attachment. "All that is of the world is not of the Father." The battle has always, in every land, and in every Church—whether simple and informal, as the Friends' Society, or stately and historical, as the Church of England—been with the love of things seen and temporal. We trust that the voice of a living prophet, joined to those of the noble band long dead—Fox, Woolman, Barclay—will not call in vain to any of the Churches.

The sale for £202,000 of St. Mary's, Moorfields, has left the City of London without a Roman Catholic church; and although it is urged that the reason for the step is simply the fact that the foundations have become "somewhat unsafe" owing to "the erecting of great piles of buildings and the demand for more," it is understood that funds are urgently required, and are not otherwise forthcoming, for the completion of the huge Byzantine Cathedral at Westminster, which the Romanists commenced regardless of the illustration given by our Lord of the unwise man who commenced to build without having counted the cost.

In preaching the closing sermon, opportunity was taken to repeat the oft-disproved statement as to the extension of Romanist belief, the fact that, during the past eighty years, 120 Roman Catholic places of worship have been provided in the diocese being urged in illustration, and the equally important one carefully concealed, that the number of Roman Catholics is not increasing in proportion to the general increase in the population, and that the increase in "plant and staff" certainly is out of all proportion to the results. This glossing and actual suppression of the truth is, however, one of Rome's chief weapons.

An important letter, over the signature "Verax," recently appeared in the columns of The Times on the attitude of the Vatican to this country. It called attention to the conspicuous part which the Roman Catholic press of the Continent plays in hounding on public opinion against England in connection with the Transvaal. The unanimity of this outcry would clearly point to a mot d'ordre from Rome, even if the Vatican Press had itself preserved silence. But it has not preserved silence, and the Voce della Verita, and the Osservatore Romano have made "no disguise of the enmity to this country which prevails in the ruling circles at the Vatican." The Romish Church never has forgiven and never will England for her Protestantism, but in the words of the writer of the letter:—

A strong and indeed overwhelming Protestant feeling will be aroused in this country if the Catholics of England, at a moment of national emergency, have not the courage and the patriotism to protest openly and firmly against the wholesale attempt which is being made to throw the weight of Catholic opinion abroad into the scales against their country.

The campaign of persecution recently organized against Protestantism in Spain has commenced, and the Protestants of Granada are passing through a severe ordeal. For some time the pupils of a neighbouring Roman Catholic institute have resorted to the cowardly habit of stoning the Protestant chapel and the adjoining buildings. Before the police could interfere, a serious attack was organized by a crowd of 200 persons, under the instigation of the priests, who cried out, "Death to the Protestants," &c., and threatened to burn the building. The riot was only quelled with extreme difficulty; and it is a fact that throws light on the methods and power of the Romanist party in the country, that the only newspaper which dared to publish an account of the outrage was afterwards forced to call in all the procurable copies that had been issued. There is a strong hatred between Romanism and publicity; its methods suit the darkness rather than the light, and show that the spirit of the Inquisition remains, though the institution is a thing of the past.

Dwellers at home seldom realize that Mohammedanism is the main support of slavery, that the African slave trade has recently been maintained solely to supply the Moslem market, and that Arabia, the home of Islam, is hardly touched by Christian agency. The public slave market at Mecca was in full swing every day while Dr. Hurgronje was in the city; no friend of anti-slavery efforts, he confesses that there are horrible details in the selling of women and the mutilation of men.

One visitor to the Red Sea testifies that neither the British, nor the French, nor the Italians, do much to check the export of slaves from their sphere of influence; while he saw hundreds of dhows waiting for business between Massowah and Assab, he did not see one warship looking after them. At the slave traffic ports on the Arab coast the Turkish authorities charge so much a head on every slave introduced into Arabia at these points. Mackay, of Uganda, was of opinion that the only way to root out slavery was to convert the Arab traders; and of this work there is much to be done, since the entire west coast of Arabia is said to have not one witness for Christ.

An anonymous donor at Bournemouth has made the autumnal meetings of the Hampshire Congregational Union memorable by presenting £1,000 to the general work of the Union. A mansion and lands adjoining have also been offered as a "Home of Rest" for ministers, students, and evangelists, and for missionaries home on sick leave. The benefits of the home are to be shared by Congregationalists, Baptists, and Presbyterians. This gracious thoughtfulness for men who devote themselves to missionary and ministerial service in Christ's Kingdom is peculiarly welcome. There are hundreds of ministers in the small towns and villages to whom a week or two's rest amid happy surroundings, free from care, would mean renewal in so many ways. More verve, more heart, more success, in the "King's business," would assuredly follow a holiday in such a lovely spot.

Sir John Gorst has contributed to a contemporary a somewhat noteworthy article on "Starving School Children," in which he states that if the proportion elsewhere is the same as in London, there are in England and Wales upwards of half a million children attending school in such a state of hunger that they are unable to profit by the instruction afforded them. After dealing with the question of the cruelty to the child of enforcing education in such circumstances, Sir John goes on to remark that it is the duty of the authorities to prevent children being sent to school in a state of hunger, and if the existing law is not strong enough, it is the duty of the State to strengthen it. He says:—

At all hazards the children must be fed before they can be taught, and in the last resort the authorities must feed the children, and deal with the parents by prosecution or otherwise afterwards.

A strong side-light upon much of this parental neglect is thrown by the fact that London's annual drink bill has now reached £20,000,000, the largest proportion of which is expended in the poorest districts.

Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton, says that "the world does not need to be reminded that Christ died, but it needs to be reminded of the special significance of his death"; in other words we want the Epistles, which are the inspired explanation of the Gospel, as well as the Gospels. The Epistles show what meaning the first Christians attached to the facts of our Saviour's incarnation, death, and resurrection. Mr. Campbell very rightly reminds us that the doctrine of the atonement is present in all the Epistles, "and not only present, but in the foreground," and that to repudiate the Pauline doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is to repudiate the position taken up by the whole of the primitive Christian Church. But we do not understand Mr. Campbell when he says that "Protestants frequently minimize the importance of our chief sacrament by declaring it to be a memorial service designed to commemorate the passion of our Lord. Its more important function is to emphasize the passion." What is commemoration but emphasis, a new emphasis, an additional emphasis every communion? Any other emphasis "cometh of evil."

Attention has still to be called to the observance of Children's Eucharist Services in some London Churches, notably recently St. Mary Magdalene, Munster Square. Months ago the practice was condemned by the bishops. It is the teaching in the manuals placed in the hands of girls and boys that is doing so much to pervert the minds of Christ's little ones. Here are some of the prayers they are taught to use:—

O God the Holy Ghost, who didst once overshadow the Virgin Mary, making her the Mother of God, vouchsafe, we beseech Thee, to bless this bread and wine, that they may become the true Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

O Heavenly Father, we offer unto Thee the Body and Blood of thy Christ, here present on thine Holy Altar, the one perfect sacrifice for the sins of the whole world.

O most Holy Trinity, accept this sacrifice which we have offered unto Thee.

Can there be a greater perversion of the Truth concerning that which should be a beautiful spiritual memorial service of the dying love of Jesus?

How many of the readers of The Christian are aware of the unhappy fact that, although the degrading punishment of flogging was abolished in the Army nearly twenty-five years ago, it is still retained in the Navy? A Plymouth contemporary has called attention to the matter, and has expressed a hope, in which we heartily join, that a crusade may be commenced with the view of sweeping away this blot upon our humanity. In describing the infliction of the punishment upon a seaman attached to one of the warships—a punishment, by the way, for no more serious an offence than malingering—the journal says:—

After receiving eleven lashes, the prisoner became insensible, and the medical officer present stopped the cruel proceeding, and the wretched man was removed bleeding and senseless to the cell.

Something may be done in the direction of abolition if our readers will individually address their Parliamentary representatives on the subject.

It is painful to find that, according to the latest Parliamentary returns, 9,151 vivisections were performed last year under the "exceptional certificates," which dispense with the use of anæsthetics and the obligation to kill, and which, therefore, sanction every kind and amount of torture of the suffering animal. Unfortunately, too, these figures do not give more than a faint idea of the extent of the cruel torment, for a vivisector who holds the certificate is empowered to make use of any number of animals in each experiment. That a woman should hold one of these certificates is almost beyond belief, such depths of brutal cruelty being legally possible under them; and it is surprising to learn that no fewer than eight of the London hospitals have laboratories for vivisection attached to their schools. Yet we inflict condign and heavy punishment upon persons who, possibly in the height of unreasoning passion, ill-use horses in the roads!

A Call to Prayer for India.—Sunday, Dec. 3, is to be observed as a day of prayer for the spiritual awakening of India. Individual answers to prayer have been many, and a number of stations have received special blessing; but there has been as yet no "general awakening;" it is for this end that prayer is particularly requested. Many Christians, no doubt, will again humble themselves before God, and intercede with Him that the people of our great Eastern Dependency may come to know the Saviour of the world. The proposal has been advanced by the Student Volunteer Missionary Union; and particulars may be obtained from the secretary, Mr. Tissington Tatlow, 22, Warwick Lane, London, E.C.

A Forecast of Judgment. —1.

By Rev. JOHN SMITH, D.D.

HISTORY, one has said, is philosophy teaching by examples. Prophecy is God's government of the world wrought out to its issues in actual instances of judgment and blessing. We and our nation are in the balances of the Divine judgment at this hour, as truly as Israel was in the eighth century before Christ. And so readings from God's dealings with his people in that far-off time are of imperishable interest and value.

We come to-day to the centre of Amos's prophecy—the utterance of judgment. God's patience is at an end; the sands of his long-suffering are running down. Israel is to be wiped out as a nation; and we are to study what are the qualities, in individuals and nations, which call forth such a terrible judgment.

Amos has the poet's power of conveying to us the very atmosphere of the hour in which he was writing. All over that region, from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf, and well-nigh to the Caspian, there were premonitions of coming change. Whatever were his sources of information, the eyes of Amos were over that region. In one verse of this chapter (vi.) he tells us what has been transpiring Eastwards on the Tigris, far to the North on the Orontes, and far to the South in Philistia. These judgment-strokes, however, at Calneh, and Hamath, and Gaza, are but the first pattering

DROPS OF A THUNDERSTORM.

When, in the British Museum, we have looked upon the winged bulls of Assyria, crowned with human heads, we have turned idly away, feeling that they belonged to a state of society and world of thought too far removed from our own to create any interest or even stimulate curiosity. These Assyrians, were, however, the living terrors of that hour. Rising continually to ever-widening supremacy, this military empire seems destined to carry all before it. The language of the prophets palpitates with the emotions surging through human hearts. "Their quiver is an open sepulchre." And better still, in her own sculptures disentombed at Nineveh, and elsewhere, we have the outstanding character of that ancient empire brought before us.

We see them in times of peace hunting the lion, whetting their fierce passions amid the wild excitements of the chase. In times of war we behold them besieging fortified places, fording rivers on rudely-constructed pontoons, dashing on in their chariots. And, merciless in triumph as irresistible in conflict, their kings are depicted on their temple-walls putting out the eyes of their captives with the point of a spear. Coldly we shuddering, ever and anon, at these portrayals of savagery. But all these traits, and many more, of this conquering Assyria were then being borne on the wings of rumour, magnified, distorted, touched with the fire of terror, to all the peoples within reach of her victorious arm. And so, when Amos, speaking with the authority of a man of God, boldly announced the overthrow of Samaria at their hands, one can fancy the tremor possessing all hearts.

We turn from events to principles, however. What was leading to this fearful issue—not only to the loss of God's favour, or to chastening, or to punitive affliction, but to extinction? Well, they had lost all sense of being under the government of God. They put far away from them the evil day. They lived as if sin had not an appropriate punishment, as if they would never have to give account of their deeds, as if there were no higher will in the universe to which theirs should bow.

How common that is, need I stop to assert? But I would have you realize how evil it is, how surely it must call forth the judgment of God. Can the supreme Lord of the universe tolerate this ignoring of his will by creatures entirely dependent? And, in so far as counsels of pride and self-sufficiency govern our public action, may we not, despite our private and personal faith, be involved in painful consequences?

God will never lower his claims, or compound for wrong; and, in so far as societies of men are implicated in wrong, they must bear the judgment of God. And, under this wide-sweeping law, every one of us is responsible for every atom of influence which he can put forth in seeing that RIGHT BE DONE OR WRONG UNDONE.

But we are only at the outset of this great demonstration. This chapter is addressed to the notable men of this chief of nations to whom the people look up for counsel and guidance. As they have heightened opportunity they are doubly responsible. And here comes in a great truth; that we are responsible to God in the measure of the trust which He has reposed in us, the opportunities and powers which He has made ours. And so with nations. Look at Calneh, or Tigris, or Hamath on the Orontes, or Gaza. What one of them was raised so high as Judah or Israel? They received none of those distinguishing mercies conferred so richly on the covenant people; and yet, on their lower plane of responsibility, they have been brought to book. Will God's judgments fail, then, with those who owed more because they received so much greater blessing? I think that is

A QUESTION FOR US TO-DAY.

Our future as a nation is in the balances of the immediate future. Our actions are under the eye of the World-Ruler. We have been lifted high in respect of privilege above other nations, and God alone knows the standard which He will apply to us in these hours of crisis and dawning opportunity.

But these things are too high for us. Let us come down to matters of immediate personal import. On account of what things is God angry with a people? "Ye that put far away the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come near." When men feel that they can do as they list because they are strong, that they are not to be tied to every punctilio of right with people weaker than themselves—when they do not scruple to strain right to compass their desires; whenever such a spirit begins to predominate in business, or industry, or politics, there is a break with God. For things, for material advantages, for ignes fatui of prestige and what not, we are stepping aside from the business which God has given us, all men and nations, first to ascertain and then to perform. In the practice of the right, in the discovery and discharge of the right, amid all the perplexities of time, lies the great achievement of life. What we shall take away from this earth into a higher state of being are the qualities of our personalities thus trained. Everything else will be burned up.

And once let men, or a nation, lose hold of the supremacy of right, and they cannot stay their hand. Self-will asserts itself with ever-growing effrontery. What they can get away with, that they will do.

"THE SEAT OF VIOLENCE COMES NEAR."

The violations of trust, the craft and duplicity and dishonesty recently discovered in business relations, are overt signs of a Godless spirit far too widely prevalent in our time.

And when men lose hold of righteousness as the supreme good, leading directly to the fear and honour of God, what resources are left to them? Why, only to make as much of material things as they possibly can. They "lie on beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches." Now, do not let us mistake. Amos was a rude herdsman, suddenly transported from the bare hillsides of one of the barest countries in the world to a luxurious and decadent civilization. The men whom he stigmatized were putting luxury in the place of right and God. There is no wrong in reasonable refinements and pleasures, and even luxuries, so long as they are enjoyed in strict subordination to the moral laws and ends of life. Yea, in the seclusion of homes so distinguished, types of virtue have been bred which have enriched human character. The world needs such Elijahs, and Amoses, and Johns, but has also been blessed by courtly Isaiahs, princely Alfreds, and titled Zinzendorfs.

Beyond all question, however, luxury carried to excess, even when associated with higher qualities, softens the physical fibre, relaxes the intellectual strain, lowers the moral tone. Society and government would go to pieces if they were not, generation by generation, fertilized, and their places filled, by men and women uncorrupted in body, unsophisticated in mind, risen from the common stock. A well-known physician some years ago issued "A Plea for a Simpler Life," in a medical interest. Not in one, but in many interests, Christians occupying positions of prominence in their respective circles are of a simpler life, in which, with ample scope for the play of social affections and for social intercourse, the material may be kept in strict subordination to the moral and spiritual, and a religious consecration pervade all.

But if all this be said with truth, even while a certain moral and religious leaven is still working in the social frame, what shall we say regarding those who, having definitely broken with God, are living for the pleasure they can get out of material things? Why, that it is a sorry and empty business. A lounging life, even when spent on beds of ivory, is a miserable one, lacking all energy of moral purpose, all dignity of conscious self-approval, even the natural joy of activity or the emotional glow of beneficence. To the man of pleasure all his higher life is a desert, lacking moral restraint as devoid of moral enjoyment. He must gravitate to what is lower and less worthy, becoming capricious, volatile, fickle in inclination and even appetite. He must tickle his jaded palate with every delicacy, with things out of season. Everything must be turned to a means of sensual enjoyment. Even the divine gift of music they must make a minister to their lusts (vv. 4-6).

Thoughts on Sin.

By Pastor F. E. MARSH.

I.—A Question.

LOW thoughts about sin will always lead to a loose manner of life. He who thinks little of sin will not think much of Christ's atonement for sin. He who minimizes sin will soon magnify himself. He who belittles sin belittles God, for sin can never be little, since God is great against whom men sin. He who sets up his own standard as to what sin is, sets aside God's standard as to what it is. He who gauges sin by his own consciousness commits a threefold sin. (1) He ignores the law of God; (2) he forgets the holiness of God; (3) he loses sight of God's ideal of sinlessness—namely, the perfect Christ. Man's thought of sin is wrongdoing; God's thought of sin is failure to do the right: hence, a missing of the mark as set forth by Himself.

The Apostle asks, "What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under law, but under grace?" (Rom. vi. 15). Many have thought that this question is the same as in verse 1. But a little consideration will soon show the difference. In verse 1 the question is, "Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?" Here the question is, Shall a justified believer still go on in his old manner of life in order that grace may abound? This is shown in verses 1 to 14 to be an impossibility, as the old associations with sin are cut off through baptism into Christ's death. The question in verse 15 narrows itself down to this: "Shall a sanctified believer commit a single act of sin?" The answer is the same, "God forbid;" or, more correctly, "By no means."

The Melanesian Mission, at its annual meeting last week, recorded a satisfactory and progressive year's service. In addition to Bishop Cecil Wilson, and twelve English clergy, there are two English laymen, twelve native clergy, 400 native teachers, and seven English ladies. In the twenty-six islands there are 170 mission stations. The Gospel has been preached in many of the islands, but large numbers are still groping in the darkness of heathenism. At St. Barnabas' College, Norfolk Island, 160 boys and fifty girls are being trained as teachers.

Missionary Support.

"We will go down if you will hold the ropes."
—William Carey.

THE principle that missionaries should go forth without any assured support from those who send them seems to find increasing favour in England and America. Does it not, however, throw a heavy burden often upon young and inexperienced persons, and add greatly to the pressure upon mind and heart?

If it is God's method, then I think it ought to be carried out throughout; and that the staff at home should share equally with those abroad, its privileges and responsibilities. And should it not apply to the directors or committee as well?

If it be God's method, should not all the missionaries be upon the same footing, not some provided for and some not? Then every sum contributed, privately as well as through the Mission, should be accounted for, all be put into the treasury, and all distributed therefrom. This would involve, practically, having all things common.

But parents, or friends at home, would not consent to forego their right to communicate directly with their loved ones. And community of goods was never restored after its first failure.

The alternative to community of goods should be the assurance that the directors, or council, or committee, should be so in touch with the Spirit of God, that whatever He intended for each missionary should find its ordained destination, and every shilling in the treasury be expended according to his will. But would any council or committee

VENTURE TO CLAIM THIS POSITION?

To show that the principle is not regarded by the missionaries themselves as a Divine one, I do not think there are many, if any, who would not thankfully receive the intelligence that some friend or friends had volunteered to provide definitely for them at regular intervals. Nor do I think there is any directorate which would not gladly accept such undertaking.

To commit their way to God, and to trust Him absolutely, as George Müller did at home, and as F. S. Arnot, Livingstone, and others have done when cut off from any base of human supply, is one thing; to be sent out by a society to do so is another.

Those men did not start upon this way except after experience and leadings of the Lord, which educated them to it, inured them to hardness, and instructed them how to abound and how to suffer need.

But this cannot be gained by reading texts to them, or by asking leading questions which they can only answer in one way; just as an inquirer may be asked questions from John v. 24, and from his answers, be pronounced a Christian, though he be still lacking the Spirit's witness with his spirit that he is a child of God. I think it needs a direct witness of the Spirit with his spirit that this way of "living by faith" is the will of God concerning himself, to enable anyone to go to a foreign land with no assured provision for his needs. Then he will know how to trust God directly, and not through the medium of a society.

Another conviction I have is, that to lay the onus of his support upon the missionary, in addition to all his other trials and labours, is scarcely kind or fair, while the Christians at home whom he represents are proportionately relieved of the sense of responsibility. It is wholesome for the Church to feel this privilege, and to fulfil this responsibility, and it is as unjust to rob its members of it as to lay it upon the missionary.

If it be God's method, it is strange that the amount obtained by those who (not by preference or conviction) adhere to it, falls below the minimum thought necessary for those who are specially supported. We are, therefore, driven to imagine either that the minimum for special support is too high, or that from whatever cause, God fails to supply what is needful to those of his servants who trust Him for it—which is inconceivable.

There are missionary societies which nominally adopt the same principle, but whose managers take care that the needs of their missionaries are regularly supplied.

My own conviction is that the first responsibility of a mission is to provide for the sustenance of its missionaries, and that the funds subscribed and thus applied should be regarded as God's indication of the required extent of its operations. And I think that the above requirement being first fulfilled, and his will being sought in all other respects, He would supply the means for carrying on the work up to the limit of the capacity of the mission and its workers.

I have expressed my own views, but shall be grateful for information which may perhaps modify them. QUARTUS.

To my Unknown Friends.*

BY ELLICE HOPKINS.

MAY I plead for an act of loving service in the Master's cause at the hands of my many unknown friends among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN who have so touchingly borne me upon their hearts, and kept my memory green through so many long years of sickness and suffering?

I have at last been able to complete and bring out my book for educated mothers, "The Power of Womanhood;" and I realize the pretty Eastern proverb, "By patience and perseverance and a bottle of sweet oil the snail at length reaches Jerusalem." I attach very great importance to the book, as I have endeavoured to embody the experience of my ten years of work, of a series of conferences held all over the kingdom and attended by many of our leading men, and of scores of anxious private talks with many of our strongest and wisest mothers, as to how best to guard our boys, and mould and shape the higher and purer manhood of the future.

The book, inter alia, deals with the moral difficulties presented by our private and public schools, and how they can be best met by home influence and teaching. It suggests a method of imparting pure knowledge on the facts of life and birth, without violating the delicacy and reticence of our womanhood. It points out ways in which we can get our girls to help us, more than I think we do at present, in forming a knightly ideal of character in their brothers, and deals with some social problems that threaten the near future of the modern woman; as well as treats of the wider and Imperial aspects of the moral question in an empire like our own, in which the unifying principle is moral and not geographical, based, as that Empire must ever be, in its utter geographical discontinuity, on the strong, high character of the ruling race. Certainly one-fourth of the human race will not be ruled by a governing class that shows

A RELAXED MORAL FIBRE.

I need not say that the book, though dealing with the whole question from the root, is written with the utmost care and reticence, and contains nothing but what a young mother ought to know, if she is to fulfil her responsibilities towards her boys. Indeed, the book is not concerned with vice, but with the fountain of sweet waters flowing out of the throne of God, in which all can wash and be clean.

But now I come to my great difficulty in my secluded invalid life—how to get the book into the hands of these young mothers, now that I can no longer go about holding meetings and circulating it for myself. On this subject one is cut off from circulating libraries as a rule, and to a certain degree debarred from reviews; and one cannot, therefore, leave a book to stand or fall on its own merits as one naturally does when the open door prevails. As far as I can see, the progress of our Woman's movement must depend to a great degree on helpful books and papers being quietly passed from hand to hand, women influencing women, the whole movement going on silently under the surface of our life.

I make bold, therefore, to ask for this personal help from the many who have accorded me such unfailing sympathy in the long hard fight which laid me low; especially would I ask it from those whom my words, written or spoken, may have helped. These, I know, will not refuse me the help I crave in my turn, now that I am disabled. They will not grudge me the small sum of money needed to procure a few copies of the book that has cost me so much to write, and will place them in the hands of mothers of boys—if possible, of boys still in the nursery—for it is in the nursery that the work must begin. Bear in mind that all the rescue work we can do is not so precious as gaining our young mothers, who may send out earnest, knightly men into the world to prevent, not to cure, what in some of its aspects cannot be wholly cured. To rouse our mothers to and bring the power of their womanhood to bear on it, is the most precious work you can do; and you can all do it if you will, bearing the offence of the cross when it arises, and going patiently on, till opposition turns into life-giving opportunity, and the mother is able to shield her own boys.

It is here that, while thankfully recognising the immense progress that we have made since I have been laid aside, I still fear the weak side of our movement lies. There is still a large class of cultivated women whom that movement has not touched. They are women who never go to meetings, who take up no cause unless it be the Primrose League, and to whom the very word "purity" sends a shudder down their backbone. They are the mothers who largely give us our soldiers, our county magistrates, our M.P.'s, etc. We can only reach them through the Press, and by one small door that is left on the latch—their love for their boys. They do know that there are dangers to be guarded against in our private and public schools, a knowledge all the more disquieting because it is so vague. Definite advice they would gladly accept, more especially when, as in my book, it is largely given in the words of experienced masters. And when once they see how the whole question presses upon

THE AFTER LIFE OF THEIR SONS,

I think they can be trusted not to remain indifferent, and not only to cultivate a high knightly ideal of character in their sons, but also willingly to offer themselves as much-needed workers in our Mothers' Unions, and other agencies, to help our dear working mothers and purify our villages. There are so many who could find out the class of mothers in their neighbourhood, whom I am indicating, and send them the book, anonymously or not, which would give the information and help which they need.

But, anyhow, all of us have in our own immediate circle some mothers of boys whom we could help in this simple way, if we would.

And as one woman after another silently joins the movement, helped and influenced by some other woman, silently, without sound of axe or hammer, the great white temple of the future will rise, the manhood no longer sunk in the beast, but lifted into God—that temple of the Eternal Beauty, even of Him who is the Prince of Passion and the Lord of Love.

If only the women who have taught me so much of the faithfulness and power of womanhood will do me this loving service, all the travail of soul I have endured, all the brokenness I have incurred, will not so much as come into mind, for joy that a truer manhood is being born into the world, even the manhood of Him who—

> Came on earth that He might show mankind
> What 'twas to be a Man: to give, not take;
> To serve, not rule; to nourish, not devour;
> To help, not crush; if need, to die, not live.

Homes for Working Girls in London.—The anniversary party, in connection with these Homes, was held at Portman Rooms, Baker Street, a few days ago. Residents and past residents of the eight Homes assembled for tea at 8 o'clock, after which a social meeting was held. About 800 young people were present, and the Hon. T. H. W. Pelham presided. Revs. E. A. Stuart, E. Grose Hodge, and E. G. Gange, also Mr. John Shrimpton, took part in the proceedings.

Missionaries and the War.

THE general course of events, and the continued hostilities in South Africa, have very naturally occasioned wide-spread anxiety for the safety of missionaries near the seat of war. Referring to the movements of some of these, Rev. D. Burford Hooke, secretary of the Colonial Missionary Society, writes:—"Several of our men, according to the latest news, are remaining in Johannesburg. Rev. Charles Phillips, whose labour among coloured people is beyond all praise, will remain so long as the coloured Cape people are in the city. Two young men, Revs. Frank C. Rollin and J. B. Thompson, earnest evangelical preachers, have been granted "permits" by the Transvaal Government, and are still labouring among our fellow-countrymen. Mr. Rollin preaches in the iron church at Braamfontein, erected on the site obtained from the South Africa General Mission, and Mr. Thompson at Ophirton. Both these young men need and deserve the prayers of God's people."

Mr. Burford Hooke continues:—"Readers of The Christian will understand how terribly the war is affecting mission work in South Africa from the following brief extract which has reached me from Rhodesia, nearly 800 miles from the seat of war. The writer, who was formerly connected with the China Inland Mission, has, acting under medical advice, undertaken work in Rhodesia. He says:—'On Sundays the greater part of the men are spending their time in rifle practice, the Chartered Company having furnished every one with a rifle and 100 rounds of ammunition. Things are now (September 27) getting at almost war prices: Bread 6d. lb., potatoes 9d., milk 2s. a pint. Everything is about 60 per cent. dearer than in June last.' If such was the state of affairs before war broke out, what must be the condition now when 200 miles of the railway to Rhodesia are in the hands of the Boers? Our duty as Christians is plain; we must stand by our brethren who are remaining at the post of duty. Last week the directors of the Colonial Missionary Society opened an 'Emergency Fund for South Africa.'"

Communications for Mr. Hooke should be addressed, 22, Memorial Hall, London, E.C.

Soldiers in Camp:

DEAR SIR,—De Aar is an important junction, near the Orange Free State. A large permanent camp is being formed here. To-night we open a soldiers' home. It is in the open air, under the trees. Our seats are deals, resting on oil-cans; our lamps, six railway carriage-lamps, hung on the trees. Last night, Sunday, we had our first service, when about 150 men came.

In a few days there will be a general advance from here for the relief of Kimberley; this place will be a base hospital. We write to say we shall be grateful for tracts, newspapers, magazines, and general reading for the men. Parcels to be sent, Soldiers' Home, De Aar, Cape Colony.—Believe us, yours in Christ,

G. B. and M. S. Osborn-Howe.

From Miss Robinson.

DEAR SIR,—While hearts are being stirred on behalf of our soldiers and those they leave behind them, a word of reminder may not come amiss.

While all possible support should be given to the great Aid Associations which spring into activity at such a time as this, it should yet be remembered that the speediest and most practical way of helping our men and their families is through the various Soldiers' Homes under the care of ladies, where faithful and untiring effort is sustained year in and year out, and where workers are already in touch with those needing help.

Although I do not intend this "reminder" as an appeal for special help to my own institutes above others, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that we have peculiar facilities for doing this work, because our houses are at Portsmouth and Southampton, where the trooping is carried on; and for twenty-five years we have had the sanction of naval and military authorities for visiting the ships, supplying coffee and food, writing paper, books, garments, etc., on the embarking jetty, and for receiving needy cases, widows and orphans, into our Homes. In war times, therefore, we are already on the spot where a helping hand is needed; no new scheme has to be inaugurated, but our present efforts tenfold increased. Such, no doubt, is the case with other institutes also. In ALL, increased funds are required to meet the greater needs.

May I ask friends not to send books or papers. Clothing of all kinds, whether new or old, especially warm wraps and children's garments, are most useful. But specially MONEY.—Very sincerely yours,

Sarah Robinson.

A Historical Recollection.

DEAR SIR,—In Dr. George Smith's beautiful biography of Henry Martyn, there is a touching extract from that heavenly-minded man's journal, which is singularly apposite at the present crisis of our national history. Martyn, it will be remembered, accompanied as army chaplain the expedition under Sir David Baird, at the beginning of the present century, when the Cape was wrested from the Dutch.

After a graphic description of the battle of Blaauwberg, and the heart-sickening scenes which the battefield presented on the following day, he thus writes: "Jan. 1806.—I found an opportunity of retiring, and lay down among the bushes and lifted up my soul to God. I cast my eyes over the plain, which a few hours before had been the scene of bloodshed and death, and mourned over the dreadful effects of sin. How reviving to my thoughts were the blue mountains in the east, where I conceived the missionaries labouring to spread the Gospel of peace and love. . I could find it more agreeable to my own feelings to go and weep with the relatives of the men whom the English have killed than to rejoice at the laurels they have won. I had a happy season in prayer. No outward scene seemed to have power to distract my thoughts. I prayed that the capture of the Cape might be ordered to the advancement of Christ's kingdom; and that England, while she sent the thunder of her arms to the distant regions of the globe, might not remain proud and ungodly at home; but might show herself great indeed, by sending forth the ministers of her Church to diffuse the Gospel of peace."

May He in whose hands are the issues of this lamentable war graciously overrule the same for the wider dissemination of the Gospel over the entire African continent! What a call, under cover of the holy incense of our Redeemer's merits, to stand between the living and the dead, and plead for the souls of all; for He "will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth."

Frank H. White.

Te Deum.

To Thee all angels cry aloud,
Great God of power and might!
Sun, moon, and stars all gloriously
Proclaim Thee Lord of Light;
Earth, sea, and sky alike declare
Thy goodness infinite.

And we, the children of thy love,
A nobler psalm would raise—
High harmony of yielded wills,
And consecrated days;
And lives of earnest helpfulness,
That best may speak thy praise.

To tell thy love, to speak thy worth,
Thy messengers we'd be.
Lord, use such humble instruments
As witnesses for Thee;
Thro' us reveal thy saving grace,
That all the world may see!

The Famine in India.

THE Indian papers give a gloomy outlook for the immediate future. During the week ending October 4, no rain fell in the Punjab, Berar, and Hyderabad. In the Central Provinces and Rajputana the fall during the same week was trifling. Prices are very high, and riots are imminent, especially in Nagpur.

At a meeting of the Viceroy's Legislative Council, on October 30, at Simla, the Hon. Mr. Rivaz described 350,000 square miles, with 30,000,000 of people, half of whom are in British territory, as being either affected by, or about to be affected by, the famine. He further said that in extent and intensity the present drought in Rajputana and North Bombay equals, if it does not exceed, the memorable drought of 1868, the year which affords the nearest parallel to the present year within the century.

The Viceroy, then, according to a local paper, made a sympathetic speech, in which he feared the suffering in Rajputana would be in excess of any since the sad year of 1868; while in the Central Provinces he regretted to think that a portion of the ordeal of three years ago may again have to be endured by the same poor people, who have had barely time to recover from the last shock. The Viceroy expressed his intention of visiting the principal centres of the famine himself.

Writing to us on October 25, Dr. Colin Valentine, of the Medical Missionary Training Institute, Agra, says:—"I have letters and communications from missionaries and other friends in all parts of the country, and the accounts they give are heart-rending. The spring crops, if there are any, will not be reaped before March or April. On Sabbath last we had 1,160 starving creatures at our Beggars' Church." Dr. Valentine intimates that he has received handsome contributions as a result of former notices in The Christian. The need is urgent as the days go by, and he intends to acknowledge gifts personally.

Schools for Sons of Missionaries.

DEAR SIR,—You have been good enough to permit an appeal to the pastors and officers of churches on behalf of our four schools for children of ministers and missionaries of the Free Churches, viz., Blackheath, Caterham, Milton Mount, and Sevenoaks.

In deacons' meetings many appeals have to be considered and laid aside. I would plead that these schools should be handled differently; if made a topic at some church meeting, the church could be invited to, and probably would, make an annual contribution to their funds.

As treasurer of Blackheath School, I find there is still much ignorance even as to its existence, and while I am thankful for the increase in the number of churches which contribute, I cannot but feel that, if the deacons would but afford the opportunity, a much larger number would respond. Apportion the gift as desired, but support all four schools, is what I urge.—Yours faithfully, Edward Unwin.

"Christian Progress" Scripture Reading Union.—This organization, as well as the "Living Waters" Missionary Union, has passed under new management. Through mental ill-health, Rev. E. Boys has been obliged to resign his connection with the Unions as well as the editorship of the two monthly magazines in connection therewith. Miss Agnes M. Boys will take her father's place, and Miss A. St. G. Nugent has kindly accepted for the present the position of editor. Miss Agnes M. Boys will continue to act as honorary secretary to the "Living Waters" Missionary Union, which is now supporting thirteen missionaries in the foreign field. These are connected with three societies, and a council of reference has been formed, consisting of Rev. H. E. Fox (C.M.S.), Mr. Walter B. Sloan (C.I.M.), and Mr. Albert A. Head (S.A.G.M.), to render any assistance in connection with the Missionary Union which may be required.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, November 26. 2 Chron. xxxii.

A REMARKABLE reading of the first verse is suggested by the R.V. The chapter begins thus: "After these things and this faithfulness, Sennacherib, etc." We might have thought that Hezekiah's behaviour in cleansing the Temple, and restoring the worship of Jehovah, would have secured for him and his people complete immunity from Sennacherib's attacks. Surely, for such a faithful servant, God will graciously interpose, saving him from alarm, and his land from invasion. But no, the terrible wolf is allowed to descend on the fold, and this in the face of Hezekiah's faithfulness.

Can we not see the reason? In Hezekiah's case, for instance, the faith which had already stood the test was capable of bearing a heavier one, and of yielding more luscious fruit. God pruned it that it might be still more productive. Besides, he could be trusted with trial and pain, as a specimen of the right attitude and bearing of a godly man in times of peril. Of how much value has not this story been in all ages! How many have been encouraged to a firmer faith in God, because of this record of Hezekiah's faith and prayers! And see how splendidly he stood the test, and was vindicated: "There is a greater," he said, "with us than with them;" and shortly afterwards we are told that "the Lord saved them from the hand of Sennacherib and all other, and guided them on every side."

But let us be very careful and watchful, lest we bring on ourselves occasions for God to leave us (31), that He may try our hearts, and teach us that we are not so strong as we suppose. Satan desires to have us that he may sift us as wheat, and we learn that apart from Christ we are nothing, the weakest of weak men, the most unworthy of unworthy ones.

MONDAY, November 27. 2 Chron. xxxiii.

This chapter is saturated with the tears of myriads of penitents, who in the catalogue of Manasseh's sins have seen the counterpart of themselves, and in his repentance and confession have found their path back into the light and joy they had forfeited. How often this record has been as a golden ladder up which a Saul of Tarsus, or a Magdalene, has climbed from the depths of despair to the conscious favour of God.

The Lord often speaks to us, but we give no heed (10). We take the bit in our teeth, and with unrestrained passion make for our doom. It is then that, as the warning voices of his prophets have failed, the Lord sends the host of the King of Assyria. If we would but heed God's gentle, pleading voice, from how much suffering we should be saved; but God is apparently forced to harsher measures than He would choose, by our obstinate rebellion. Yet when we are in distress, and humble ourselves greatly, seeking Him early, and praying unto Him, He is entreated for us, "for his mercy endureth for ever."

Manasseh apparently did all he could to undo the evil he had wrought in Jerusalem. So far as the idols were concerned, it was comparatively easy to take them away. But in spite of all his endeavours, the people still sacrificed in the high places, and apparently his son Amon perpetuated the memory of his father's sins, and made no effort to repeat his repentance and tears. Ah! it is a bitter reflection to remember how many hearts and lives have been influenced for evil, which we can never reconvert.

Though he commanded Judah to serve the Lord, nevertheless the people still worshipped in the idolatrous high places. Take care of your influence. It is easier to set stones rolling than to stop them. Above all, abide in God, that yours may be the tranquil joy of the home, in contrast with the bitter lot of the prodigal, even though he be welcomed by the killing of the fatted calf.

TUESDAY, November 28. 2 Chron. xxxiv.

How strange to find a Josiah in the home of an Amon, like a white lily floating on the surface of a muddy pond. How came so young a boy to such a pitch of saintliness? Perhaps his grandfather, Manasseh, unable to alter his son, focussed his prayers and influence on the young boy, his grandson. And what a marvellous effect must have been produced on him by the knowledge that he had been the subject of prophecy (1 Kings xiii. 2). He had only to apprehend that for which he had been apprehended years before. Though no voice of prophet or seer has ever predicted the outlines of our lives, they are all well known in heaven—all we may accomplish by word or act—and we are called to reproduce God's ideal.

The finding of the Law was a very significant incident. That it should have become so rare that this was the only copy extant, was no doubt due to the destructive and desecrating efforts of Manasseh and other kings. Some pious hand had no doubt concealed it from the eyes of the inquisitors; and the secret had not been divulged even in death. What wonder that the king's heart misgave him when he compared the Divine ideal with the actual condition of matters in Jerusalem and Judah. It seems a striking illustration of the way in which conscience comes across the law of God, which has been for long buried in our hearts, but ignored and disobeyed. One day the neglect of God's holy demands is brought suddenly and sadly home to us, and we cry out in an agony of conviction. It is a great thing to stand in our places and make a covenant with the Lord. Be sure to be consistent yourself, and you will cause others to serve God (33).

WEDNESDAY, November 29. 2 Chron. xxxv.

Christ, our Passover, is sacrificed for us; let us, therefore, keep the feast. All our life should have something of the spirit described in this chapter.

First, the Levites are addressed. They are reminded that they were not required to bear the Ark from place to place, as in the days of the exodus, and, therefore, they might fitly undertake the other work of helping the priests, who were likely to be overwhelmed by the multitudes gathering to the celebration. The old order changes, giving place to new; let us not always be clinging to stereotyped duties, but adapt ourselves cheerfully to new conditions.

Next, vast preparations were made for the poor, and those unable to provide for themselves. True religion, by its very nature, is bound to be unselfish. The holy soul looks out on the rest of men with longing and pity; the storm clouds are gathering over the spoiling golden grain; the wolves are harrying the panting scattered flock. Gather the outcast in, that the house may be furnished with guests.

Yet a life so auspiciously begun and continued may end in disappointment and disgrace. It is not enough to stand now and again in the light of God. We must persevere to the end in that patient continuance in well-doing, which is the true sign of those who believe unto the end, and are saved. Josiah is a sad warning of the evils of that presumption which flings itself from the Temple, and expects to be miraculously preserved.

THURSDAY, November 30. 2 Chron. xxxvi.

What a wail there is in this chapter! As the pleadings of prophets and the successive reformations of the good kings were not sufficient to arrest the cancer of the nation's apostasy from God, the people were carried into captivity; and the land lay untilled for seventy years.

It is a marvellous thing that out of such a nation there came such a literature as the Bible. Compare these sacred books with the other religious writings of the Jews; and, above all, compare their tone and spirit with the evils perpetrated by kings and people, and you are at a loss to account for the production of such a literature, unless you are prepared to admit the full weight of Divine inspiration. Nothing but the inspiration of the Holy Spirit could account for such a phenomenon as Holy Scripture emanating from such a people, to whose sins its rolls were a perpetual source of condemnation.

The length of the captivity was in proportion to the people's disobedience to the law of God, which ordained that, on the return of every seventh year, the land was to be neither tilled nor sown, so that it might become renewed by lying fallow, and that the people also might rest. The people neglected this during the 490 years of their national life; and thus there was an accumulation of seventy years, which ought to have been kept as Sabbaths; and since these were not observed in their proper place, one in seven, years, they were now all observed together. Be not deceived, God is not mocked. If you hold back his dues of time or money, He will exact them in some other way.

FRIDAY, December 1. Ezra i.

Cyrus is one of the most remarkable men of antiquity. He had been King of Persia for many years before the issue of his remarkable edict. Therefore the first year, mentioned in the first verse, doubtless refers to his acquisition of Babylon. It is probable that Daniel directed his attention to the prophecies of Isaiah (xliv. 28). There were also political considerations that made it eminently desirable that there should be a strong outpost in the south against Egyptian incursions. But beyond all this, the Lord stirred up his spirit.

Behind the secondary motives by which kings and princes are prompted, we must always recognise the movements of Him in whose hand are the hearts of kings and of all men. Nothing seemed so impossible as that Judah should be brought back to Jerusalem. But, when the time came, God's word by Jeremiah was literally fulfilled. So shall it be again. There are pages of Scripture as yet waiting for the hour of their fulfilment, especially as they concern the return of the Jewish people to their own land. And at any moment a combination of political circumstances may make this strategically necessary; but, behind all, we may look up into our Father's face and realize that He is carrying out his own plans and fulfilling his divine programme, "doing what He determined before should be done."

The same stirrings were needed to set the people in motion (5). The bulk of the nation had become too comfortable and prosperous to be anxious to return to their own land. But even this reluctance and lethargy were overcome. Evidently, beloved servants of God, He who stirred you is prepared to stir up fellow-helpers for you; and to see that gold and silver are not lacking for his work.

SATURDAY, December 2. Ezra ii.

Those who are mentioned in this chapter did not belong to the ten tribes, who were dispersed into various and scattered districts of Babylon, but were the descendants of those whom Nebuchadnezzar had carried into Babylon, and who were residing in and around the metropolis.

Zerubbabel, the Prince of Judah, the surviving representative of the royal line, led the procession of returning exiles. Four courses of priests, out of twenty-four, also elected to share the burdens and responsibilities of the new state. Singers also went, for the Temple would have to be rebuilt, and even during its rebuilding there would be ample need of their services in cheering the toiling builders. The entire number of this first party must have been about 50,000, with 8,000 beasts of burden.

It was a serious disability that certain of the priests could not trace their pedigree to Aaron's time. It is supposed that they could not do so, because they had preferred to call themselves by the name Barzillai, instead of that which belonged to them as members of a family of the house of Levi. The former was that of one of the richest and most honourable families in Canaan; and it may indicate an unholy pride that such a designation was preferred. It was not the last time in which men have been unable to trace their pedigree to the family of God, because of their absorption in worldliness and pride. May God preserve us from a similar mistake! But if you have become doubtful, lo, there hath arisen a priest, with the power of Urim and Thummim. Look up, He can restore thee if this is thy lot.

A Notable Book of Daily Bible Readings.
IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.
BY ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A.
Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, price 5s.

Books of Bible Readings are common enough, but only once in many years does one appear which takes a distinctive place, and leaps into large and permanent popularity. Such a book was "COME YE APART," and such a book is "IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE." It has only been published a few weeks, but already reviewers have marked it for distinction. Here are a few extracts from reviews which have appeared in leading Journals:—

IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.
"All is original, and all of choicest quality. . . . The thought is never abstruse, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life; yet it is always fresh. . . . We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this is, though many have tried to furnish one."—Expository Times.

IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.
"There is moral vision in the book, and the kind of tenderness which is only born of ripe spiritual conviction."—The Speaker.

IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.
"Through every line breathes the tenderness, devoutness, and devotedness, the faith, strength, and purity of its author. . . . Will meet with a warm appreciation."—Huddersfield Examiner.

Literary Notes.

A SPEECH of Lord Rosebery on "literary taste" has been much quoted during the week. We are afraid that the kind of reading which forms the staple food of nine-tenths of the population now, who peruse hardly anything but ephemeral "literature," is not likely to help good style or promote delicate taste. The works of the master thinkers are neglected by all but a select body of thoughtful people. Rev. Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who is no mean critic of books or style, speaks of Bunyan's "Grace Abounding" as being, "without doubt, the most exquisite specimen of English prose style that exists." Those who are curious to test that statement could not do better than master the book. Readers who begin it for the "style" would probably continue it for the matter.

An extraordinary paper appears in the Nineteenth Century from the pen of that vivacious and self-assertive writer, Mr. W. H. Mallock, on the "Intellectual Future of Catholicism." The purpose of the writer is to show that the progress of critical science has hopelessly discredited the appeal of Protestants to the Bible as the final source of appeal, and that, without some kind of external authority to guarantee the validity of our religious creed, all religion must inevitably fall to the ground. Leaving the Bible to vindicate itself against the assaults of destructive criticism, as it is doing with no help whatever from Romanism, it is enough to point out that the final test of the validity of our faith is to be found in its conformity to the "mind of Christ," which is clearly revealed in the Bible, and for the elucidation and personal appropriation of which He promised the gift of the Holy Spirit, as the Guide, the Remembrancer, and the Guarantee of all saving truth.

The Donnellan Lectures for 1898-9, delivered in Trinity College, Dublin, by Rev. E. J. Hardy, M.A., were on Doubt and Faith (6s., T. Fisher Unwin), and contained some things on our present divisions which go to the roots of a good deal of trouble. He says:

> A difference of opinion about a chasuble or a celebration is now spoken of as a "crisis" in the Church. To me the real crisis seems to be the numbers in so-called Christian England who have no faith in anything except money and beer. Surely, in the presence of so much practical and theoretical unbelief, all who have any religion should unite in bearing witness to the reality of things not seen which are eternal.

True; but much of the emphasis laid on rites and ceremonies and dress is due, to a large extent, to a feeble hold on eternal things. Lose the sense of the spiritual, and the carnal, in many forms, takes control of faith and conduct. We agree with Mr. Hardy when he says:

> Some, who will have no dealings with the Samaritans whom they see and know, are always talking about union with the Greek Church. We know something of that Church, and can assure these people that it is a case of far-off hills looking green. How much better to be united at least by the bond of peace with Nonconformists at home! The field of truth which we hold in common is far larger than the little separate enclosures which mark off our differences.

Some interesting information is given in the last volume of the Dictionary of National Biography on the hymns of Watts and Charles Wesley. The number of Watts's pieces in various collections of hymns is about 600, of which twelve are in very general use; the most popular being, "Jesus shall reign where'er the sun," and "When I survey the wondrous cross." Charles Wesley produced altogether 6,500 hymns, of which 500 are still in use. Watts used to say of Wesley's "O come, thou Traveller unknown," that it was worth all the verses he himself had ever written, an opinion many devout readers and singers will scarcely accept, beautiful and helpful as the hymn is. On the other hand, Wesley is credited with saying much the same of Watts's hymn, "Not all the blood of beasts." It is remarkable, by the way, what vitality the verses of these eighteenth century hymns possess, with their Scriptural truth, their loyalty to the heart and soul of the Gospel, and their large and satisfying expression of the soul's deepest yearnings and aspirations.

"A Dictionary of the Bible" may seem to be a very harmless book; yet it may be very dangerous. The range of the book is enormous; hardly anything lies outside of it. A large number of men contribute to it, and a trustworthy editor may not be able to keep them all in hand, or to prevent the intrusion of views from which he differs; but if the editor is wide and loose, there will surely be a book more or less like him. Authorities have raised a warning note with regard to the "Encyclopædia Biblica" as a work needing careful scanning from the evangelical point of view, setting forth on such subjects as "Baptism," "Bishop," "Church," the High Church teaching; while on points of criticism involving the date, the authorship, the contents of the books of Scripture, it is of what is called the advanced school. Ministers and others who are asked to suggest a good book of reference, will do well to make themselves well acquainted with what they recommend.

One of the books recently placed on the Index Expurgatorius, is a work by Prof. Schell, a liberal Roman Catholic, written in order to demonstrate that the Romanists are losing ground everywhere. The policy of suppressing books that are "heretical" is an old habit on the part of the Papal Council; it would now appear that "telling the truth" and advocating "heresy" are evils on a par with one another. This policy, however, in the end, will only hasten the process of conversion from Romanism. The human mind, when once awakened, is not going to be debarred by any authority from knowing facts, and we may be sure that the facts mentioned in the above work will travel round the world all the faster because of its having been placed on the Index. Truth has a faculty of thriving under attempts to suppress or conceal it.

*A Methodist Scholar.

THE late Dr. Moulton was universally esteemed as a Christian scholar, as well as honoured and loved in the Methodist community, of which he was a distinguished ornament. His Life will accordingly find readers in a large circle, educational and theological, no less than among personal acquaintances and interested friends.

Dr. Moulton came of a stock which has stood high in Methodism, and there were early indications of his future distinction. He leaves sons whose names are widely known in ministerial and scholastic life. This handsome volume gives us a good idea of the hard-working and noble-hearted man, and outlines his career as a preacher and teacher. Dr. Moulton's contributions to literature were substantial, and will not soon grow out of date, especially those that relate to the grammar of New Testament Greek, and the history of our English Bible. He was one of the Revisers of the New Testament, and the chapter on that subject is one of the most interesting in the book.

*The Buddha of Christendom.

By Dr. Robert Anderson.

IMAGINE one of the primitive disciples present in St. Peter's at Rome to-day during the celebration of a baptism or a mass! A devotee of the old Eleusinian mysteries would find himself at home in the scene; but the disciple would shrink away from it, as from a specially profane development of paganism. Between the religion of Christendom and the revelation upon which it claims to be founded there yawns a gulf which is impassable. To the apostasy of Christendom Judaism affords no parallel.

Judaism appears to be an exception to the strange law of degeneration which marks the religion of mankind. The Scriptures are still read in the synagogues, and the paschal supper is still celebrated in simplicity. And in the Scriptures and the paschal rite may yet be found the means of their spiritual restoration. The altar is there, and the wood for sacrifice; all that is lacking is the fire from heaven to kindle it—a signal proof of the truth that "God has not cast away his people." For though, in this age of a silent Heaven, He does not declare Himself as the God "that repayeth them that hate Him to their face," He is none the less "the faithful God which keepeth covenant . . . to a thousand generations."

Paganism is not less evil or less hateful because it masquerades in a Christian dress, and uses the language of Christianity. The guilt and infamy of Judas were all the greater because he ranked as an Apostle of the Lord. And if there be indeed apostolic succession in the historic Church, we know to what source to trace its origin! The Judaism which crucified the Lord was essentially a true religion: it became a false religion only because the very truth of God when administered by carnal men is changed into a lie. But the religion of Christendom is essentially a false religion, and so lost to shame, moreover, that it makes no effort even to cover itself with a Christian terminology. About the priest and the altar the New Testament is silent, save in that Epistle which was written expressly to teach that they belong in type to Judaism and in antitype to Christ. And, as for baptismal regeneration, and the mass, with its vestments and "candles vainly lighted at noonday," these are the well-known stock-in-trade of a pagan priesthood, and the New Testament knows absolutely nothing of them.

Judaism, I repeat, affords no parallel to such an apostasy as this; but a counterpart may be sought in Buddhism. Just as the principles and practices of Buddhism are marked by the most flagrant opposition to the teaching of Gautama, so also the religion of Christendom stands out in open contrast with the teaching of Christ. I would not be understood as bracketing Gautama with the Lord Jesus Christ. I deplore such profanity. But, again I appeal to the history of Buddhism as a striking instance of the working of that same law of spiritual gravitation which has been so apparent and so disastrous in the history of what—if it be lawful to coin a much-needed word—might be described as Christianism. For while in the sphere of morals and of mind man is master of himself, the ruin of his spiritual nature is complete. Here he is so entirely the slave of perverted religious instincts that, apart from Divine grace, his recovery is impossible.

The Scripture expositions of the late Dr. Culross enjoy a widespread confidence. In spiritual things, our lamented friend dealt with concerns that he had seen and handled; and this will be realized by all who, in a spirit of submission to Divine teaching, study his little book just issued from the Stirling Tract Depot, God's Shepherd Care (1s. and 1s. 6d.). In the course of seven chapters, the pages deal with the Twenty-third Psalm, which in the opening sentences, is well styled "The Children's Psalm"—the youngest lisper in a house is almost always able to lisp out, "The Lord is my Shepherd."

* From The Buddha of Christendom, A Book for the Present Crisis, by Robert Anderson, C.B., LL.D. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.) This is a remarkable book, and on which we hope to say more anon. Meanwhile, we give a few paragraphs from a chapter, in which the meaning of the title is forcibly explained.

*True Religion Tested.

By REV. H. C. G. HANDLEY MOULE, D.D.

I VENTURE to affirm that, among the tests of a true Christianity, prominent among them, far-reaching in its reference, must be placed the question: What is the attitude towards Holy Scripture of such and such a system or ideal? Is it an attitude of cordial and congenial reverence and confidence? Is the abundant use of Scripture favoured and promoted by the system, alike for the teachers and for the body of the faithful? In regard of public ministration, is large prominence given in it, not to preaching only, but to such preaching as perpetually founds itself upon Scripture, and aims above all things to make its pages, as they stand, more articulate to the mind and soul? Is the manifest purpose "not to have the Bible on our side, but to be upon the side of the Bible?" Is the Christianity of the private Christian such that he finds himself, as by an instinct,

GRAVITATING TO THE BIBLE

as his true oracle of God, on faith, character, and duty? Is he prompted by his religious system, not indeed (God forbid!) to approach the Bible lightly, self-confidently, asserting petulantly his own judgment upon its meaning to the neglect of other and more collective judgments, yet to approach it directly, asking his unseen Lord to speak direct to him through the written Word? Is it natural to his cast of religious thought to make it, as the Psalmist did (cxix. 24), "the men of his counsel?" Does he find it, as Athanasius assures us that it is, "self-sufficient" as our informant upon the things of God—self-sufficient, not indeed to the self-sufficient reader, but to the believing reader who goes in humility to the Word itself? Is it natural to the man's Christianity to desire to be supremely led, taught, toned, moulded, by those august yet sympathetic companions, the Holy Scriptures—"read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested," in direct and untrammelled intercourse? Or, on the other hand, are the drift and tendency in a different direction—towards a reserved and guarded use of the Bible, whether as the base and theme of public teaching, or as the true spiritual in private? Is it at all the natural issue of the type of thought and unbelief, not, indeed, to despise or discredit the Book, of set purpose or in plain terms, but to place it in the background behind other religious interests, and to prefer to it other means of information upon religion?

With the answers to these two groups of questions goes, if I am right, very much that will test the truth of our Christianity. Unquestionably, the tendencies and results of the two types indicated are different, other things being equal. Let two men be found, both of them intelligent, and both devout, both of them finding their religion a daily reality to them. Let one of them be emphatically a Biblical Christian, thinking so of his Bible that he cannot help making it at once his chief friend and his true oracle in things divine. Let the other find those functions discharged for him, on the whole, rather by some other thing or things. There will tend to be a great difference between the two men in cast and direction of

SPIRITUAL CREED AND RELIGIOUS LIFE.

Let me say nothing, if I can avoid it, that shall even seem unjust or unsympathetic. The less Biblical Christian may truly "hold the Head." He may develop, perhaps eminently, many true Christian characteristics. But I hold that in the sum of the matter, if other things are equal, the two men being equally thoughtful, reverent, and conscious of duty, then the man who habitually seeks "God's heart in His Word" (cor Dei in verbis Dei) will, on the whole, develop his life on lines far more true than the other's to the primal Christian type, the New Testament type, the type illustrated for example in the closing chapters of the Ephesian Epistle, or in the First Epistle of St. Peter.

* From CHURCH AND FAITH: being Essays on the Teaching of the Church of England, by Dr. Wace, Dean Farrar, Dr. C. H. H. Wright, Rev. R. E. Bartlett, Principal Drury, Canon Meyrick, Professor Moule, Chancellor Smith, Montague Barlow, Sir Richard Temple, Bart., E. H. Blakeney, and J. T. Tomlinson. With introduction by the Lord Bishop of Hereford. (7s. 6d. nett. Blackwood & Sons.) The book is a restatement of truth by Protestant leaders and workers in the English Church. Among the subjects of the papers are "The First Principles of Protestantism" (Dr. Wace); "Christ's Teaching and the Primitive Church" (Dean Farrar); and "The Voice of the Fathers" (Dr. Wright). The extract which we have given is from a notable essay on "Tests of True Religion." Other subjects are "The Lord's Supper" (Principal Drury); "The Confessional" (Canon Meyrick); and "The Reformation Settlement" (Mr. J. T. Tomlinson). The volume appears at the right time, and deserves many readers. Those who have to combat Romanism and Ritualism will find the pages of great service.

Among the Poets.

MANY will welcome another volume by Annie Matheson. SELECTED POEMS: Old and New (2s. 6d. Henry Frowde), presents a gathering of pieces, some of them very choice. A portrait appears as frontispiece. Here is a stanza from "The Disciple is not above his Master":—

To raise the fallen, to love the lost,
To save the soul long tempest-tossed,
By sacrifice that fears no cost;
Still day by day I beckon thee.
Through pain into divinest ruth,
Through death into eternal youth,
Through doubt to everlasting truth,
Follow thou Me!

Poetical adaptations of the Book of Psalms are very numerous. We are thankful for the latest: A METRICAL VERSION OF THE PSALMS, by John Albert Robertson. (5s. Elliot Stock.) The new dress well becomes the old songs. A familiar section of Psa. xci. is thus given (verses 5 to 10):—

By night no terror shalt thou fear,
Nor flying shaft by day;
Nor plague in darkness drawing near,
Nor dread disease that doth appear,
And in the noontide slay.
A thousand slain shall next thee be,
Ten thousand on thy right;
But it shall never come nigh thee,
Thine eyes the just reward shall see
Of sinners in His sight.
The Lord thy refuge madest thou,
Thy fortress, God Most High.
No evil shall befall thee now,
Nor any plague will He allow
Thy dwelling to come nigh.

A work embodying much thought, and displaying a large measure of poetic skill, has been produced by William Crossley, under the title, CHRISTUS VICTOR: The Great Temptation. (6s. Elliot Stock). Dealing in particular with Satan's offer of "all the kingdoms of the world," the author enlarges upon the strength of the temptation, and the greater might of the Son of God. Scripture passages are incorporated most happily, and the pages will delight many readers. We make a brief extract from the last book of the poem:—

In weakness now the patient Christ appears,
And bows his head to suffering and to scorn;
Yet lower still that lowly head must bend,
And fiercer pain must try that tortured heart.
To shameful death the Son of God shall yield,
And in the grave his mortal body rest.
Thus far shall sin and powers of death obtain
A seeming triumph o'er the Prince of Life;
He shall bow down to death, and so destroy
The power of death to all eternity.
For short their victory; nor death nor hell
Shall hold their victim in enduring chains;
The mighty captive shall burst all his bonds,
And from the grave He shall immortal rise,
And find, through death, the way to endless life.
He shall ascend the skies unto the throne
From all eternity for Him prepared,
And on it reign, till all his foes submit,
And fall in humble homage at his feet,
And every tongue confess Him Lord of all.

Dr. George Matheson, of Edinburgh, is a bold thinker, and his writings are singularly impressive. His new book, Studies of the Portrait of Christ (6s. Hodder & Stoughton), is what we should expect from him. While the pages do not all compel mental assent, they deserve heart sympathy and approval. Looking at Christ as the one pre-eminent Figure in the gallery of human souls, Dr. Matheson tells us what he sees; and at the close of the chapters (twenty-six in number) are prayers which enable us to realize his feelings also. After making all allowance for divergence of view on points of doctrine, we commend the book to thoughtful Christians for its rich suggestiveness.

*Romance of Evangelism.

VARIED, indeed, have been the experiences of evangelistic work among the poor that have come to Rev. J. Flanagan during his long ministry, and the few reminiscences which he has embodied in the simple but vigorous and acceptable volume he has just issued will doubtless be read with satisfaction by those who regard sound, if unconventional, Gospel effort with feelings of interest and thankfulness.

Mr. Flanagan is now well known in connection with Primitive Methodist home missionary work in the purlieus of the Borough—one of the most deplorable of metropolitan slums. In a realistic sketch, entitled "A Fight for a Soul," he recalls an early experience in visitation. A noted atheist was dying, and Mr. Flanagan, with a number of earnest workers, determined to spare no effort to induce him to repent. We condense the sequel from the author's vivid description:—

The man's frame shook violently. At the mention of the Lamb of God, his countenance assumed a darker hue. His fingers twitched convulsively, while once or twice he attempted to rise, but could not.

Bending over him, I said, "Do not agitate yourself, we mean you no harm. Suppose we sing you a hymn."

At this he recovered his voice, and glaring upon me savagely, he said, "Sing? No. I will have none of your singing here."

"Well, now, calm yourself," I answered. "Suppose we pray?"

"Pray!" he screamed. "No. No praying here! Leave me, you dogs. If you don't go away I'll curse you!"

He continued until breath failed him, and he sank down exhausted.

While Mr. Flanagan and his friends engaged in prayer, the man left his bed, and called to his wife to assist him into an upper room.

"Take me out," he screamed, "this is hell."

"Hold," I said, "let the door remain open, that the sound of our petitions may still reach his ears."

The woman did so. Still we pleaded. There was no formal utterance. Desire distilled in tears. How long we prayed thus I cannot tell. But in the supreme moment of our supplication there came an altered cry—

"What shall I do? What shall I do?"

We listened as we knelt. Again we heard, "What shall I do?" followed by sobs and tears, which caused our own tears to flow afresh. Penitence had given place to despair. The heart was subdued. That night there was joy in the presence of the angels of God over a prodigal's return.

And now, what a change! Never surely did a conversion appear more thorough and blessed. The chamber where he met his fate was on the verge of heaven. Standing for a few days within the vestibule of eternity, he witnessed to all a good confession. The news spread, and many visited him to behold the grace of God.

Of the brethren who had prayed, he never spoke but with tears of thankfulness. His last words were, "Tell them I thank them with my dying breath. I had given myself up to the devil. Their hymns and prayers maddened me, but their supplications so brought God's power upon me that my heart was broken. I thank God that my insults did not drive them from my door. I die in peace and in hope, through the blood of Jesus, of a joyful resurrection. My last request is that Brother Flanagan will preach the salvation of God over my dead body, before they lower it into the grave."

And so I did. Amid the gathered crowds I stood by his coffin, taking for my text, "Is not this a brand plucked from the burning?"

The book contains eleven other sketches, which, if not especially remarkable for literary finish, are yet welcome as a pithy recital of stimulating fact.

A layman was one evening congratulating a clergyman on the luxurious life he lived. He resented the imputation, and was challenged to write up the doings of the previous day. The result is A Day in My Clerical Life, with Reflections by the Way by Rev. R. E. Veagh. (T. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.) The book is humorously written, and makes entertaining reading.

In a choice little volume on Wesley and Whitefield, Rev. D. Butler, M.A., of Abernethy, Perthshire, spoke of the great influence of Henry Scougal, of Aberdeen, over the Oxford Methodist movement in the eighteenth century. During recent months, Mr. Butler has pursued his investigations on the subject, and gives us the result in a deeply interesting little volume, entitled Henry Scougal and the Oxford Methodists; or, the Influence of a Religious Teacher of the Scottish Church. (2s. 6d. W. Blackwood & Sons.) Scougal was a professor in King's College, Aberdeen, and the author of a singularly spiritual book, "The Life of God in the Soul of Man." He died at the early age of twenty-eight; but, seeing that his thought and teaching were embodied in the Methodist preaching and song, he lived a life of marvellous fruitfulness. Mr. Butler's book is an important contribution to a study of the forces of the Methodist revival, and those who study it will want to know still more of the brilliant professor, whose memory seems to have passed away in the mighty spiritual force which he did so much to originate.

* THE ROMANCE OF EVANGELISM. By Rev. J. Flanagan. 1s. 6d. S. W. Partridge & Co.

Church or Bible?

THE present crisis in the Church of England is dealt with in a story entitled Who Will Win? (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.) Under the pseudonym of "Zwinglius Junior," the author attempts to deal in an informal way with most of the weak and dangerous points in the teaching of Ritualism. Though, in the judgment of some, one or two of the positions may seem rather strained, we feel that the book has appeared at the right moment, and is calculated materially to assist a popular grasp and understanding of the salient features of the ecclesiastical crisis.

Those undecided how to vote at the coming election would be effectually aided in their decision by a careful perusal of this book, as, in addition to dealing with Church matters, it is also a political forecast.

The following is a conversation between some Oxford undergraduates:—

"Where are we to find our rule of faith, in the Bible or in traditions?"

"I find mine solely in the Word of God," replied Vavasour.

"I cannot help thinking," said his friend, "that we want a further authority, partly to supply information on points where the Bible is silent, and partly to interpret to us what we cannot understand in the Book."

"I cannot admit that," observed Wykeham. "You must define your word 'authority;' if you mean what Newman called 'coercive authority,' I entirely deny it."

"Yes," added Vavasour, "the only admissible use of the word 'authority' is witness. When a man has seen a matter, or knows it for himself, he has authority to proclaim it; but he cannot enforce it. But what authority has a Church which has received a fact at fifth hand, or even at a hundredth hand, to enforce a belief? As to points wherein the Bible is silent, these are not so numerous as is sometimes supposed, when the Bible is carefully examined."

"Then," exclaimed D'Auvergne, "you do not hold that there is a vast body of Catholic tradition enshrined in the Church for the instruction of her members?"

"Where do you find it?" inquired Wykeham.

"I would appeal to the first six centuries," was the reply.

"Of that period," added Wykeham, "the first 300 years must be of the greatest value; but its theological remains are poor and scanty. They are largely corrupted, and even contradictory."

"I am most unwilling," persisted D'Auvergne, "to give up that great dictum of the Church, that we must accept what everyone has believed always everywhere."

"Where can you get it?" said Wykeham. "Can you give me a single text of Scripture which has received the accordant interpretation of all the Fathers, or has even been infallibly explained at any time?"

"I must leave that," replied D'Auvergne," to those who are masters of the controversy; but the beautiful idea of perfect harmony in understanding of the Bible has great charms for me, together with the notion of guidance in it, almost if not quite infallible."

"Yes, if you can get it," said Wykeham; 'but if not, by all means come back to common sense."

"What would you substitute for my view?" inquired D'Auvergne.

"I would quote St. Paul's words in 2 Cor. iv. 2. 'By manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.' Here we have no word of a priest, or an infallible interpreter, but that the truth will commend itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God."

There is little or no plot, the book being principally devoted to conversations between earnest Evangelicals and Jesuits or Ritualists.

Daily Light on the Daily Path is a well-known and highly-prized devotional text book, in the very words of Scripture. There is a selection for the Morning Hour, another for the Evening Hour. A new issue of a singularly portable edition is made up in two little volumes, enclosed in a neat case. For travellers, and others who aim at compactness, this edition will be specially welcome. (S. Bagster & Sons.)

Britain's Prince.

SOME years ago, the late Thomas Paul wrote a story of Queen Victoria which has ever since enjoyed a remarkable popularity. There was something in the title, "Britain's Queen;" there was much in the subject itself and its enthusiastic style of narration. It was fitting that the same facile pen should sketch the career of the Heir Apparent, and this he did in a volume just issued—Britain's Prince and Princess: The Story of their Lives. (6s. J. F. Shaw & Co.)

In every sense this is a book for the people. The Royal Family is held in the esteem of all, and, as the interest relates equally to every branch of the family, so Mr. Paul sought to tell an all-round tale. Public and social life are outlined, and special attention is given to the opening career of the Duke of York and the beloved Princess May.

The volume is handsome within and without, the seventy illustrations including reproductions of many favourite portraits and other pictures. That many will read it is a certainty; and, assuredly, many ought to read it, so as to become acquainted with, and properly interested in, those whom Providence has placed in high and responsible station. Not on patriotic grounds alone would we suggest that the book should be placed in parochial and public libraries; it is good reading, as well as reading for the public good.

Twelve Pioneer Missionaries.

IN the field of missionary biography, unique service has been rendered to the Church of Christ by Dr. George Smith, C.I.E.; but never has that powerful writer employed his pen to better purpose than in the production of his latest book—Twelve Pioneer Missionaries, with portraits and other illustrations. (7s. 6d. Nelson & Sons.) To give the names of the pioneers will be interesting, and afford some indication of the scope of the book:—

Raymund Lulli (1235-1315), Doctor Illuminatus and Martyr, Spanish Apostle of the love of Christ to the Mohammedans; William Carey, D.D. (1761-1834), English founder of the Modern Missionary Enterprise; Hannah Marshman (1767-1847), the first woman missionary to women; Captain James Wilson (1760-1814), pioneer in the Pacific Ocean; Peter Greig (1775-1880), first Scottish Missionary Martyr; John Vanderkemp, M.D. (1748-1811), the first Medical Missionary to Africa; Alexander Duff, D.D., LL.D. (1806-1878), the Christian Educator of Southern Asia; Alphonse Frangois Lacroix (1799-1859), the Preaching Apostle of the Bengalis; Robert Caldwell D.D., LL.D. (1814-1891), the first Coadjutor-Bishop of Madras, Tinnevelly; Hon. Ion G. N. Keith-Falconer, M.A. (1856-1887), the first modern missionary to Arabia; Nilakantha Shastri Goreh (1825-1895), the first Brahman Apostle to Brahmans and outcastes; and Dhanjibhai Nauroji (1822), the first modern Parsi convert and Apostle.

This book is no mere record of words and deeds. It is a vindication of foreign missions, presented in the form of life sketches, which show that God is behind and before the movement. Every page bears evidence of thorough knowledge of facts and principles in the world of men and the ways of God. There is enthusiasm as well as information, and the thoughtful reader cannot but be impressed with the significance of the Divine leadings of the pioneers, and the greatness of the spiritual issues of which they were made the channels and instruments. The book is calculated to deepen interest in the cause of world-wide evangelization, and we accordingly wish it many readers.

To missionaries on the field and student volunteers, it should prove stimulating in a high degree. And what more helpful present could we send them at this time of the year?

Among Red Indians.

By Rev. EGERTON R. YOUNG.*

AS might have been expected, the hunters of the moose, reindeer, black bears, and other large animals that wander over immense districts, had the right of following them in any direction. The hunters and trappers of the rich fur-bearing animals, however, generally kept in certain regions year after year. Sometimes a hunter, in order to reach his own grounds, had to pass through what we might call the preserves of three or four different families. I once accompanied a hunter to his grounds, and we saw no less than seventy traps of other Indians on the trail as we passed along mile after mile. In one of them was a beautiful mink. My Indian companion at once stopped, and, putting his pack off his back, opened it and cut off some of his bait. Then he took the mink out of the trap, and reset it, supplying it with his own bait. The mink he tied to the top of a young sapling, which he bent down for the purpose. When he let go the young tree it sprang up so that the mink hung in the air, about 15ft from the ground. Here it was safe from the prowling wolverines and other animals.

Then the Indian made some peculiar marks upon the tree with his axe.

His pack was then again shouldered, and we proceeded on our way. I was very much interested in his proceedings; and so, when he had completed his work, I asked him if that trap belonged to his brother or some relative.

"No," he replied, "I do not yet know whose hunting ground this is; but my duty is to do as you have seen me act. Perhaps when that hunter comes along to-morrow or next day he will find another mink in that trap."

"Well done, honest Indian!" shouted the boys, when they heard this. "There is a lesson for many a white man."

"And boys, too," added Sam.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR CARDS.

Mr. J. E. Hawkins has issued some New Year messages, printed in gold and colour on embossed folded cards. Among others are verses by Mary Gorges, Rose Benn, and M. Fraser. (1s. per packet.) These will be welcome to Christians on the look out for select sentiments conveyed in tasteful form.

Messrs. W. G. Wheeler & Co. publish calendars, booklets, and cards expressive of Christian faith, hope, and love. "The Faithful Promiser" (2s.) is an elegant calendar in twelve card-sheets, with floral and landscape designs, and appropriate texts for each month. Others are "Our Onward Way" and "The Havergal" (1s. each), the latter named after the poetess, whose verses it bears; "The Motto" and "Abide with Me" (6d. each). Then there are simpler styles down to the popular penny. The folded cards and booklets are tasteful, and graduated in price. Christmas and New Year cards are made up in packets, and among the most attractive are "Songs of the Redeemed," with verses by Charlotte Murray (1s. 6d.), "Triumphs of Grace," and "Our Shield and Sun" (1s. the packet). The Keswick and Art Ruby mottoes (1d. and 2d.) will brighten many a wall, and act as reminders as to God's promises and the Christian's privileges and duties.

Year by year Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons apply art to the interpretation of Christmas and New Year sentiment; and their productions this season are fully up to the high standard of past years. Cards, panels, calendars, and booklets, in monotint and colours, are even more varied in style than in motto expression. There are floral designs and landscapes, embodying Scripture texts and verses of poetry. There are also ecclesiastical fancies and fashionable frivolities. In every case the execution is highly artistic, all conceivable shades of opinion being suited. For the young there are amusing items, for persons of riper years novelties of charm and beauty, ranging in price from the popular trifle to articles which only the wealthy can buy. Among the calendars may be mentioned "From Century to Century" (2s. 6d.) and "Remembrance" (2s.), the latter bearing selections from Miss Havergal's poems. Among the toy books are "Little Boy Blue" (1s.) on linen; and "Father Tuck's Annual" (3s. 6d. and 5s. according to binding), a volume of many pictures and varied entertainment.

* From Winter Adventures of Three Boys in the Great Lone Land. By Rev. Egerton R. Young. (3s. 6d. C. H. Kelly.) A book thoroughly wholesome in tone, and thrilling in the adventures it records. It is full of information conveyed in a most interesting form. It cannot fail to profit as well as please.

The Moorish Empire.

ON several occasions we have called the attention of our readers to the great work on the Moors and their land, upon which Mr. Budgett Meakin has for years past been engaged. Considering the comparative nearness of Morocco, it seems surprising that so little information is available regarding the population and government; but when history is surveyed, ample explanation of this fact is readily forthcoming.

Mr. Meakin determined a good while ago that the time had at length come to unfold the marvellous story in our ever-expanding tongue, and his scheme was by no means niggardly in proportions. He planned a work in three volumes; and the first, in every sense an excellent production, is now before us, entitled The Moorish Empire: a Historical Epitome, with 115 illustrations. (15s. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) The second volume, to be called "The Land of the Moors," is to be ready in January; and the third, "The Moors," in April next.

It is nothing new that there should be a curious interest in the greatest of the Barbary States.

DURING RECENT YEARS,

however, co-incident with endeavours to proclaim the Gospel in various parts of the Empire, a Christian solicitude has arisen; and others besides missionaries have desired information regarding the country and its features, the people and their ways, the government and its characteristics. These and a multitude of other topics come within Mr. Meakin's comprehensive plan, and he writes with enthusiasm, as well as with the confidence of one who knows his subject through and through. His knowledge goes further—it extends to a marvellous acquaintance with the writings of others upon Morocco and everything relating thereto. Long residence in that country and a practical interest in its affairs, accounts for this.

As already intimated, this volume of nearly 600 large pages outlines the history of the Empire. First comes the internal development; then the external relations; lastly, Moroccan literature. The period covered is from 500 B.C. till the present time—from legend regarding ancient Mauretania to a description of government as at present administered. It is a story of piracy and war, Mohammedan invasion and despotic rule. On the subject of possible political regeneration, Mr. Meakin writes:—

Not till Europe—thinking, feeling, philanthropic, Christian Europe—is aroused to the point of establishing international organizations for the preservation of peace and the arbitrament of disputes, supported by an overwhelming public opinion; not till then can the Moorish Empire, or any other unfortunate country, hope for effective reform from without. Nothing less than a general renunciation of all right to individual interference on any pretext in the affairs of Morocco, and a common agreement collectively to require the reforms so much needed, will ever accomplish the political regeneration of the Moorish Empire. In face of such a united demand, with offers of support if needed, no refusal could be expected, and provided that too much were not asked at once, and capable advisers were found, these reforms might be as peacefully carried out as under the English in Egypt.

Referring Oriental scholars, and those who have time to make independent investigation, to authorities which he has himself consulted, Mr. Meakin says:

My object has been to present to an uninterested public an account — drawn from original and reliable sources — which should be brief enough and bright enough to interest, and to impart a faithful picture of the rise, progress, and condition of the Moorish Empire, enabling them thereby to gauge its character and trend.

This he has done quite admirably. He writes throughout as the Christian observer that he is well known to be, and it is hoped that missionaries and others who have at heart the well-being of the Moorish millions will read his pages, and thereby be enabled more thoroughly to understand the people, and the peculiar opportunities of the present time.

The Golden Grain Almanack and Christian's Text Book (James E. Hawkins) needs no commendation where it is known. To others it is sufficient to say that the get-up befits the choice contents. For 1900 there are editions in paper covers (1d. and 2d., according to size of type), and one interleaved with writing paper and strongly bound (6d.). We note that this is the thirty-third year that "J. E. H." has compiled this excellent little book. The Golden Grain Diary and Pocket Book is a favourite publication of its kind, singularly neat and useful (roan tuck, with pencil, 1s. 6d. nett).

A Noble Life.

MANY will read with eager interest The Life of Francis William Crossley, as edited by Professor Rendel Harris. (6s. Nisbet.) Whether as a man of business or a servant of Jesus Christ, Frank Crossley was a man of mark. His religion was real, and his philanthropy more than a charitable exercise. For the love of Christ he gave up suburban comfort and found joy in living the Gospel in a Manchester slum. Out of pity for his fellows and sympathy with men in their daily burdens, he gave actuality to the words, "Spend and be spent," and made his name synonymous with princely giving to causes and movements designed to help and bless the poor and needy. His friend, Dr. Maclaren, in a hearty preface to the book, well says: "The combination of

in a mechanical direction, of great organizing and commercial power, which were proved by his extraordinary success in business, with the pure idealism and unworldly aspiration which dominated him, struck outsiders as strange, but was not singular to those who knew how he made gas-engines, as he did everything, 'to the greater glory of God.' A nineteenth-century saint does not live in a cloister, but in the grime of Manchester's grimiest suburb, passes his mornings in his works, his evenings in trying to bring wanderers back to the Good Shepherd; and, in both, is doing the same work, and serving the same Lord."

From Photograph by Mr. Warwick Brooke, 880, Oxford Road, Manchester

The book is readable as well as inspiring. From time to time our readers have been informed of the activities of the good man whose career it describes. On some points of doctrine we should by no means agree with him; but his life was a joy to behold, and that not as a result of extreme views which he entertained, but because Christ showed forth his glory in him. Among the related, is one told by Rev. Thomas Cook, the well-known evangelist, showing the great sympathy and generosity of heart which characterized Mr. Crossley. We summarize the narrative.

One evening, on entering the waiting-room on Leeds railway station, Mr. Cook observed a man who seemed to be weeping. Asked the cause of his sorrow, the man replied, "I have met a man to-day who has treated me just as Jesus Christ would have done." Going into particulars, the man said that some two or three years previously he and his brother started in business on their own account; and, having bought a factory, they put in one of Crossley's gas-engines to supply the power. It was soon found, however, that they had not bought an engine of sufficient power to do the work necessary to make the business pay; and, instead of making money, they became losers by their venture.

Being both of them Christian men, and seeing nothing but the disgrace of bankruptcy before them, they resolved to place the matter before the Crossley firm. Certain it was that the Crossleys were not to blame; they supplied the engine that was bought, and no more could be expected of them. However, emboldened by of the circumstances, the man went to Crossley's works and told the story to the subject of this memoir.

The end of the story is given in the words of the narrator:—"When I had finished, Mr. Crossley said: 'I am very sorry for you, my lad, and will do what I can to help you. Go back and tell your brother that I will put you in a larger engine, and take back the old one; and it shall not cost you a penny to effect the exchange.' And he added, 'Ask your brother to find out how much you have lost since you started business, and if he will let me know I will send you a cheque for the amount.'"

The biographer remarks:—"It was wonderful with what delicacy of feeling he would do these things, and how adroitly he would try to persuade the victim of his philanthropy that the real person benefited was himself."

A Valuable Reference Book.

DURING recent years American enterprise has been remarkably active in the production of dictionaries, and in many a study, library, and office, in Great Britain, as well as America, what is known as the "Funk and Wagnalls Standard Dictionary of the English Language" is the "court of final appeal" on questions of orthography, signification, etymology, and pronunciation. Many who do not possess the work have satisfied themselves of its great value, and to such, as well as to a still larger public, it was welcome news to learn that the publishers contemplated a manual edition of their very comprehensive publication.

This condensation is entitled The Students' Standard Dictionary (10s. 6d. and upwards), and on the title-page it is described as designed to give the orthography, pronunciation, meaning, and etymology of over 60,000 words and phrases in the speech and literature of the English-speaking peoples, with synonyms and antonyms; containing also an appendix of proper names, foreign phrases, faulty diction, disputed pronunciations, abbreviations, &c.; 1,225 pictorial illustrations; abridged from the Funk and Wagnalls Standard Dictionary of the English Language, by James C. Fernald, Editor; Francis A. March, LL.D., Consulting Editor; Associate Editors—John W. Palmer, M.D., Francis A. March, Jr., Ph. D., William R. Cochrane, Emma Fiske Roberts, M.A., Frank Vizetelly.

This handy volume, of over 900 pages, will satisfy the needs and extreme demands of most educated people. For clearness and succinctness it leaves nothing to be desired; and in other respects—arrangement and printing—it is a model production. Being apparently set upon meeting the requirements of colleges and schools, the publishers have not stopped with the "Student" edition. They also issue the Standard Intermediate-School Dictionary (4s.), which gives the orthography, pronunciation, meaning, and etymology of about 38,000 words and phrases. There are 800 pictorial illustrations. This also is a very useful book for the home as well as the school. (Funk & Wagnalls Co., 44, Fleet Street, E.C.)

In his substantial volume, entitled Unfamiliar Texts, Rev. Dinsdale T. Young gives us twenty sermons, which are good reading for those who cannot attend Divine worship, and "dust of gold," for preachers and others in search of ideas. Mr. Young has found rich spiritual treasure where many see nothing more than words, although words of Holy Scripture. Starting from an expression which hardly strikes the reader, or a fact which many would be disposed to account common-place, he preaches sermons which show the marvellous fruitfulness of God's Word. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.)

*Higher Criticism.

By Rev. ROBERT SINKER, D.D.

Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled (Matt. v. 17, 18).

THESE are startling words, if read in connection with the theory of Wellhausen and his disciples. A book partly legend, partly dishonest legend, fabrications for a purpose, with history which is not history, with a Levitical code made a thousand years after the time of Moses, with a Deuteronomic code made up partly of "ancient laws adapted to present purposes," and partly of "perfectly new ones framed in the spirit of Moses"—can such a book as this be one to which the Son of God puts the solemn declaration given above? It seems to us that the alternatives before the reader are definite enough. It is not the Holy Scriptures which are being challenged, it is the authority of

THE TEACHING OF OUR LORD HIMSELF.

What is there for the believer but to say, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

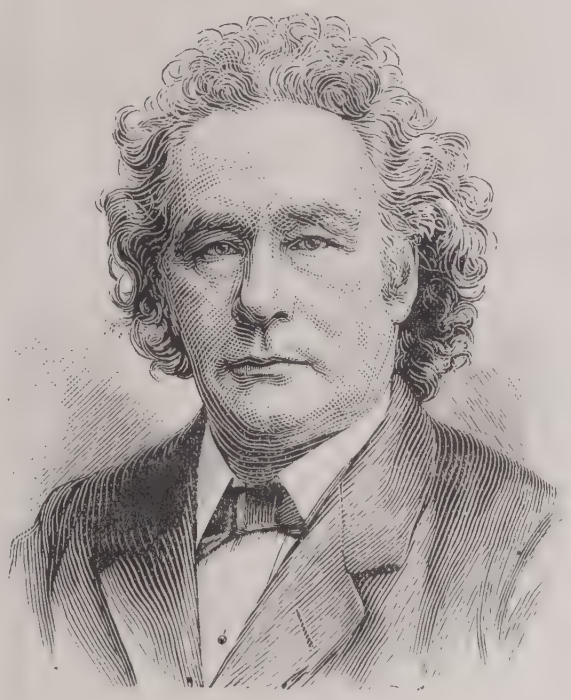
Again, to come more to details, the Saviour constantly teaches that the Old Testament Scriptures prophesied of Him. He says of them, "They are they which testify of Me" (John v. 39). After reading the prophetic lection in the synagogue at Nazareth, He declares (Luke iv. 11) that those words of Isaiah (lxi. 1 f.) are "this day fulfilled in their ears." Not long before his Passion, He tells the twelve, "All things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man shall be accomplished" (Luke xviii. 31).

At the close of the Last Supper, before the Lord and his disciples went to the Mount of Olives, He used these words: "I say unto you that this which is written must be fulfilled in Me—'He was reckoned with transgressors'; for that which concerneth Me hath fulfilment" (Luke xxii. 37, in R.V.; cf. Isa. lii. 12). Later on, when the little band drew near to Gethsemane, the Saviour appealed to the ancient prophecy which foretold his desertion by all his followers (Zech. xiii. 7; Mark xiv. 27).

But let us look on beyond the Passion, and Death, and Resurrection, and view the risen Christ, now triumphant over death, as He walks with the two disciples towards Emmaus.

IS THERE ANY CHANGE

now in the previous high tone as to the ancient Scriptures? Surely no. He upbraids the two despondent disciples with their folly and slowness of heart in not believing all that the prophets have spoken (Luke xxiv. 25). It is important to observe that the Saviour not merely teaches these disciples the truth, but upbraids them for not having recognised the truth. For them the lesson taught by Moses and the prophets should have been plain. Men were meant by God's grace to see Christ set forth therein. We read (v. 27), "and beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself;" even as afterwards, when addressing the eleven disciples, He says (v. 44), "All things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me." Will it be held that any form of the kenotic theory avails here? Can it be that the Christ who, a few short weeks afterwards, made the claim, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth," was but fallible? God be thanked—No. . . .



Whatever we may accept in the way of modification of old views, let us remember that our Lord has taught us plainly that the law of Moses was divinely appointed; and, therefore, whatever errors may be in our ideas of it, no element of fraud or imposture can enter there. Nay more, no theory can possibly be true which conflicts with the direct teaching of Christ. This may seem to some a very needless truism; unfortunately, it is a very necessary reminder. We are prepared, as Christian men, to receive and welcome the fullest light of the new learning. We are not prepared to be dragged at the wheels of those who would give us a discredited Old Testament, an emasculated New Testament, a fallible Christ.

* From Higher Criticism: What is it, and Where does it Lead us? By Rev. Robert Sinker, D.D., Librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge. (3s. 6d. Nisbet & Co.) A series of papers recently contributed to The Record. It is forcibly shown that archæology has discredited many of the rulings of "criticism," so-called; and with reason it is maintained that, till archæology has said its last word, Christian people may well suspend judgment on a good many more. Theological students will find this a steadying book in the present time of mental distress

*A Faith that Stands.

By Rev. JOSEPH PARKER, D.D.

OUR faith must not be a mere antiquity, that is venerated simply because of its age. If it is worth keeping, it is only because it is a present power—greater than anything that is around us, dealing directly with the whole mystery and outlook of life, subduing and chastening all things, and lifting them up to their right use and influence: it must be the one thing in which all other things cohere, and without which the whole fabric of life would be shaken down. Our faith is no faith at all, in any vital and saving sense, if it require to be kept from the cold, nursed, screened, and spared from all roughness of weather and friction: that is not faith. Whatever it is, there can be no doubt as to its utter uselessness in a life so varied, so mysterious, so guilty, so sublime in its possibilities as ours.

We ought to know whether our faith can stand the wear and tear of daily life, whether it can answer the deepest questions of human reverence, or can only exact homage on the ground of a supernatural dumbness which holds the imagination in terror.

WE MUST NOT BE AFRAID of our faith. We must find out, by every method open to responsible minds, whether it can walk with the footmen and run with the horsemen of the age; and then, leaving all footmen and horsemen far behind, weary and afraid, can advance with noble mien, with a sovereignty which the soul instinctively adores, to rule the swellings of Jordan into infinite peace.

Footmen and horsemen there be many, and for a time they seem to be able to do all the business of life's short road; but when they come within the sound of the rushing waters—rivers that plunge into depths unknown, torrents that cannot pause to tell their secret—they turn away in weakness and in much fear. I want a faith to which the darkness and the light are both alike, the face of a lion, the face of an eagle, the face of a cherub, and the face of a man. I want a faith that can resist, with infinite reason, "the spear, the dart, and the habergeon, that esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood" (Job xli. 26, 27), a faith akin to my soul, and that speaks a language I seem to have heard in some other world.

THE FOUR-FACED FAITH,

What, then, is this thing called the Christian faith? Of what stuff is it made? What right has it to a place in the thinking of the nineteenth century? Is there any man-making nutriment in its doctrine? Is it the terror of reason, or its inspiration? Is it a little priest-guarded prison which bars in the reluctant mind, or is it an open firmament full of great lights and WARM WITH HEAVENLY SUMMER?

I for one am prepared to give it up if these questions cannot be satisfactorily answered—nay, if I cannot find the answer in the complete peace and sacred joy of my own heart. If my faith be outside of me, a ghostly haze in the air, it is but a superstition; it must be in me, part of me—yea, my very soul, my truest, holiest self. We cannot live completely and robustly in some other man's faith.

Do, then, let us be strong at the centre of conviction, for weakness there is ruin in the whole exterior of the circle; and not only ruin in the matter of direct and useful action in general society, but the deeper ruin of the soul itself in continually to reconcile its secret unbelief with its public dogmatism, in driving it to find in vocal emphasis what is wanting in spiritual certitude, and in scourging it to invent casuistries which may mitigate the vulgarity, but never lessen the sin of systematic falsehood. We bear the Christian name, we take wages for preaching the Christian Gospel, we expel men with whom we once held Christian fellowship, we appear unto men to be Christians,—but what are we when we enter our closet, and shut the door, and look into the never-spoken secret of the heart? "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

* From A Preacher's Life: An Autobiography and an Album. By Joseph Parker, D.D., minister of the City Temple, London. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) The book is in three parts—(1) Personal and Pastoral; (2) Literary and Controversial; (3) An Album. Here we have gentleness and strength combined; and we know not which to admire the more. Dr. Parker is a man of vision as well as vigour; and his recollections of notable friends and acquaintances are as readable as the more didactic sections of the book are "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." There are striking portraits of the author and his lamented wife—"promoted to the higher school."

Church History for the People.

TWO works that have for some years been before the reading public, and which still have a ministry to perform, are: Early Church History—to the Death of Constantine; and Witnesses for Christ, and Memorials of Church Life, from the fourth to the thirteenth century. They are the compilation of Edward Backhouse and Charles Tylor, and the result of careful research within well defined limits.

In these books, as distinguished from the rule in some quarters, respect is shown for men and women who, in their generation, were stigmatized as heretics, because they protested against religious corruption and priestly assumption. Explanation of this is amply afforded by the fact that the works have been produced by members of the Society of Friends who have aimed to exhibit the testimony spiritual teaching and worship as it has appe from time to time, and regardless of the tion which contemporaries accorded it.

Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, in a pref former of the two volumes, outline

Mr. Backhouse, who died in 1879. As embodying the great facts of history during the formative and deformative ages of the Church, these books have a value altogether independent of any special views which their authors may have wished to favour or emphasize. Having gone through several editions, they have now been published in a form which brings them within reach of a still wider public. They are large books, but issued at the marvellous price of 1s. nett each. (Headley Bros.)

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

The Children's Treasury for 1900 is a rich collection of pictures and stories—a good specimen of an admirable annual. (1s. Nelson & Sons.)

Darton's Leading Strings, with its many engravings and bright readings, is an old friend, and never was more welcome. (1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

The popularity of Sunday Reading for the Young is easily explained. The pictures are numerous and good; the readings are short and pointed. The annual volume is admirably suited for presentation purposes, children of all ages finding something in the well-stocked pages. (3s. and 5s. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

The sixth annual volume of The Zenana: or Woman's Work in India, is filled with accounts of the operations of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, and facts which demonstrate the urgency and importance of the same. (2s. 6d. Partridge.) Students of the Mission cause will find these pages very instructive.

Sunshine contains illustrated serial and other stories, which are sure to entertain young readers, whilst conveying useful lessons. Bible and other picture stories, and ingeniously varied competitions, sustain interest, and consecutive papers treat helpfully of "Our Pets and their management." (1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d., according to binding. G. Stoneman.)

The Girl's Realm Annual is a massive volume of over 1,200 pages, and has many illustrations, generally of an effective character. The writers include many favourites, such as Rosa N. Carey, E. Everett-Green, Charlotte M. Yonge, L. T. Meade, Agnes Giberne, Emma Marshall, and Sarah Doudney. A variety of tastes will find gratification in these pages, in which domestic interests have a place alongside general entertainment. (Hutchinson & Co.)

The Religious Tract Society's smaller annuals are well up to the established standard. Light in the Home (1s. 6d.) has much good reading for grown-ups; and the same may be said of The Cottager and Artisan (1s. 6d.), in bold type and fully illustrated. Friendly Greetings (5s.) is true to its name, and is always welcome in the homes of the people. For the young there are Our Little Dots and the Child's Companion (1s. 6d. each), both of them old acquaintances, and highly prized in the nursery.

The Fireside pictorial volume is a familiar friend. (7s. 6d.) It is edited by Rev. Charles Bullock, who has long brought good judgment and large resource to bear upon the work of providing wholesome reading for the homes of the people. There are stories and meditations, and full-page plates as well as smaller engravings. Hand and Heart (2s.), edited by H. Somerset Bullock, is well described as "a family, social, and temperance magazine." It is a very desirable volume for parochial and lending libraries. ("Home Words" Office.)

The Sunday Magazine maintains in its latest volume all the features that have made it popular and useful for many years past. In the matter of illustrations it is more attractive than ever, many choice plates being given. There are stories by David Lyall and Helen Shipton; among the papers definitely religious are several by Dr. Alex. Whyte on great hymns and their writers; and there are useful biographical sketches of men and women of mark. Good Words, still edited by Dr. Donald Macleod, has serial and short stories, literary and science papers, poetical and other gems, one and all in rich abundance. Sir Wyke Bayliss contributes articles, finely illustrated, on the Great Victorian Artists, and William Canton gives monthly notes "From an Idler's Day Book." The miscellaneous contents include descriptive accounts of the Italian and Jewish colonies in London. Dr. Maclaren contributes the Sunday readings. Either of these volumes provides excellent reading for the winter months. (7s. 6d. each. Isbister & Co.)

Rev. Hugh Benson has edited, in a handy volume, entitled Prayers Public and Private; the orders and forms of public services, private devotions, and hymns, compiled, written, or translated by the late Archbishop Benson. (3s. 6d. Isbister & Co.) The pages have an ecclesiastical interest; and, by a study of them, one realizes in a measure the spiritual experiences of the author. Among the hymns is a beautiful version of the Dies Iræ.

STORY BOOKS.

Sister Royal, by Mrs. Haycraft, will be specially interesting to hospital nurses and those who move in medical circles. Chrystal Joyce, by Edward Garrett, is well described as the story of a golden life—golden by reason of goodness of heart and life on the part of a village shopwoman. (1s. 6d. each. Partridge & Co.)

Joseph Hocking's novel, The Scarlet Woman, preaches a sermon by its title. The pages bring to view the conventual system of the Church of Rome. In substance and structure this is a love story, but it is much besides. It is an exposure of the cruelty and duplicity of a system which is only evil, and that continually. (3s. 6d. James Bowden.)

The Minister's Ward, by V. Brown-Paterson (2s. Sunday School Union), is a volume of the "Endeavour Library," in which the horrors wrought by King Alcohol are portrayed in glaring colours. Some will probably consider the story exaggerated here and there; but, alas, only those engaged in the work of rescuing the perishing are conscious of the terrible havoc made by the monster, against which every Endeavourer should take a firm stand.

Silas K. Hocking's new book, The Strange Adventures of Israel Pendray, is lively reading. From being a champion wrestler, the hero of these pages turns Methodist preacher—being converted under John Wesley in his native Cornwall. A man of sign, the convert had experiences that may well be described as "strange." He was thrashed, kidnapped, robbed, put down a mine, and otherwise ill-treated; but none of these things moved him. The book is a full one, although it only gives incidents from the remarkable life. Cornish superstitions and customs are, of course, vividly portrayed. (3s. 6d. F. Warne & Co.)

From Jarrold & Sons:—Black Beauty: The Autobiography of a Horse. By Anna Sewell. (3s. 6d.) A new and well-illustrated edition of this popular work, which, having enjoyed a very extensive sale in this country and America, and having been translated into French, German, Italian, and Swedish, needs no further commendation. The young folks, as hitherto, will read it with avidity. Leslie Keith's Wayfarers All has been issued by the same publishers. (6s.). The heroine, Ruth Masters, was disinherited through marrying against her father's wish; but "all's well that ends well." The father was reconciled; the book tells how, and gives many glimpses of a happy home life.

From Hutchinson & Co.:—Mr. A. H. Miles has edited a good many volumes in the "Fifty-two" series, but assuredly none more full of animation and varied entertainment than the latest issue, Fifty-two Stories of the Wide, Wide World (5s.). These pages describe life and adventure in many lands, and present a capital budget of wholesome reading for winter evenings. The book is "A 1" for presentation to a young person. The name of Evelyn Everett Green, as the authoress of Miss Marjorie of Silvermead, is sufficient indication of the merits of the work. The ideal country life, and the busy tumultuous city, are pictured with effective taste. An air of profound mystery pervades the initiation of a problem which is eventually solved in an absorbing and fascinating manner.

From Seeley & Co.

Wolf's Head: A Story of the Prince of Outlaws (5s.), by Rev. E. Gilliat, M.A., assistant master at Harrow, is sure to have many readers. It introduces us to Robin Hood as the friend of order and justice and the champion of the weak and defenceless. His son, Walter, and his daughter, Rosalind, partake of the same generous spirit, and occupy prominent places in the tale. Mr. Gilliat has thoroughly studied Plantagenet England, and his pages well reflect the life and customs, also the stress and tumult, of the reign of weak King John.

In The Parson's Daughter (5s.), the late Mrs. Marshall (in the words of a brief preface by her daughter) "elected to let her fancy dwell, not on persons whom she had seen in the flesh, but on a group of men, women, and children who lived in the later years of the eighteenth and the beginning of this century, whose faces and forms still live for us to-day on the canvases of Gainsborough and Romney." Mrs. Marshall's art, as a story writer, needs no commendation; the book is full of human interest, and the illustrations include fine reproductions of great paintings.

From T. Nelson & Sons.

The much-injured heroine of Lucie E. Jackson's The Abbey on the Moor (2s.) should prove an interesting figure to girl readers. The character of the selfish Mrs. Lethbridge is particularly well drawn. We presume the author does not intend to suggest that a school is necessarily "caddish" because it is attended by the "children of petty tradespeople." Children must have pets, and the author of Bobby's Surprises tells, in a very pleasing story, the adventures of a domestic favourite. The shades of joy and sorrow in child-life are very cleverly depicted. (2s.)

K. M. Eady's A Goodly Heritage is a graphic representation of life in a manufacturing centre. It contains common-sense comment on modern methods of dealing with industrial problems. The Twin Castaways, by E. Harcourt Burrage, is a boy's book, packed full of adventure and information. Phil and I, by Paul Blake, takes us back to the eventful days of the Napoleonic wars. The story, which is full of incident, affords pictures of life in a south country port. (2s. 6d. each).

Trefoil: the Story of a Girl's Society, by M. P. Macdonald, tells of a school-day compact. Although sundered for a while, the three girls remembered one another, and the usual incidents are included. The pages must reveal the limitations, and tell of the disappointment of a generous soul. Mobley's Mohicans, a tale of two terms, is by Harold Avery, equal to other school stories by the same vivacious writer. Andrew Home knows boy life and its concerns, as is clear from The Fellow who Won, which is a spirited story. In Havelok the Dane, Mr. Charles W. Whistler, M.R.C.S., is on familiar ground. The hero of his pages was foster-son of Grim, the fisher, and the well-known legend of old Grimsby and Lincoln is rehearsed in a new setting. The book reflects, in an interesting manner, the life and movement of Britain in times before the Norman Conquest. Priscilla, by E. Everett Green and H. Louise Bedford, is quite properly defined on the title page as "A Story for Girls." "Marrying and giving in marriage" is amply represented; but, among other things, the heroine travelled, and what she did and saw is well depicted in the book. (3s. 6d. each.)

From the Religious Tract Society.

Margaret S. Comrie's Over Against Her House, is a picturesque story of family life, and of the difficulties, sorrows, and ultimate happiness of a bright young Scottish girl. Miss Comrie writes in a pleasing and sympathetic style. (3s. 6d.)

Driftwood, by Mary E. Palgrave, forcibly illustrates the test of character in the stress and strain of modern life. The closing chapters, with their tenderness and pathos, are especially good. The illustrations are somewhat unequal, but on the whole the volume makes a high-class gift book. (5s.)

How Gladys Won Her Victory, by Hester Grey, is a well-written and fascinating story. The heroine is a beautiful example of how a girl can triumph over the greatest troubles. Essentially a book for "the people called Methodists" is Margaret Thorn's idyllic love story, The Bond of Love. It contains some graphic descriptions of religious life and work in the western counties. (Both 1s. 6d.)

An Incorrigible Girl, by M. H. Cornwall Legh, is in some respects a remarkable book. It traces, in interesting fashion, the development of a strong girl-nature under the influences of love and practical sympathy. The description of life in a girl's reformatory is terrible in its realism, and, we fear, in correspondence with fact. The matron, with her unbounded faith in scientific ideas, and her infinite resource in the invention of new punishments, is an admirably depicted character. (2s. 6d.)

H. Louise Bedford is a practised delineator of boy and girl life, and, in her latest volume, I will be a Sailor, she traces vividly, and, as a rule, helpfully, the "breaking-in" of a rebellious but kind-hearted lad. In a future edition, Father Dick, when inculcating lofty ideals of life, may, perhaps, discard the habit of "lighting-up," which his little stepson is represented as admiring so keenly. In Legend Led, by Amy Le Feuvre, the authoress uses the impression made upon imaginative children, by the legend of the Holy Grail, to teach some helpful lessons. Clipped Wings, by Harriet E. Colvile, is a readable little story, and especially suitable for girls likely to be led away with sceptical ideas. A pretty love story is interwoven as an under-plot. (Each 2s.)

BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

A Story of Seven, by Bridget Penn (1s. 6d. Nelson), speaks in the language of children, and deals with interests and adventures which are sure to please the young.

Ministering Children: A Tale Dedicated to Childhood, by Maria Louisa Charlesworth, will long be a favourite. A new edition has been issued by Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. (Paper, 6d.; cloth, 1s.)

A capital book for children, in prose and verse, fully illustrated, is Chickabiddy Stories, by Edmund Mitchell. (2s. 6d. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.) Many who are too young to read will listen with pleasure to these rhymes and readings.

Messrs. Blackie & Son have issued two grand nursery books: The Cat and the Mouse, illustrated by Alice B. Woodward (1s.); and In Doors and Out, a Book of Pictures and Stories for Little Folk (2s. 6d.). Both have coloured illustrations; the latter has readings, some of them in rhyme, that will brighten many an hour.

Nancy's Fancies (2s. 6d.), by E. L. Haverfield, is an interesting story for and about children, revealing also a mother's kindly solicitude. Mrs. Molesworth adds another to her long list of entertaining volumes. The new story is called The Boys and I (3s. 6d.), and is supposed to be written by a girl of fourteen—the "I" of the title page. (W. & R. Chambers.)

The Red Book of Animal Stories, selected and edited by Andrew Lang (6s. Longmans, Green, & Co.), is a fund of entertainment. The stories are mythical and marvellous, and many curious facts and fancies are presented in the pages. In the words of the editor: "If this book has any moral at all, it is to be kind to all sorts and conditions of animals—that will let you." The illustrations, by H. J. Ford, are numerous, and of a high order.

Stories from Froissart, by Henry Newbolt, is a children's book of exceptional beauty. (6s. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.) Adventures, journeys, and battles, from the famous Chronicles, are related in language easy of comprehension, and capital illustrations are supplied by Gordon Browne. The episodes are instinct with chivalry and daring. There is a very readable introduction dealing with the Chronicles and their author.

In Little Village Folk, by A. B. Romney, humour and pathos are delightfully blended in charming tales of Irish village children. How Judy walked to Dublin to save her poor old grandmother from being turned out of her cottage; how Kitty's little red petticoat saved the railway train; what happened to Polly Cruden's doll; how Tim found a leprahaun—all these stories and many others are told by Miss Romney in a style calculated to delight the little folk. The book is admirably illustrated. (2s. 6d. Blackie & Son).

The Little Browns, by Mabel E. Wotton, presents to view a set of youngsters, whom the upbringing of an inert mother and faddist father has rendered more than usually individual and self-reliant. During their parents' absence they extend hospitality to a stranger, under the belief that he is their unknown and long-expected uncle from Australia. Two of the little girls make the discovery that the supposed relative is really a burglar, who is in league with the new man-servant, and, by their courage and childish resource, outwit him. In every sense a capital book for children. (6s. Blackie & Son.)

The coloured books for young children, issued by Dean & Son, are very attractive, within and without. The Scripture series includes the stories (briefly told) of Joseph, Samson, and David, each book being fully illustrated. For the tots there are The Fairy Alphabet and The Animal A.B.C. Another panoramic display is Our Favourites, in which cats and dogs and other friends are displayed. Tit for Tat has pictures and poetry; and Attention! introduces soldiers of various ranks and orders. Alphabet Land is a larger book, strongly bound. The most substantial and interesting of all is The British Empire A.B.C., untearable and exceptionally good as an instructor of little folk. The funniest book of the lot is The Gimcrack Jingle Alphabet, pictured by Ingles Rhode.

Fairy stories will never be out of date. Three volumes of that type are before us. Mabel's Prince Wonderful; or a Trip to Storyland, by W. E. Cule (2s. 6d. W. & R. Chambers), is admirably illustrated by Will G. Mein. The adventures of the heroine are sufficiently marvellous, and full of charm for young readers. The Little Panjandrum's Dodo is from the experienced pen of G. E. Farrow (Skeffington & Son), who has told us so much of "wallypug-land." The engravings are from drawings by Allan Wright, and they well agree with the letterpress in mirth-provoking character. The Courteous Knight, and other tales (3s. 6d. Nelson & Sons), borrowed from Spenser and Malory, by E. Edwardson, is another handsome volume. The illustrations are by Robert Hope, and the book is exemplary of genuine art, as well as noble literature.

UNFAMILIAR TEXTS. By Rev. Dinsdale T. Young.

"Some preachers deprecate the use of texts. Why not preach, they ask, on subjects? Subjects are too large; but texts often suggest limited, and therefore manageable, parts of subjects. Mr. Young avails himself of texts in this way, and to good purpose. . . These discourses are of no common kind. A preacher who ventures on these things takes, so to speak, his life in his hands; but Mr. Young seems to us to be justified by results."—Spectator.

London: MORGAN AND SCOTT, 12 Paternoster Buildings, E.C. And may be ordered of any Bookseller or Musicseller.

Books and their Writers.

The late Dr. Culross, in the closing years of his long and well-spent life, lived in retirement; but he was not forgotten, and never will be by those who were privileged to enjoy his ministry, by the men who were trained under him at Bristol College, and by the multitudes who have read and prized his books. Speaking of him as an author, his friend and neighbour at Bristol, Dr. Glover, says: "His books were full of charm."

An Old Student writes of him after his death:

"A choice personality has gone from this world. To have known Dr. Culross as pulpit instructor, theological professor, or still more as intimate friend, was to have known one of the most beautiful, one of the loveliest saints in God's kingdom. Instinctively one felt that to come into his presence was to breathe a heavenly atmosphere. One of the far too few volumes he wrote is entitled, "John, Whom Jesus Loved,"* and subject and author were never more nearly allied. "Somehow, Dr. Culross always reminds me of the Apostle John," said one of his personal acquaintances. How many there are who could make that casual remark their own! His mystic insight into spiritual truth, his tender sympathies, his high reverence of soul, his sterling love of righteousness were truly Johannine."

Two other of Dr. Culross's works which have attained large circulations are: "Thy First Love,"† an Exposition of the Message to the Church at Ephesus; and "Behold I Stand at the Door and Knock,"‡ dealing with the Message to the Church at Laodicea.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan has been one of the summer preachers at Northfield for four years in succession. This year he made a more extended stay in America, preaching in many of the principal cities. Speaking of him as a preacher, a friend in London writes:—

"Some of his word-pictures of Old and New Testament incidents and scenes are marvellously vivid and striking; the hearer is made almost to live through them, so realistic are they. Then comes the application, brought down to the details of every-day life and experience. None can go away feeling that they have been listening to an elaborate essay, but to the words of a man who sees life, and sees it whole, and has somewhat of help and encouragement and inspiration to give. Mr. Morgan's preaching is full of vitality. It goes straight to the heart, and its influence will be felt after many days by those who have been privileged to hear it."

But Mr. Campbell Morgan exercises a wider ministry than that of his voice. He is an author, and has just published, through Messrs. Morgan and Scott, a work, entitled "Life Problems"§—a series of Addresses on Self, Environment, Heredity, Spiritual Antagonism, Influence, Destiny. A writer in the Life of Faith, reviewing the book, says:

"That a ministry of gracious power and promise has been entrusted to the author of Life Problems no reader of the book will fail thankfully to recognise. . . . With great vigour, freshness, and loyalty to the Word of Christ, he treats his themes. All readers will be edified and instructed, and preachers will find many new and important vistas of thought opened out before them."

Rev. F. B. Meyer, in a recent sketch of "Northfield and its Wonderful Work," says of Mr. Moody, "Shrewdness, practical acquaintance with men and things, sanctified commonsense, an unrivalled knowledge of the Bible light up his utterances, till they glow as a very cloth of gold." The same language might be used about Mr. Meyer himself, for these are the characteristics conspicuous in his writings which have made his name known all the world over. While many have heard Mr. Meyer's voice at Leicester, in London, at Northfield and elsewhere in America, and in India on his recent tour in that country, a far greater number know him through his books. These are almost too numerous to set out in detail, and Messrs. Morgan and Scott will gladly send an illustrated list of works by Mr. Meyer published by them. We may, however, mention the set of five volumes comprising "Our Daily Homily," and giving for each day expositions of selected passages from every chapter of the Bible. These five volumes are enclosed in a case, and can be had in four different styles.* The publication of these, at this time, is opportune, when the problem of "an acceptable present" is occupying the minds of so many. For a preacher or any other Christian worker, nothing could be more suitable and helpful.

Mr. J. Ellis is well and favourably known as editor of The Tool Basket, The Seed Basket, etc. His latest work is entitled "Gospel Seed for Busy Sowers."† By means of outline Addresses, Prayer-meeting talks, Bible readings, children's Sermonettes, Temperance topics, and "Hints" and "Points" of all kinds, Mr. Ellis seeks to help lay preachers, evangelists, Sunday-school teachers, and others who, in the stress of daily work, find it difficult at times to be ready for their religious engagements. The Methodist Times reviewer says of the book:—

"The best and most helpful volume which Mr. Ellis has yet issued. Almost everyone of the hundreds of outlines and notes will be found of practical value. We have had the amplest evidence of the great assistance which local preachers and Sunday-school teachers have derived from Mr. Ellis's earlier volumes; and they will, in our opinion, find 'Gospel Seed for Busy Sowers' even more useful than its predecessors."

The Herald of Mercy Annual for 1899 is published in good time for Christmas, and no doubt, as in former years, it will be very popular as a gift book for old and young alike. The book, which is handsomely bound in illustrated covers, is entitled "The Pilot's Warning, and Other Readings."‡ It is well illustrated, and contains a mass of interesting and profitable reading. The late Rev. C. H. Spurgeon (no mean authority) wrote respecting a former volume:

"A delightful magazine, as full of the Gospel as the pages will hold; and withal so interestingly and plainly written that the poorest will like it. The shilling volume ought to be given away by thousands. It has done us great good to read it. Ministers would find lots of good anecdotes in it, fresh and bright."

It is interesting to note that year by year many Christian friends adopt Mr. Spurgeon's suggestion, and purchase the volume in quantities for distribution among soldiers and sailors, in workshops and factories, &c.

Mr. D. L. Moody, in the preface to his latest book, Anecdotes, Incidents, and Illustrations,§ writes:—"Many and many a time have I found that when the sermon—and even the text—has been forgotten, some story has fastened itself in a hearer's mind, and has borne fruit." "Anecdotes," adds Mr. Moody, "are like windows to let light in upon a subject." He has proved the truth of this in his own unrivalled experience; and this book forms, to quote from the Literary World, "a perfect treasury from the resources of one of the greatest of anecdotists—capitally printed and easily consulted."

For a Christmas Present to your minister, to a Sunday School teacher or to any Christian worker, nothing could be more suitable than one of the "Libraries," published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. For instance, there is the "F. B. Meyer Library of Scripture Biography," which can be obtained at prices varying from 20s. to 30s., or the same author's "Library of Devotional Volumes," which costs 7s. or 9s. 6d., according to style. Then there is the "Expository Library," comprising five valuable works by Mr. Meyer, and costing 10s. 6d.; or these three Libraries, together with two Autographical Works by Mr. Meyer, can be obtained in one handsome case for two guineas or two and a half guineas, according to the binding of the books. Mr. Moody's books, sixteen in all, can also be had in library style and enclosed in a suitable oak case for 25s., or polished walnut case for 27s. 6d. All these prices are net and carriage is extra. There are other libraries, of books by Mrs. Shipton, and of Biblical works specially suited to equip an evangelist or lay preacher for his work, but particulars of all these can be obtained on application to the Publishers, Office of The Christian, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

The Popular Penny Hymn Book, for meetings in churches, mission halls, tents, &c., is Sacred Songs and Solos, with Standard Hymns Combined. This selection, compiled and sung by Mr. Ira D. Sankey, and containing 750 pieces, and costing only one penny, is a marvel alike in Paper, Printing, and Price. Ministers and others desiring to see a copy, should send twopence in stamps to the publishers, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, who will forward same, together with a list of other editions and specimens of type. [Advt.]

Reaching the Masses.

An Experiment in Church-filling.

In a comparatively small town, a few miles from the metropolis, the notice-board of the Congregational Church has this singular announcement, following the notice of morning service: "Evening service and all other meetings in the Lecture Hall." Thereby hangs a tale, which is a substantial testimony to the value of the truth and of "Sankey's Hymns" well sung. It appears that nearly eleven years ago the little chapel was thinly attended. In the hope of reaching outsiders, the pastor announced an evangelistic service on the last Sunday in the month, at which "Sankey's Hymns" would be sung. Small bills were also left at a large number of houses. There had been the usual hesitation in adopting "Sankey's Hymns;" but the prejudice was overcome by the pastor urging the choir to try them, and to do them well for Christ and humanity. The choir have never regretted it, but have earned the reputation of singing those hymns as they are seldom sung. To the surprise of all, the church was so filled on the first occasion that a few, not caring to stand in the aisles, left the place. That was the first and last special evening service held in the chapel.

Having a large lecture hall near by, it was at once urged to hold the next monthly service there. The increased attendance on that occasion led to the request that the service in the hall be held fortnightly instead of monthly. It was done, and after a few services, the building, holding nearly 600 people, was so well filled that it was decided to close the chapel, and hold the evening service there. The special service now became the regular service, but with "Sankey's Hymns." It has continued for over ten years, and is to-day as much appreciated and as well attended as ever.

Now, what has been the result? Some left because it was deemed improper to receive the Lord's Supper in a lecture-hall. A few dislike the service, while admitting its usefulness, and seldom or never attend it. But it has led to many conversions, largely added to the membership of the church, and so increased the attendance at the morning service in the chapel, that, on a fine morning, the deacons have difficulty in finding accommodation for the worshippers, and are seriously considering the ways and means of enlarging their borders. The success of the experiment convinces us all that the Gospel, fully and heartily proclaimed, with 'Sankey's Hymns" well sung, and for the sake of others, is a sure means of reaching the masses. It should, perhaps, be added that the hall is in a good position, and attractive in appearance; the deacons, moreover, stand in the lobby presenting hymn-books and giving a hearty welcome to all who attend. There is not an element of sensationalism about the service, and never a clap trap advertisement respecting it. It has, moreover, led to the establishment of two largely attended children's services in the basement of the building, carried on during the service above. It is a work which has gladdened our hearts, but which places us in considerable difficulty, having outgrown the capacity of the chapel for morning worship, and lacking men of wealth who could easily help us over the difficulty.

The Discontented Violet.

"OH, dear! I wish I were taller!" said a sweet little voice, which seemed to come from a bed of violets. "If only I were as tall as that Princess Hyacinth over there, I could see the whole wood. Smothered down here as I am, I can only see a bit of blue sky and some green leaves. No one notices me either; if anyone comes into the wood they see Princess Hyacinth at once, but I am quite passed by. I might as well be dead here under my leaves, and with such an absurdly short stalk. I will be noticed! I will grow up; I've made up my mind!"

So with these words the little violet, with a burst of energy, shot up a long, slender, green stalk, on the top of which hung her little blue hood. At last she had her wish. She was as tall as the hyacinth, and could look with disdain upon her humble little sisters, who were quite content to stay clustered together at her feet, and who had no ambitions, such as her own, to see and to be seen.

Beyond, she beheld all the glories of the wood in which she had always lived, but had never known till now. Looking over the bank of violet plants, she could see the carpet of moss stretching ever so far around; banks of fairy-like ferns waving in the breeze; trunks of great trees, and at their roots clumps of beautiful pink toadstools; all of which were quite new to her. For a long time Lady Violet gazed in wonder and delight at the vista of scenery opening out to her on every side, and it really seemed as if she could never tire of it. But you find that you tire of most things when once you get used to them, so it was not surprising that in an hour or two she began to think she would like a new sensation. The sun was rather warm, she thought she would have liked one of those wide, green, violet leaves as a parasol; but she had left them behind for ever. She began to feel lonely up there all by herself. Her sisters looked so far down, they couldn't hear her if she were to speak; even the little frogs that she had been accustomed to converse with when they scrambled through the violet plants, and who used to tell her tales of what they saw in their travels, would never be able to talk to her again, nor she to them, for her voice was so soft and gentle, and was only meant to whisper. So at last she addressed the nearest person to her, the proud Princess Hyacinth. "I'm as tall as you are now, your Royal Highness!" But the Princess only waved her bells contemptuously as she looked at her. She thought Lady Violet a little upstart, which no doubt she was, and only remarked,

"HOW RIDICULOUS YOU LOOK!"

So the poor little violet was left severely alone, and very terribly she began to feel it. Now that she had seen all there was to see, she bitterly regretted having left the warm, cosy bed where at least she was at home. She looked down at that awful, long stalk, and thought she must be at least a yard high. "I wish I could get back again!" she sobbed, hanging her head, and there was a bright tear-drop in her eye.

As night drew on, she shivered and shivered. Oh, how she longed to nestle down there with the others! A storm crept up. The wind blew through the forest like a tremendous whistle. It cracked the branches, tore up trees by the roots, scattered the loose leaves, and did an endless amount of damage. But it swept over the little low bed of violets, leaving them quite unharmed. In the morning, Princess Hyacinth, whose tough, strong stalk was made to bend beneath the fiercest wind, waved her bells just as if nothing had happened; but beside her, on the ground, lay Lady Violet, her thin, green stalk snapped and broken, and her blue hood draggled in the dust!

Now, children, I am quite sure you know the meaning of this story without my telling it to you. Can you not trace a resemblance to the violet in yourselves sometimes? You know how often you want to be something else than what you are, to be somewhere else than where you are, to do something else than what you are required to do. What we all need to do is to realize that God put us just in this very place, and that He knew what He was doing and what was best for us. And you will soon find it out if you try to get away from the place where God has put you, just as the violet did.

Worthy Ambitions.

I HAVE received interesting little letters from two sisters, who have commenced the "Bible Searcher" this quarter. The elder, who is fourteen, is learning drawing, and says:—"I am going to be an artist when I grow up. I shall be able to get money then, and I think I shall keep some missionaries out in South Africa. I have had a missionary box for the South African Mission for a long time." She writes little stories too, and is very fond of lessons. The younger one, who is twelve, is not fond of lessons, but is very much interested in astronomy, and has a number of books on that subject. She is wondering what she will get to do, and says:—"I am always asking God to give me an occupation, but I cannot get one."
